I want to take no advantage; I want no sharp practice in this case; and I want none practiced upon me or my client. But I am perfectly willing that this case shall go on in the ordinary way, the Government having one concluding argument, and if my friend, Mr. Merrick, can make anything against my client in the ordinary progress of the case, the Government is entitled to it. But I do not want them to have an advantage in this case that has never, to my knowledge, been granted in any case where the common law is administered. And therefore I present my most earnest protest against it. It was for that reason that I rose to inquire a little while ago as to whether or not the Government intended to demand two closing speeches after the defense had concluded.

When this matter was up before, the court said, at page 4491—Mr. Chandler has just handed me the record:

The COURT. The court has made a ruling as to the order of the arguments. Now, the court cannot make a ruling which is like the laws of the Medes and Persians, never to be revised. As long as this term lasts, any ruling of the court is subject to reconsideration.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I would suppose there might be a ruling which would not be changed, as we have to act upon it.

Mr. MERRICK. Can your honor rule until I bring forward my motion?

The COURT. The thing is settled for the present, certainly. Whether it would be opened on motion is another question ; and I cannot make a ruling now that counsel shall be prohibited forever from making a motion.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I did not ask anything of the kind. I only desired to know whether the point was settled. I understand that there might be peculiar and remarkable circumstances to induce the court to modify the ruling somewhat. But I understand that ruling to be absolute, with the light now before the court.

The COURT. Oh, yes ; I would not change it unless for good cause shown hereafter.

What has occurred since that time to change the ruling as then laid down by the court ? What is there in this case that should induce the court to change its ruling ? I cannot conceive of anything, unless it is that the prosecution have for fourteen days argued this case without the defendants having had an opportunity of opening their mouths. If fourteen days of argument on behalf of the Government is a sufficient reason for changing the rule as laid down by the court, then, I suppose, as a matter of course, the court will change it. The rule that the court laid down was this :

The COURT. I will say, then, that the Government in this case will be entitled to have as many counsel speak in the opening as they choose, but they will be limited to one reply.

That was the rule laid down by the court. Now, what has occurred to induce a change of that rule ? Nobody is sick, nobody has become disqualified, nothing of that kind has happened in this case. Why then is this rule to be changed after we have sat here and listened to arguments against our clients by two counsel in this manner for fourteen days ?

The COURT. I have heard, as yet, nothing to satisfy my mind that it would be proper to change the practice of the court.

It is very true that, however the court might rule upon this question, the ruling would not be error in a higher court, because it is a matter of practice left to the discretion of the court below. But these matters of discretion are not matters of mere whim or caprice. It is an old proverb that "the course of the court is the law of the court," even in regard to matters of practice. And, although the court will hold this mere exercise of discretion somewhat less rigidly than it would a statute or the decision of a higher court, yet when the course of the court for years has become established it would be an unbecoming thing, it seems to me, upon the part of the court to depart from that course without some reason. If sickness should take place, or necessary absence should break in upon the closing argument of counsel, so as to render that argument incomplete, the court, of course, would allow the other counsel to take his place. But according to my knowledge of the practice in this court ; according to what information I have of the practice in other courts, two replies on the part of the Government are not the practice.

It is said that on the trial of Judge Chase there were several arguments in reply. That was an impeachment trial before the Senate. The Senate is not a common-law tribunal. It makes its own rules for itself, has its own custom and its own practice. Because the Senate chose to adopt a certain course with reference to the arguments on a trial, this court would not feel itself obliged to follow that precedent in trying a criminal case here.

The O'Connell case was for conspiracy against seven defendants, six of whom, I believe, were convicted, in a certain way. Each of those defendants took his own separate writ of error to the House of Lords, and when the argument was reached before the House of Lords the question came up as to how the argument was to be conducted. The attorney-general, on behalf of the government, claimed that it had the opening and closing; but that was not yielded. The plaintiffs in error were held to be entitled to the opening and the closing. So they were heard by two arguments in the opening of that case; then the government followed on the other side, and two arguments were heard on behalf of the defendants in conclusion.

There was another reason given by the judges in that case: that, inasmuch as each defendant had his own counsel, and they were not obliged to have common counsel, several (more than the usual number of counsel) were allowed to be heard on the part of the defense; and for that reason two counsel were heard on the part of the defendants in conclusion, in order to meet the arguments of the counsel for the Government.

But we do not follow the practice of the House of Lords, and that is a sufficient answer to that.

It is very seldom that we meet with authority in regard to a question of this nature, but I found a case the other day, The Commonwealth vs. Knapp, in 9 Pickering, I believe, which was a famous case tried before all the judges of the highest court in the State of Massachusetts. It was a case in which Mr. Webster was employed to assist the attorney-general. A very important question arose in the case as to the admissibility of some evidence of the confession of an accomplice in the crime. The attorney-general opened the argument for the State, and Mr. Webster closed it—I believe that was the order—and then the attorney-general suggested to the court that the solicitor-general had looked into the question and would be glad to be heard. But the court decided that he could not be heard; that there could be but one reply. So the solicitor-general was not heard, and there was but one reply. It is very true that in that case a reference was made to the statute of Massachusetts of 1785. But the court does not put its decision upon that statute; the statute is merely referred to. On looking at that statute it will be seen that it declares simply that every man accused of crime shall be entitled to a speedy trial, to be confronted by the witnesses, to hear the charges against him, and to be entitled to be heard by counsel, provided his counsel should not exceed two in number. That was a statute which related plainly and solely to accused persons, and not to the Government. Still, the court in that case decided that there could be but one reply on behalf of the Government.

I think it would be the most proper course—it would seem to be so—and it would appear better for the court in this instance—to make no departure from its ordinary practice. I have seen no imperative reason for changing the practice. I believe the practice here has been uniform, and, I think, uniform throughout this country in the criminal courts, that the Government shall have but one reply.

I should be very much pleased, if I could do so consistently with my sense of duty, to listen to a closing argument from the Attorney-General. His reputation, position, and character would all claim such a privilege—if he should regard it as a privilege—if he wished to exercise it. But we cannot give way to a feeling of that kind at the expense of rules of practice which have uniformly controlled us.

The motion is therefore overruled.

* [Some moments were here spent in consultation between counsel for the defendants.]

Mr. HENKLE. If the court please, it is only twenty minutes until the usual time of adjournment, and we would like to have some consultation among ourselves in order to determine what we shall do.

Mr. BLISS. Your honor, with reference to that, I think we may fairly ask this afternoon what the gentlemen on the other side are intending to do. I, perhaps, feel the more strongly upon the subject, because I was forced by the necessities of this case to forego an engagement made long since in which many others were involved, and I have postponed it on the theory that we should know to-day at least precisely what the other side would do. I have people waiting for me at the other end of the wire to know precisely what information I can give them. Inasmuch as the defense have had notice that I expected to close before the recess, I think we may fairly be entitled to know whether they are in the position that Mr. Henkle stated they were at one time, of not saying anything, or whether they are ready to go on. If they do not, we have the burden upon us to go on in the morning with prayers to the court, and we are entitled to know their decision, beyond all question, it seems to me.

Mr. INGERSOLL. [Facetiously.] We were taken by surprise, of course, about Mr. Bliss's closing to-day.

Mr. BLISS. That is probably as true as a good deal else that had been said by them in this case.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is about as true as any part of your speech. We only ask about twenty minutes, which is only about a minute a day for the time they have spent in opening.

The COURT. But you had notice that Mr. Bliss would close to-day.

Mr. INGERSOLL. So we had notice last Wednesday about his closing, and he has kept it up day after day.

Mr. MERRICK. If your honor please, may I be permitted to make a single suggestion? Whilst, of course, it is always most agreeable to us to extend every courtsey that may be asked by the other side, and concurred in specially by the court, I shall to-morrow, if Mr. Bliss keeps an engagement obligatory upon him, be left alone with my brother Ker. The attitude in which matters will be placed when we know the determination of the other side will be such as to make it very desirable to have a full consultation between counsel on behalf of the Government.

The COURT. Suppose they were to announce this afternoon that it was their purpose to go on, and then in the morning come in and say they had changed their mind; the court could not make them go on.

Mr. MERRICK. No, your honor; but, of course, if they announced their purpose to go on in a case of this vast magnitude and importance, it certainly would be a very definite purpose, for the subject has been under consideration by them.

The COURT. I assume that they might, after consultation during the night, change their minds.

Mr. MERRICK. It is possible; but I hardly think that gentlemen whose minds are so used to grasping large subjects as theirs would be apt to change in so short a time.

Mr. INGERSOLL. We are exceedingly anxious to make a place for the Attorney-General. We hate to see him leave the case without an opportunity to present his views, and it may be that we can come to a conclusion that will allow the Attorney-General either to close the case or to make an intermediate speech. We have been talking it over a little among ourselves. We do not want to put ourselves in the attitude of depriving the Government of the services of one of its highest officers.

Mr. BLISS. You have changed your views from those of Mr. Dorsey, as expressed to General Garfield.

Mr. INGERSOLL. It is not the same one.

Mr. MERRICK. In reply to that I say that I have made no proposition of any kind to counsel upon the other side in reference to the order of proceeding. Those propositions were made some time since and declined; I make none now, and I shall consider none. From this time we will proceed, as we have thus far proceeded in the argument, according to the rules of law.

Mr. INGERSOLL. All I wanted was to make them responsible for keeping the Attorney-General out.

Mr. MERRICK. According to his letter the Attorney-General is responsible himself.

The COURT. The Attorney-General can close if he chooses.

Mr. MERRICK. The Attorney-General can close if he chooses; as a matter of course I bow to his authority and distinguished reputation, and I would be extremely glad if he would relieve me from the duty which, according to his letter, he has imposed upon me. I am not making arrangements with the other side.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Nevertheless, I suppose we could allow the Attorney-General to speak.

Mr. MERRICK. If twenty minutes for consultation are wanted, let us take a recess for twenty minutes.

The COURT. That would be equivalent to an adjournment.

Mr. MERRICK. I want to know this evening.

The COURT. Let us know, gentlemen, what you think about it.

Mr. HENKLE. It seems to me, your honor, that it is hardly fair to require us to determine that matter this evening. The court has several times adjourned over before the usual time in order to accommodate counsel for the Government, without any objection on our part. I have heard no reason suggested by counsel why our request should not be granted.

The COURT. I think on that point favors are about equally balanced.

Mr. HENKLE. I am making no complaint to the court.

Mr. MERRICK. I told you my reason.

Mr. HENKLE. My Brother Merrick is prepared to go on, and I do not suppose he will add anything to his preparation during the night. Mr. Bliss has completed his argument, and I presume he intends to go home to-night.

Mr. BLISS. I want to go home to-night and return to-morrow night, but it depends entirely upon the course of procedure.

Mr. HENKLE. I cannot conceive how the interest of the Government will suffer by an adjournment now.

The COURT. He has not taken you into his confidence.

Mr. HENKLE. No, and he has not suggested anything, it seems to me, which the court can regard as any good reason why our request should not be granted. We represent different clients, and we have not decided what we will do. I have a decided opinion about it, but I may not find myself in exact accord with my colleagues. I do not know whether I will or not. But if I should have my way about it this argument would be very much abridged. I think the court ought to indulge us with an adjournment now, in order to give us an opportunity for consultation. It only lacks fifteen minutes of the regular time for adjournment.

Mr. MERRICK. I have no other reason for objecting than that stated, but that reason is a very serious one.

The COURT. Mr. Henkle, I will give you the time. Adjourn the court

Thereupon (at 3 o'clock and 46 minutes p. m.) the court adjourned until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 9, 1883.

The court met at 11 o'clock.

Present, counsel for the Government and for the defendants.

Mr. MERRICK. If your honor please, before Mr. Wilson proceeds I wish to say that I have thought it would not be out of place, with a view to the assistance of counsel on either side, as well as to the jury, to suggest to my brothers that we now place our prayers in the hands of the court.

The COURT. That is a matter that you may agree upon if you choose.

Mr. WILSON. Well, if your honor please, we had not anticipated anything of that kind.

Mr. MERRICK. Probably I ought to have spoken of it in private.

Mr. WILSON. Oh, no; there is nothing improper in your proposition. If it had been suggested to us last night I should have been ready this morning to present our prayers. I supposed from what has heretofore transpired in the presence of the court that that feature of the case was to be reserved until the arguments to the jury were concluded.

Mr. MERRICK. That was what the court said.

Mr. DAVIDGE. The court suggested that. We offered to present our prayers, and, indeed, we desired to present them and to argue them in advance; but I understood it would be more agreeable to the court to have the law argument either follow the argument of the facts, or at the discretion of those representing either side to be interpolated in the argument of the facts.

Mr. MERRICK. I so understood it myself, and therefore thinking it possible some of these gentlemen might desire to exercise that discretion and so interpolate, I thought they would like probably to have the prayers of the Government. I shall interpolate my prayers in my argument.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I do not know that we care particularly about it.

Mr. WILSON. We do not care anything about it.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I take it that the law of the case is very simple.

Mr. WILSON. It would have been a relief to me if the matter had been disposed of before the argument began, but as it has gone thus far I am not prepared this morning with my prayers.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I shall be perfectly willing, in the progress of the argument which will necessarily take some days, to deliver to your honor our prayers and Mr. Merrick can hand you the prayers of the prosecution. In that way each side will be on a par.

The COURT. The difficulty about that is simply this: That counsel have a right to submit prayers on any points of law that may occur to them with regard to the issue at any time before the jury retires, and ask the instructions of the court. If you were to submit your prayers at this stage, or if you had submitted them at an earlier stage, you still would have had that right up to the last minute.

Mr. DAVIDGE. At the same time notice would be given to each side by the other of the different legal propositions maintained. We are perfectly willing to give that notice in the course of the argument.

The COURT. I think there cannot be any misunderstanding between counsel as to the questions of law involved in the case. They know what the questions of law are now just as well as though they had put them into manuscript form.

Mr. MERRICK. I will say further—

The COURT. [Interposing.] I say this, that counsel have the right to submit any prayers for instructions up to the minute before the jury retires. Probably prayers prepared in advance of an argument would contain much superfluous matter. That is one reason why I prefer to have the prayers after the arguments on both sides are closed. Then you will see precisely to what points of fact and of law the case has been narrowed. The prayers for instructions on questions of law, if delivered to the court in advance of the argument to the jury, might contain much superfluous matter. Counsel can only determine that question for themselves after the argument is over. Still, the court is prepared to adopt any course counsel may suggest.

Mr. MERRICK. I do not care. I thought it was fair to my learned brothers to make the suggestion, and I wanted to be fair. It makes no difference to me. I will say further, may it please your honor, with a view to the regulation of my movements, that I understand from my Brother Wilson that the several counsel propose to address the jury and will occupy some time.

Mr. WILSON. That is my present understanding. The arrangement may be varied.

Mr. MERRICK. Of course.

Mr. DAVIDGE. We will stop on our side when we think we have said enough.

Mr. MERRICK. There was no occasion for that bluff and almost ungentlemanly remark, for the reason that I asked Mr. Wilson in private just now what was the arrangement in order that I might regulate my movements, and stated to the court my information in order that the court might understand it.

The COURT. I understand the defense are going on, and they will stop when they think they have exhausted their case.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Yes; we will stop when we think we have said enough. We will not take seven days apiece either.

The COURT. Are you sure of that?

Mr. DAVIDGE. Very sure of that.

The COURT. The court will hold you to that promise, then. Proceed, Mr. Wilson.

HON. JEREMIAH M. WILSON

then addressed the jury on behalf of the defense, as follows:

If your honor please, and gentlemen of the jury: In the celebrated trial of the impeachment of President Andrew Johnson, Mr. Manager Bingham, referring to the argument of Mr. Evarts, said that he had sought to make it immortal by making it eternal. Some malicious newspaper paragrapher, referring to the opening, for that is what lawyers call the preliminary argument before the jury in a case, was mean enough to say that there was nothing on earth to which it could be compared unless it was to the crater of Vesuvius. If length of speech will give a lawyer fame, certainly the learned gentlemen who have preceded me have made their names immortal. But those arguments have not been too long, gentlemen, if the purpose is, I will not say to misrepresent and distort the evidence in the case, but to mislead jurors as to the facts of the case. If this be the purpose these arguments have not been too long.

I say to you, gentlemen, at the outset, that but for the fact, as it seemed to me, that the testimony in this case has been grossly distorted and perverted for the purpose of misleading this jury in the end, I should not have felt called upon to say one word to this jury. On the contrary, I should have insisted that this case should go to the jury without argument, so far as my client is concerned. And now, for your comfort and encouragement, gentlemen of the jury, I beg to assure you, in the beginning, that I shall not seek immortality in the length of what I have to say, although I may not be as brief as I hope to be in the discussion of this case. Having given patient attention for so long a time to the dry details of this case, and having been entertained for fourteen long days by argument on behalf of the Government, I feel, gentlemen, that I ought to extend to you my most profound sympathy, in that you have now to listen to me, and I hope that I may have your sympathy while I discharge, as best I can, in a plain way, the duty that is imposed upon me. I am, gentlemen of the jury, the pioneer, so to speak, on behalf of the defense in the argument of the case. I have no flowers to strew. If I can cut down some of the brush that has grown up in this wilderness and let in some light my task will be done. The flowers and the fruit will come in due time hereafter. When you feel a little nervous and restive over what you must endure from me I beg you to look down the line of those who are to come after me, and take comfort from the anticipation of pleasures that are to be yours. I know I can promise you that when you reach the further end of that line occupied by my distinguished friend, Mr. Merrick, your vexed ears will be soothed and your souls will be charmed with rhetorical periods such as only can come from his fertile imagination and his oily and agile tongue.

Gentlemen, I had supposed, in a case like this, which has been loudly proclaimed and widely advertised as being a case so overwhelming against these defendants, that after all these months of listening to the evidence, and that within the four volumes comprising the testimony that has been brought before you there could have been enough found to occupy the attention of counsel for the Government and furnish material for argument, and that a weary, a long-suffering, and overtaxed, though a patient jury, would not be called upon to listen to, nor would counsel for the defense be called upon to answer, matters neither in the evidence nor having any bearing whatever upon the issues being tried before you. I presume, for the purpose of arousing some prejudice in somebody's mind against somebody, Mr. Ker took occasion to tell you how much, in the way of fees, the several attorneys for these defendants had exacted from their clients. He told you that he had got this valuable information from a newspaper. I may say to you that its first appearance, so far as I know, was in a Philadelphia newspaper. Mr. Ker lives in Philadelphia, and if I were to apply to that the same kind of logic that these gentlemen are applying to this case, I might possibly convince you that he either inserted it or inspired it as the foundation of an argument against these defendants, or possibly to break the force of the developments by a certain Senator in open Senate as to the fees and perquisites that are being paid to counsel on the other side. By the same kind of evidence I could show you that the Government has expended more than $600,000 in the prosecution of this case. But I do not see how that would shed any light on the guilt or innocence of these accused parties. The point he seemed to make was that the defendants had robbed the Government, and therefore it was right that their attorneys should in turn rob them. He assumed the first and proved the second of these assertions by the newspapers. Now, gentlemen, I am not going to believe that chaff such as this blown into your ears by the wind of long-winded oratory is going to prejudice your minds or affect your judgments in this case. I only mention it as a specimen of the extremes to which the prosecution will go in this case, and to say, as I think I ought to say, that so far as I am concerned this statement is not true. I have received no such fees from my client, and if it will be any comfort to him in his other tribulations, I will say that I expect no such fees from my client. What I do get is no concern of this prosecution or anybody else, nor is it any of my business what is paid to them or what incidentals they get, great or small.

Now, gentlemen, I want to bring your attention to another feature of this fourteen days of argument to which you have listened. It is the dealing with petty, trivial, insignificant, inconsequential things instead of coming squarely up to the very issue in this case. Let me illustrate by one or two references. Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey, as you will remember, said in his testimony in chief that he never exchanged three words with Moore in his life. Of course everybody knew that that was a mere figurative expression, but Mr. Ker read it to you with awful solemnity and recurred to it over and over again, and Mr. Bliss renewed it, I will not undertake to say how many times, and then Mr. Ker turned over to an answer that was made by Mr. Dorsey in which it appeared that a remark that he made to Moore could not possibly have been given in less than six words. He held that up to you as a self-contradiction by Mr. Dorsey in respect of his testimony in this case. Another illustration: My Brother Ker, in trying to find something to say against General Brady, in hunting around for circumstances and indications of guilt on the part of my client, most bravely and solemnly told you that one of the strong evidences of his guilt was that in the hot summer months of June and July he was here in the city of Washington at his official post. The President and his Cabinet and all the high officers of this Government were away in the mountains or at the seashore; Brady alone was at his post, and therefore he must have been concocting some sort of devilment with Stephen W. Dorsey or somebody else. To such things as these, over and over again, your attention has been invited in this case. How much that kind of argument has cost the Government of the United States I am unable to say. I am not as good in mathematics as my Brother Ker and my Brother Bliss, but if I were to enter into a neat calculation I think we would find that the presentation of just such things as these has cost this Government a great many thousands of dollars and this jury a great deal of valuable time. Mr. Bliss, after spending two years of hard labor, two years of valuable time in this case, and after incubating during the seven days of my Brother Ker's speech, comes to you with a whole brood of bantams, the united crowing of all of which never can disturb the atmosphere of this case. Why, he has spoken to you by the hour about a matter of this kind. He took up that famous memorandum and he said to you, "Here is Turner's name on it under an alias and Brady's name under an alias. John H. Mitchell's name is there, too. Why did not these gentlemen of the defense summon John H. Mitchell and prove that he never received any money from Stephen W. Dorsey?" Suppose, gentlemen of the jury, that Stephen W. Dorsey had stolen every dollar out of the Treasury of the United States and paid it to John H. Mitchell. How much would that affect this case? What bearing would it have upon this case? Don't you know, gentlemen of the jury, that when Mr. Turner was upon the stand we wanted to prove that although his name figured there under an alias, as they say, no farthing of money had ever come to him. The court said that was not competent testimony. Do you not know that when Belford, whose name had been used under the initials J. B. B. by the witness Rerdell, was on the stand, and we offered to prove that there was no word of truth in it, the court said "No; it is not material in this case?" Yet these gentlemen have the unblushing audacity to come here and say to this jury that because we did not repeat that attempt with Mitchell, whom they say was in the court-house, it was an indication of our guilt, although the court had ruled that the testimony was not competent. How many times did they come back upon us and say, "Why didn't you put Pelham on the stand?" You asked a great many questions as to Pelham, and you were answered in the negative. Why did you not put Pelham on the stand and prove that the answers were not true?" Why, gentlemen of the jury, you know as well as I know that the same class of questions precisely that were put in respect of Pelham were put in respect of Betts. We brought Betts upon the stand and the court said, "Gentlemen of the defense, this is not material to the case." And yet, because we did not repeat it with Pelham, Colonel Bliss comes here and by the hour dins into your ears that it is an evidence of guilt upon the part of these defendants. The gentlemen of the prosecution have been heaping up adjectives in order to impress your minds with the enormous magnitude of these defendants as offenders against the law. For one, I do not believe that my Brother Bliss or my Brother Ker can, by fishing in this ocean with pin-hooks, catch any whales, and therefore as I go forward I shall not stop to vex your minds in answering these trivial things further than will be necessary to properly characterize this prosecution as I understand it.

Let me give you another illustration now of the manner in which these gentlemen have distorted and perverted this testimony, I may say misrepresented this testimony. How many times did these gentlemen say to you, although knowing that you had heard the testimony in this case and must have some familiarity with it, that General Brady had cut all the service down one trip. Mr. Ker said that that was a move by which he bribed Congress, that is to say that he cut it down one trip all over the country and thereupon he forced members of Congress into passing a certain bill of which I will have occasion to speak before I get through. Now, gentlemen, was there ever any such order as that made? None has been produced in evidence before you, not one. Gentlemen, there can be no pretense from the evidence that any such order was ever made. I mention it to show you how weak and shallow is the foundation upon which this case rests. What was the foundation for that argument, gentlemen of the jury? It was this, and nothing more: Mr. Miner, it seems, wrote a letter or circular and sent it out to the subcontractors upon the routes that he represented; and what does he say? He says:

DEAR SIR: By a general order of the Postmaster-General issued to-day, all mail service, except railway and steamboat, will be reduced to one trip per week, commencing March 1, 1880. [Page 669.]

An order of the Postmaster-General, and that one thing alone is the foundation for all this assertion that my client had cut down this service to one trip a week over all of the ten thousand star routes in this country. These gentlemen say to you that General Brady cut it down to one trip a week in order to force Congress into the passage of the law, and the only foundation for it is just what I have read, and there is not a syllable of testimony beyond that. And because Mr. Miner wrote that the Postmaster-General had made an order, they say to you that General Brady did make an order, and they ask you upon that to infer that he had been violating the law.

I give you another illustration, gentlemen, in just this connection. Mr. Bliss said to you, in talking and arguing to you about these books, that Mr. Dorsey had contradicted himself in his testimony, because, while he was all along denying that there were any such books as Rerdell had spoken of, yet Mr. Dorsey, to use his expression, by an inadvertence admitted that there were such books. That attracted the attention of the court, you remember. Let us see what it is, and see how they twist, torture, and distort this testimony. He says, at page 3980:

Q. You say that he told you that all this was false and you believed it?—A. Yes, sir; his own telegrams show that.

Q. I have not asked you to construe them. His own telegram says that the affidavit story is a lie?—A. Yes, sir; and that he had been faithful to every trust.

That is what the telegram said:

And yet he had a stolen book under his arm.

Q. He had?

Says Mr. Merrick.

A. According to his statement.

You will perceive that Mr. Dorsey was simply expressing the character of this statement of Rerdell's. He was simply saying to Mr. Merrick that when Mr. Rerdell sent that telegram, that he had been faithful to every trust, according to his own statement he had a stolen book of Dorsey's under his arm. And yet Colonel Bliss stands here and argues to you for half an hour that Dorsey has admitted that he had that book, and that Rerdell had stolen it and carried it away.

Gentlemen, I pass from these things, and I am going to take it for granted that stuff such as this is not going to control your judgments in coming to a conclusion in respect of the guilt or innocence of these defendants. It will be my purpose in what I say to you to address myself to the substance of this case as the Government has made it by this indictment. My client wants to meet this charge in a manly way. He wants me to meet it, if I can, in a manly way. He asks nothing from you that any citizen may not ask, namely, that when he is charged with an offense against the law he may be tried for that offense according to the law, and be judged impartially. Beyond that he makes no appeal to you. Beyond that I make no appeal to you for him. Beyond that he makes no demand of you. Beyond that I make no demand of you for him or any other of these defendants. As to the others, of course, I have no right to speak. While everything that is dear to him on earth—home, family, reputation, ay, liberty itself—is involved in this issue, he is willing to abide by the coldest of the cold steel of the law. If that condemns him, let him be condemned, but not otherwise.

I would, gentlemen of the jury, that I could persuade myself that such is the spirit of this prosecution. Mr. Ker, in the beginning of his argument, said when addressing you, and I repeat his precise words, "You"—you jurors he means—"you have been selected from the mass of the people to represent them, and you"—you jurors—"have been brought here, the representatives of the entire community," and so on for quantity. Gentlemen, that is not my understanding of your position in this case. You represent nobody. You are here because you represent neither the Government nor the people—which is but another name for the Government—nor any community, nor the defendants. You represent nobody. Justice is painted blind. "Blind Justice" is an expressive phrase. Painters and sculptors have represented it in the form of a woman—modesty and purity—blindfolded, seeing neither the one party nor the other, indifferent between them; seeing neither the strong nor the weak, the exalted nor the lowly; holding in her hands the scales balanced with exact evenness, in which to weigh with scrupulous nicety the evidence pro and con. Such is your position, and not that of representatives.

And what, gentlemen, are you permitted to cast into these scales which you hold in your hands? Anything but evidence? I trust not. In the beginning you said you would try this cause according to the law and the evidence. Anything more? No. Is popular clamor to be cast into the scales? No. Are the irresponsible utterances of editors and correspondents to be placed in this balance? No.

I beg, gentlemen of the jury, to read something that seems to be very instructive upon this subject, and I refer to the charge of Judge Dillon in a celebrated case (The United States vs. Babcock), which is to be found at page 622 of 3 Dillon:

No popular or partisan clamors, no extraneous wishes or considerations, no thoughts other than those which pertain to strictly impartial justice, can be permitted to invade the sanctity of the jury-room, to bias or warp or even shade its deliberations, without destruction of the safeguard to life, liberty, and property furnished through trial by jury. It has been often and forcibly said, that so long as trials by jury retain their full force, impartiality, and purity, the liberty and rights of the citizens are alike safe against despotism and anarchy.

Suggestive words in this case.

If popular clamor usurp the judgment seat, the era of Marats and Robespierres will return, and frenzied faction sweep away all justice and right. So will justice be gradually undermined if outside influences are suffered insidiously to enter within that threshold where naught should be known save the sworn evidence in the case, and the rules of law as pronounced by the court—rules which the experience and wisdom of ages have demonstrated to be essential to the ascertainment of truth and the due administration of justice.

It will be a sad and shameful day for this country when courts and juries, having lost their independence, shall sit simply to register the edict of popular opinion to acquit this man or convict that one.

So, I say, gentlemen, it would be a sad and shameful day if this jury should sit here as representatives of somebody or should allow to creep into their minds to affect their judgment aught save the sworn testimony that has been delivered in your presence.

Mr. Bliss, in conclusion, said that "the eyes of the country are concentrated upon you." What care you, independent jurors, for the eyes of the country? The ears of the country have not heard this testimony. They have heard garbled extracts. They know nothing of its details. They know nothing of the spirit, the essence of this case. And are you to be affected by the fact that the eyes of the country are concentrated upon you? I will not believe it, gentlemen of the jury.

Gentlemen, does this prosecution appeal to you to stand with stern impartiality between this great and powerful Government and these its citizens, whom it has accused? Let me read to you what kind of an appeal the Government has made to you. Mr. Ker, in the conclusion of his speech, at page 4748, said to you:

Stand up like men, fearlessly and faithfully, and assist the Government in the effort it is now making to bring these guilty men to punishment.

"Assist the Government!" That is the Government's appeal to you. Gentlemen, I appeal to you to be jurors, twelve separate, independent men, not here to assist either the claimant or prosecution, but to weigh and sift this evidence, and each for himself, as it is your duty to do, to make up the verdict upon this issue.

I say to you that the Government has made a charge against these defendants; that they are presumed to be innocent of that charge; that the burden rests upon the Government to prove them guilty of that charge; and I only appeal to you to allow nothing but the evidence to touch your minds in forming your judgment upon that charge.

Now, gentlemen, I proceed a step further, and I assert affirmatively that the Government does not want and has not sought a fair and impartial trial of this case. On the trial there has been disclosed, right here in your presence, a trick, a fraud, a conspiracy—the most base and wicked that ever disgraced any judicial proceeding—to injure these accused parties. The story can be briefly told, gentlemen. One of the parties, whose testimony I shall have occasion to speak of hereafter, ostensibly entered upon the defense along with the other defendants in this case. At the former trial his honor had ruled that each of these defendants was entitled to four challenges, and the Government to four only. Nobody supposed that any other rule would prevail on this trial, and we find that a bargain was made with this man that he should sit with the defendants, apparently one of them, and that he should challenge from the jury four persons in the interest of the Government, and thus give to the Government, by this most infamous device, eight challenges instead of four, and thus keep the defendants out of four to which they were entitled under the law. Oh, talk about jury-fixers! Jury fixers! There is a specimen of jury-fixing that ought to put everybody to shame.

Mr. KER. I ask counsel to give the page upon which that testimony is found.

Mr. DAVIDGE. It is in Rerdell's testimony.

The COURT. I should like to see that.

Mr. DAVIDGE. It is in the record.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will show it. I will show that they made such a bargain. On page 2521, if the court please:

Q. Had you any agreement with Mr. Woodward, or with any other person acting on behalf of the prosecution, covering the question as to what you would do in the matter of challenging jurors?—A. No, sir; I never had a conversation on that subject with Mr. Woodward in my life.

Q. Had you agreed that if the court allowed each defendant to challenge four, you would challenge any four the Government might select for you to challenge?—A. I sent word myself, or at least I told Mr. Blackmar, I was willing to do that, to show my good faith to the Government.

Q. At the same time that you were sitting with the defendants as a codefendant?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You told Mr. Blackmar you were willing, if the court allowed you, to challenge four men; to challenge the four that the Government should suggest?—A. No, sir; not that the Government would suggest; that Mr. Blackmar would give me.

Q. You understood that he was on the side of the prosecution?—A. Oh, certainly.

Q. Do you now tell the jury that you at that time made that proposition?—A. I think I did.

Q. Did you afterwards endeavor to carry it out?—A. I did.

Q. Did you while sitting with the other defendants tell them that you would in good faith try to challenge four men that you thought might be friendly to the defendants?—A. I did.

Q. When did you first have a conversation with Mr. Blackmar?—A. About the commencement of the trial. [Correcting himself.] No, sir; he was present with Mr. Woodward, at the Hamilton House, in September.

Q. After you got out of jail?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. After the court decided that the defendants were not entitled to four challenges each, did you endeavor to carry out your contract and challenge one of the four that you had agreed to challenge for the prosecution?—A. I did.

Q. Did you not at that time insist in open court upon having your challenge to that man?—A. My attorney did.

Q. Did you not say that particular man that you wished to challenge was a personal enemy of yours?—A. I did not. In court? No, sir, for I said not a word in court except to my counsel.

Q. Did you go into consultation with the defendants upon the subject of challenges?—A. I did.

* * * * *

Q. After making that bargain, or that proposition, and carrying it out the best you could, did you have another conversation with Mr. Blackmar?—A. I did.

Q. On the subject of your testifying?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did you have a conversation with him in which you said that you thought it would be much better for you to sit with the defendants until the trial was nearly over and then go over to the Government?—A. I don't remember any such conversation with Mr. Blackmar at all.

Q. Do you say now that you did not tell him so?—A. I don't think I did; I don't remember it.

I think that is all.

The COURT. I remember something to that general purport.

Mr. INGERSOLL. It is the bargain he made to sit with the defendants and challenge their friends on the jury.

Mr. KER. Unlike my friend, Mr. Davidge, I have not objected to Mr. Ingersoll reading it; but, when reading it, I think he should read the whole of it. Inasmuch as the counsel has read those portions in which, of course, the prosecuting officers are concerned, I think he ought to read the whole testimony upon that subject, in fairness, without leaving out that part of it which is not favorable to himself.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I was told that that was all of it. I have not read it myself for a long time.

The COURT. If any omission has been made you can supply it.

Mr. DAVIDGE. We are perfectly willing.

Mr. KER. The next question is——

Mr. INGERSOLL. [Interposing.] What page?

Mr. KER. 2522, the same page where you were reading:

Q. Did you have a conversation with him in which he said that he thought it would be much better for you to sit with the defendants until the trial was nearly over and then go over to the Government?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I read that.

Mr. KER. You read that portion?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I did, and the answer.

Mr. WILSON. Read on.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Read right on and you will come to something, may be.

The COURT. It is not worth while to read it if it has been read.

Mr. KER. [Reading:]

Q. Did you tell any other person connected with the prosecution in any way?—A. I did not; I don't remember of ever saying that to any one of them. I had no communication whatever except with Mr. Blackmar and with Mr. Woodward; I met him once or twice.

Q. Did you communicate with the Government through Mr. Blackmar?—A. I did not.

Q. You only communicated with him?—A. That is all.

Q. You do not know whether it went any further than to him?—A. I have not the remotest idea what he did with it.

Q. How many times did you meet Mr. Woodward in relation to this business during the progress of this trial, before you went on the stand?—A. Two or three times.

Q. Where?—A. I met him at 214 G street, northwest, in this city.

Q. Did Mr. Woodward know that you had made an agreement to challenge the four jurors that might be mentioned by the Government?—A. Never, to my knowledge.

The WITNESS. I want to correct that number: 224 G street, I think, is the number, instead of 214.

Q. Whose room?—A. Mr. Blackmar's room.

Q. Were Blackmar and Woodward together there?—A. They were not.

Q. You never saw them together there?—A. Not that I remember. They may have been together there at one time for a few minutes.

Q. Is that where Mr. Blackmar resides?—A. I think so.

Then it goes on in the same way. He makes a clear distinction between what is said in September to Blackmar, and his interview with Woodward which was for the purpose of taking his testimony.

Mr. CARPENTER. Not at all in September; it was after the trial began.

The COURT. I understood that it related to some period after this trial began.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Certainly it did.

Mr. INGERSOLL. While the trial was going on.

The COURT. Proceed.

Mr. WILSON. [Resuming.] Gentlemen of the jury, you will observe that I did not say that that bargain was made with the learned attorneys for the Government. I said that that bargain was a bargain with the Government that is prosecuting this case. But I have been listening here ever since that testimony came out for these learned gentlemen to disclaim any knowledge of that thing, and I have not heard it yet.

Mr. INGERSOLL. They did not call Mr. Blackmar, either.

Mr. WILSON. I watched for Mr. Blackmar to come upon the stand to explain about this matter, but he was not brought upon the stand. And I want to say that the responsibility of this thing does not rest upon Mr. Blackmar, in my judgment. There are other Government officials in this town, plenty of them, who could make this infamous bargain without these attorneys even knowing anything about it.

Now, gentlemen, I say that that was a piece of unparalleled infamy. He tried to carry out that wicked scheme, and when the court ruled that all the defendants together could only have four challenges, and the Government could have the like number, under this agreement he sought to give and the Government to take one of the defendants' challenges, and thereby to give to the defendants but three, depriving them of one by fraud, and giving the Government five by this despicable and desperately wicked combination.

The COURT. I want to understand now about that. He made but one challenge.

Mr. DAVIDGE. You understand the first part of it, that he undertook to use four challenges in the interest of the Government. Now, your honor ruled that each defendant had not four challenges, but that they all counted as one. Then the impaneling of the jury went on, and after that ruling he sought to have against the other defendants the benefit of one challenge. He openly, through his counsel, challenged a party called as a juror, but that challenge was overruled upon the ground that he could not exercise the right without acting in concert with his codefendants.

Mr. WILSON. He said he tried to carry out the bargain.

The COURT. The amount of it is this: That he exercised no effective challenge in the case.

Mr. INGERSOLL. No.

Mr. DAVIDGE. No, sir.

The COURT. He attempted to exercise the challenge in one instance, but the court prohibited him from using that challenge.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes, sir.

The COURT. My mind is somewhat relieved as to the constitution of the jury by that fact.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The point was exactly this, if the court please: at the last trial the court, I think, gave each of the defendants four challenges.

The COURT. Yes.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Supposing that that would be the holding of the court at this trial, the bargain was made with him that he would sit with the defendants and use his four challenges for the Government, but after hearing argument the court concluded that it was impossible to harmonize those statutes and give to each defendant four challenges, and so you said you would consider all the defendants one party and give them four challenges. He then endeavored to challenge off one man, not imagining that all the defendants had to agree, whereas the court held that they had to agree in challenging.

The COURT. Very well; then he attempted to exercise his right of challenge for cause in one instance.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes; he did not do any harm.

The COURT. His cause was overruled.

Mr. CARPENTER. It was a peremptory challenge.

The COURT. My impression was that he thought that the juror challenged by him had some personal ill-will towards him, and that he said so.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Nothing of that kind was brought out.

The COURT. Whether it was the one or the other, the challenge was not effectual.

Mr. DAVIDGE. That is so.

The COURT. So that if it was conspiracy, it was conspiracy without the overt act.

Mr. INGERSOLL. It was a bargain as foolish as it was wicked.

The COURT. It was an ineffectual thing; it was not very creditable to Rerdell.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Nor to the Government.

The COURT. To the agent of the Government, or whoever it was.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The Government acts through its agents.

The COURT. He has not produced any Government commission here, and he may have gone beyond the line of his authority. I certainly do not think that any man in the employ of the Government would be authorized to attempt an act of that sort. I am a good deal relieved by the explanation that the attempt was unsuccessful.

Mr. CARPENTER. We are not complaining about the construction of the jury.

Mr. WILSON. No.

Now, gentlemen of the jury, understand me. I have not said that this scheme was accomplished. I have not said that that infamous crime that was attempted was completed. I have not said nor intimated, and I know it is not so. I happen to know that it is not so, because I sat at the table when the jury was being made up, and when that very thing was going on.

But that was not my point at all. My point is that the Government has not been seeking a fair and impartial trial of this case, and that some of its agents—they can clear their skirts when they will—made this bargain to pack this jury against these defendants. That was my point. Now, talk about conspiracy. Here is one, brazen-faced, unparalleled in its iniquity—a conspiracy to deprive a citizen of his legal rights when accused of a grave crime; a conspiracy against the character, the liberty of accused citizens; a conspiracy against justice; a conspiracy against the Constitution of this country, which guarantees to every man who is accused of crime the right of trial before twelve impartial men. And this great Government conspires to deprive a citizen of these constitutional rights. It is a conspiracy to which the attention of the proper officer of the Government might well be attracted with great profit to the good name of American justice.

Mr. KER. I presume from your honor's knowledge—

The COURT. [Interposing.] The Government will have the right to answer this in conclusion.

Mr. KER. I want to call the attention of the court to the misinterpretation of the evidence. I presume from your honor's knowledge of the gentlemen engaged in the prosecution there would be no disclaimer required. But I say now, on my own behalf and on behalf of the other gentlemen associated with me, that we never knew of such a conversation, good, bad, or indifferent. And if the counsel will still not draw the line of distinction that the evidence points out, I warn him now that he shall receive from that counsel for the Government who shall reply a rejoinder such as he shall deserve. It will be unmerciful.

Mr. WILSON. I will endeavor, gentlemen, to bear whatever is in store for me in the future. And yet I want to say right here, that I have never said that these counsel had anything to do with it or knew anything about it.

The COURT. But, Mr. Wilson, you did say a few minutes ago that you had not heard any disclaimer from the Government counsel.

Mr. WILSON. Neither had I at that time, and I was just now going to say, if I had not been interrupted, that I am much gratified to hear the counsel disclaim it now.

Mr. KER. It will be more gratifying not to believe it.

Mr. WILSON. If I had not been interrupted I was going to say that I am glad it is now disclaimed, and though I expected to hear them disclaim it at the time the evidence came out, I did not.

The COURT. The re-examination disproved it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. It does not appear for whom Blackmar was acting.

The COURT. The evidence confines the conversation to Blackmar, and does not even extend to Woodward. [To Mr. Wilson.] Go on.

Mr. WILSON. Rerdell said he did not know anything about where it went after the arrangement was made between him and Blackmar, and that is the way it was left by the testimony. I have never said or intimated that these counsel for the prosecution knew anything about it.

Now, gentlemen, I ask you does that look to you as though the Government was seeking in this case the fair and impartial administration of the law? Does that indicate to you a desire on the part of the Government to vindicate the law? On the contrary, as it seems to me, it has placed an indelible stamp of wickedness upon this prosecution. And now, finding upon it this foul and ineffaceable blot, they ask you to assist them. They ask you to tie yourselves to this putrid and polluted carcass, and to gloss over this shame by a verdict against these defendants.

I am not arguing, gentlemen, that because of this you should find these defendants not guilty, if the evidence proves them guilty; not at all. But I do argue that it should induce you to scrutinize every feature of this case as presented by the Government, with a view to the protection of the defendants against any violations of their rights under the law. I do argue that not only you are not in any case to assist the prosecution, but especially in this case, where you know there is a disposition on the part of the Government to resort to means so base in order to secure a conviction. Knowing, as you do, this disposition on the part of the prosecution, may I not ask you—while I know I cannot entertain you—to listen to me while I go through with this case and attempt to prove to you that the charge against the defendants, and especially against my client, is wholly unsupported by proof?

But before I proceed with this, indulge me, please, in one further observation. We have reached a stage of this case where you are supreme. Here is a domain into which none can enter but you. You are the judges of what the evidence proves. You are the exclusive judges; and there is no power on this earth that may rightfully invade that domain. It is said by one that you are the judges of both the law and the evidence. Others say that you must take the law as the court gives it to you. And while I am inclined to the first proposition, yet I shall not now either affirm or deny either of these propositions. But I do affirm, and so long as I can be permitted to participate in legal affairs I shall contend, that as to the facts you, and you alone, are the judges. Each of you, as to those, must judge for himself. It takes the concurrence of twelve independent minds to make a verdict. That is the life and spirit, the soul and body, of the jury system.

While his honor may claim to guide you as to the law, he cannot claim and will not claim the right to control you in the slightest degree as to what the evidence in this case proves. Whether he will assume the right to comment upon the evidence I do not know. But if he does, your individual judgments are superior to his. You are in no sense bound to accept his judgment or adopt his suggestions in this respect; and I ask you, as I have a right to do, that you shall each in this case assert and exercise this supreme right of a juror.

Now, gentlemen, in order to make clear the matters that I shall have occasion to present to you, it is necessary that I shall make one or two preliminary statements on two different subjects.

First. A great deal of testimony has been admitted before you in this case, as has been stated by the court from time to time, for the purpose of showing the association of these parties with each other. You will bear in mind that the star-route service comprehends at least ten thousand mail routes, running in all directions throughout the country. You have learned enough in this case to know that the carrying of mails on these routes is something which men engage in as a business; that firms or copartnerships are organized for the purpose of carrying on this business of transporting the mails; that single individuals also engage in it as a regular business, as, for example, in the case of Mr. Vaile, who, it appears from the testimony in this case, has been thus engaged for perhaps twenty years. These firms and individuals thus making this a business bid on a large number of routes at the lettings by the department, and procure sometimes a very large number of contracts at such lettings; as, for example, you find that Mr. Boone had at one time a thousand or eleven hundred of these routes.

By the way, I might say here in passing, that they have said to you that Boone never had one route expedited. Boone's routes were in the old, settled regions of the country, where the service was established and fixed.

The routes that they thus acquire contracts for they either perform themselves or sublet them to others, just as any other business is conducted, and upon the same principles and for the same purpose, to wit, to make money. There is nothing in this business of carrying the mails that is reprehensible. It is just as honorable as any other; it is a business into which any man in this country may enter. It is a business necessary to be conducted for the general welfare and business interests of the country. It is just as legitimate a business as any other, and no inference is to be drawn against any man because of his engaging in it; nor any inference to be drawn against any number of men who may associate themselves together as partners for the purpose of engaging in this, a legitimate business.

The first we know of any of these gentlemen coming together—to go to the very beginning of it—is early in 1877. Miner spoke to Peck, or Peck to Miner, in relation to joining for the purpose of engaging in this occupation. From all that appears in the testimony in this case it was a mere casual conversation. It also seems that Peck and John W. Dorsey had likewise had a conversation on the same subject; and it further appears that Peck and John W. Dorsey came to the conclusion that they would engage in this business, and that they communicated with Stephen W. Dorsey (then a Senator of the United States) on the subject. And unless you absolutely disbelieve Stephen W. Dorsey and John W. Dorsey, and that, too, without a word of testimony to contradict either of them on this subject, Stephen W. Dorsey was opposed to their engaging in this business. But, notwithstanding his opposition, they determined to proceed, as they had a right to proceed, and they requested him to secure the services of some one who understood and was competent to do all the work that was necessary to be done preliminary to making proposals, taking contracts, and so on. Stephen W. Dorsey recommended them to secure the co-operation of Mr. Miner, and in some way or other communicated with Miner, on behalf of John W. Dorsey and Mr. Peck, and pursuant to that Miner came to Washington.

Prior to Miner's coming here, and pursuant to a request made by a letter from John W. Dorsey for Mr. Peck, Stephen W. Dorsey had procured the services of Mr. Boone. Boone was an experienced contractor. Boone had for a long time been in the service of the department. He was familiar with the details of all this business, and his services were procured by Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey for John Dorsey and Peck, at the instance and request of either the one or the other of them.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Peck.

Mr. WILSON. Boone, of his own motion—mark you, tells you, not at the suggestion of Stephen W. Dorsey, but knowing, himself, from experience, and observation as well, what was needed to bid intelligently—prepared and had printed and sent out circulars addressed to postmasters throughout the region of country where the routes were located upon which bids were to be made, seeking information as to the character of the country, the roads, prices of grain, and so on, just such information, mark you, gentlemen, as business men would need to acquire in order to make proposals for carrying the mails. Proposals were prepared, sureties were procured, and the proposals were filed in the department in the usual way. Precautions were taken, just as they are taken by all bidders for such service, to prevent other bidders from knowing the amounts that were to be bid by these parties. Do you remember what Boone told you in regard to that, that it was the practice of all these bidders upon all these various routes to keep their bids separate from each other, so that no one could know what another was doing? Unless it is unusual for men to associate themselves together in business enterprises, and unless there is something unusual in bidders keeping secret the amount of their bids, there is nothing unusual or suspicious in all this. It seems to me to be impossible that thus far anything can be found from which an unlawful combination can be inferred. They made bids on more than a thousand of these routes. They were the lowest bidders on about one hundred and thirty. The bids were made as was usual in such cases, in the names of the several individuals composing this business firm or combination; the contracts were awarded to them, and the service on these contracts was to begin on the 1st of July, 1878. Now, gentlemen, I am not going to stop at this point to comment upon all that has been testified to in regard to Miner's having a room in Dorsey's house; in regard to Dorsey's getting bonds for these parties, and so on, and so forth. Other counsel, who will come after me, will discuss those questions so far as they have any bearing upon this case. I have given you thus a brief statement, but I think a very accurate one, of the main features of this business up to the awarding of the contracts? I beg you now to review in your minds the entire field of this testimony from the beginning to the point which we have reached, and look into every nook and corner of it and see if you can find anywhere in it all the slightest shade or shadow of proof to indicate that General Brady had any knowledge or intimation whatever that John W. Dorsey, John R. Miner, John M. Peck, and Boone were engaged in this enterprise; were making, or proposing to make, any proposal; were sending out any circulars for information, or doing any one of the things, small or great, which were done by these gentlemen during the period to which I have just alluded. I beg you also, gentlemen, to search and scrutinize this testimony throughout all its length and breadth and see if you can find any trace anywhere of General Brady's having any knowledge whatever that Stephen W. Dorsey had any relations to or with the transactions and the parties of whom I have spoken in connection with this business. I assert, and I am sure that you will entirely agree with me, that there is not a shadow of proof that he had the slightest knowledge or information that these parties were thus engaged and proposed to bid for these contracts.

Now, I pass to my second preliminary statement, which it seems to me it is necessary to make in order that you may clearly comprehend this case, because after all, gentlemen, I hope to show you before we get through that this is really a very simple case and that much that has been put into the case is only befogging it and of no usefulness in it. The Post-Office Department is a branch of the Executive department of this Government. It has charge and control of the postal affairs of the entire country. It will be well for you to remember that the business of the Post-Office Department is not simply the matter of carrying the mails over separate and distinct mail routes, but that the mails are to be carried as a system. It is not like the case of individuals running stage lines or express lines for accommodation in the different sections of the country. It is not like a contractor building a house here and another house there, a mill yonder and something else somewhere else, each one a separate and distinct enterprise and each one having no special relation to the others. It is a vast system intended to be, and to be efficient necessary to be, a harmonious whole, every part working in absolute harmony with every other part, railroad service, steamboat service and star service, all working in unison, running in every conceivable direction in the most remote parts of the country. If the service is efficient, working as one harmonious whole, a letter starting from Washington, New York, Philadelphia, or anywhere, from city or hamlet, goes speedily, certainly, promptly, and securely to its destination, wherever that destination may be. The center of this vast system is the Post-Office Department, which is, as I have said, a branch of the Executive department of this Government. From the Post-Office Department the business of this vast system is managed. Through it all contracts are made for carrying the service, all contracts for supplies connected with the service, and all matters regulating the arrivals and departures of the mails of this great and complicated network are arranged and conducted. Post-offices are established, the supply of mail service to such post-offices provided for, and so on in endless detail. One of the branches of this vast department is what is known as the contract office, and that is presided over by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General. The contract office is charged with the business of making contracts for all the service in the entire country, steamboat, railroad, and star. It is charged with the business of seeing that the contracts are performed, and of imposing the necessary fines and deductions in case of the non-performance of the service by any contractor, no matter where his route may be or how great or insignificant it may be. This contract office is divided up into divisions and sections. It has its heads of divisions who are responsible for the proper performance of the various duties that are to be performed in each particular division. There is as you know a division of the country into sections, and there is in this contract office a section corresponding to or having charge of the routes in each particular section of the country. These sections in this contract office are presided over by an official known as a corresponding clerk who has charge of the details of the various matters pertaining to the service in his particular section. There is also in this office what is known as the inspection division, and this division has charge of the matters of fines and deductions. In other words, the postmasters throughout the country at the terminal offices—that is to say, the offices at each end of the route—are required month by month to make reports to the inspection division of the arrivals and departures of the mails, to the end that if any of the mails shall fail to depart at the proper time or to arrive at the proper time deductions shall be made from the pay of the contractor correspondingly. Don't you see, gentlemen of the jury, when you come to look into the structure and the organization of this office how it bears out just what I said a moment ago? Here are these routes all connected with each other. It is intended that they shall be a harmonious system. If any contractor fails to carry the mail according to his contract, according to the schedule that has been laid down for him, the result of it is a disarrangement of the mails, and the consequence is that the regulations of the department provide, and every contractor expects, that if he does not start promptly and arrive promptly he is to suffer a pecuniary penalty for that failure. Likewise, gentlemen, the postmasters report to this division any failure on the part of a contractor to properly care for the mail; and for any injuries done, or permitted to be done, fines are imposed. These reports from the postmasters are directed to this division, as you already know, and about which there is no dispute. I want to fix in your mind the fact that these reports as to the arrivals and departures, and as to failure on the part of contractors, go directly not to the Second Assistant, but to this inspection division, and are never seen by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General until the head of that inspection division has reported to him some case of delinquency on the part of some contractor. Whatever may be presented in the way of an application for the remission of fines and deductions that have been made also goes not to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, but directly to the head of this inspection division, and is never seen by the Second Assistant until carried to him by the head of that division; and in no case is a fine or deduction imposed until it has been recommended to the Second Assistant by the head of that inspection division by a written order prepared by the head of that inspection division upon the data which he has received from these postmasters in the manner that I have stated, and which written order is for the first time seen by the Second Assistant when it is brought to him for his signature. That is the first that he ever knows of it. After these postmasters in the far-off regions of the country have made their reports to this inspection division, and after the inspection division has gone through those reports, they make up a written order for the signature of the Second Assistant, and then for the first time these things come to his knowledge. The same is true precisely, gentlemen, as to applications for the remission of such fines and deductions. Let me go back a little in this case to the duties of the corresponding clerk and the mode of conducting this business so far as his part of it is concerned. The corresponding clerk prepares advertisements for the various lettings. In the advertisement the terminal points of the routes are named, the time of starting, the time of arriving is fixed, and the number of miles in length of the route is named; but the bidder is expressly notified that as to the accuracy of the length as stated he must be his own judge and must act upon his own responsibility. If it proves to be shorter than advertised that is his gain. If it proves to be longer than advertised that is his loss, and that risk as to length is assumed by him. If changes are made in the service on any route a circular is sent out by the corresponding clerk to the postmasters at the terminal points.

Now, I want to get that fixed in your minds, because we will have something to do with that hereafter. A new post-office is put on a route, for example, causing a deflection and an increase of distance. When that is done, the next thing is to send out what they call a distance circular. That is sent out by the corresponding clerk. It goes to every postmaster along the entire route. Each postmaster gives the distance from his office to the next office, and so on through. When it comes back to the Post-Office Department the corresponding clerk therefore knows the extent of the increase in the length of the route occasioned by this change in the service, and the corresponding clerk having this data before him, which is furnished him thus by the postmasters, makes up a formal order on the subject, and carries it to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General for his signature. First, however, it goes, I should say, to the chief clerk, who checks it, and whose check-mark is a guarantee to the Second Assistant that it is right. The Second Assistant then pro forma signs the order. When a new post-office is created, that is done by the First Assistant Postmaster-General, and not by the Second Assistant, who has nothing to do with the creation of new offices. Upon notice of the establishment of a new office to the Second Assistant, he makes the order that is necessary to supply that office with mail. The supply may be in one of two ways, either by placing that office on some route, which is done by an order to embrace it upon the route, or to supply it by a special supply, which is by employing some one to carry the mail from the office to some point on an established route. Please remember that as we go along. If the distance is increased, the contractor, by the terms of the contract, is to have an increase of compensation in proportion to the increased distance. If the other mode is adopted, that is to say, of having a special supply, then the party who makes that special supply is to be paid not exceeding two-thirds the salary received by the postmaster at the office which is thus to be supplied. This particular point will be further illustrated hereafter, when I come to speak of a special case, namely, the supply of the post-office at Raton, which, you will remember, was placed upon the route from Trinidad to Madison.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Your honor, this is a suitable time to stop for recess.

The COURT. We will take our recess now.

At this point (1 o'clock p. m.) the court took its usual recess.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. WILSON. [Resuming.] Gentlemen of the jury, I said to you before recess that when it became necessary to make any change as to arrivals and departures the postmasters were consulted by means of circulars addressed to them. This you will readily see is because it would be impossible in any other way to make the carriage of the mails throughout the country a systematic and harmonious whole. The postmasters, knowing the arrivals and departures of mails on other routes at their respective offices, can arrange this matter of arrivals and departures so as to make the whole system harmonious, which could not be done by the Post-Office Department direct. You will understand, gentlemen, that this is a part and parcel of a great system. Some means must be devised by which all this vast net-work can be run in harmony. You will readily see that if here in Washington they were to undertake to do that, there would be inextricable and endless confusion. How is that result accomplished, gentlemen? I want you to bear this in mind, because you will see after awhile that it is important. How is it accomplished? They send out what they call these distance circulars. The corresponding clerk sends them out to the postmasters, and the postmasters and the contractors fix up the schedules of arrivals and departures on the various routes. Having done that on a given route, the distance circular is returned to the department and then a formal order is entered upon the record fixing the arrival and departure in accordance with this distance circular. Those orders are signed pro forma by the Second Assistant. Of course no gentleman on this jury, no sensible man anywhere would have any expectation that the Second Assistant Postmaster-General could carry in his mind and arrange all the arrivals and departures, not only on these ten thousand star routes, but this great number of railroad routes and steamboat routes in connection with which this star-route system is operated. Before going into the details of this case allow me to go back to the beginning of this business, so far as the department is concerned. Please note that the very first thing that occurred, so far as the department is concerned, is the advertisement pursuant to which these routes were let. You will remember that at that time Major Ray P. Eaton was the corresponding clerk having in charge the section in which most of these routes lay. You will also remember that Mr. Brewer was the corresponding clerk in charge of the section in which some of the routes named in this indictment lay. Mr. Eaton prepared the advertisement for his section. Mr. Brewer prepared the advertisement for his section. The advertisement which was prepared by Major Eaton had been sent to the printer and was in process of being printed at the time when Major Eaton was transferred to another position and Mr. Turner became the corresponding clerk. Mr. Turner, after he became corresponding clerk, read the proof of the advertisement that had been prepared by Eaton. Mr. Brewer, as I have said, prepared the advertisement for his section. Although General Brady was at the head of that contract office as Second Assistant Postmaster-General, the preparation of these advertisements was the distinct duty of the corresponding clerks, and there is no pretense, so far as I can discover in this case, that there was anything improper or unusual in respect of these advertisements. Nobody has claimed that either Major Eaton or Mr. Turner or Mr. Brewer did anything that was improper in connection with these advertisements, nor is there any pretense that General Brady had anything to do with them. On the contrary, it appears that these advertisements were prepared after the usual method of doing that business. They were distributed everywhere to everybody that wanted to bid on this mail service. They were published in pamphlet form. You have had them here before you, making quite a volume. They were published for the express purpose of inviting the enterprising people of this country to come in and take part in this bidding; to come in and engage in this legitimate business. After they had been thus prepared and given out to the world for all bidders alike, the proposals that were made by these defendants, as well as those that were made by all other bidders, were filed in the regular way in the department, sealed up. Will you please bear in mind, gentlemen of the jury, that in the regular way these proposals, along with the thousands of other proposals that were made for the service were sealed up and filed in the department. Nobody knew who were the bidders on these routes. Nobody had any means of knowing by whom these bids were made until they were finally opened. I beg you to remember that the Second Assistant does not even open the bids. They are opened by a committee appointed for that purpose by the Postmaster-General, due care being taken that no bidder shall have any advantage over any other bidder. After examination and classification, it is ascertained by this committee who of all the bidders is the lowest. A careful record of each bid is kept, and the lowest bidder is informed of the fact that he is such. Then follows the preparation of the contracts. Now, how is that done, gentlemen? As I go along I want you to observe that in all this business there is no departure from the regular order of affairs in the department. How are the contracts prepared? The Government has the blank forms of contracts prepared by the law officer of the Post-Office Department. I may say just here that these forms of contracts that were used during this particular contract period or term are precisely the same as have been used in the department for a great many years, certainly for twenty years before General Brady became Second Assistant Postmaster-General. The contracts are made out on these blank forms. After they are made out they are signed by the Postmaster-General, or, if you please, by the Second Assistant and by the contractor or contractors. Then, for the first time in the progress of the business, does the Second Assistant Postmaster-General know who are the contracting parties other than the Government itself. I pause right here, gentlemen of the jury, to ask you once more to take a survey of this entire field to the point I have reached and ask you to indicate if you can where, up to the time of the execution of the contracts, there is a particle of evidence showing that General Brady knew that these parties who thus bid, had bid, or had anything to do with this proposed service. I assert that there is not one syllable of testimony to indicate that he had the slightest knowledge of it whatever. I do not as yet know when the Government will claim this conspiracy was entered into which is the subject of the indictment. We are left in the air as to that. Certainly you will agree with me that through all the details of this case to which I have thus far alluded and up until the 1st of July, 1878, there is not the slightest particle of testimony to indicate that General Brady had any relation to these parties of any kind or character whatever in connection with this business, and more than that, up to and after the 1st of July, 1878, there is not the slightest particle of testimony that he had any knowledge that Mr. Vaile proposed to become associated with any of these parties in connection with this business.

Now, let me pass on to another stage of this history. I know it is tedious to you, gentlemen, but it is essential to do it in order to have a proper understanding of this case. The parties to whom these one hundred and thirty contracts were awarded entered into their respective contracts, as the indictment says, on the 15th of March, 1878. For the purposes of this case and for the purposes of my argument, I will assume that all these contracts were entered into upon that day. In point of fact, some of them were not signed by the parties on that day and not until sometime afterwards; but that is immaterial to the point that I make. Remember that these contracts stipulated for putting the service on these routes on the 1st day of July, 1878. The service was being carried on under other contracts prior to that time. The department had no concern about these new contracts until the time when the service was to commence under the new contracts. Under the old contracts it would be carried up to the 1st of July, 1878, and then under the new contracts the service was to be continued. Now, on that day it was the duty of the contractor to start the mails on these various routes, and it appears from the testimony that as to some of them there was a failure on the part of the contractors to start the service. Just here I want to bring to your attention another fact. The failure to start this service as to several of these routes grew out of the failure of subcontractors. You remember, gentlemen of the jury, that the testimony shows that they made subcontracts with a man whose name was Hutchinson for putting on service upon several routes in Oregon. The Dalles and Baker City route was one of them. These subcontracts were not confined to the particular routes named in this indictment. These parties had other contracts in that same locality, and they made their subcontracts for putting on the service on the 1st of July, 1878. They expected that service to start, but the subcontractors failed to put on the service. I may just as well, gentlemen of the jury, now, as at any other time, point out to you the difference between a subcontractor and a contractor, and the relations of the two to the Government. A subcontractor has no contract with the Government whatever. A contractor makes his contract to carry the mail for a period of four years. He gives a bond, with security approved by the Government, that he will carry that mail four years. He is liable in damages if he fails to perform that contract. The contract provides that, rain or shine, hot or cold, summer or winter, for four years he will carry that mail. The subcontractor stands in an entirely different position. When he takes his subcontract, if it does not suit his convenience to carry the mail, if the weather becomes too cold or too hot, or it costs him more than he thought it would and he is not making as much money as he thought he would make out of it, right in the middle of the route, right in the middle of the night, he can throw that mail down. The contractor must at once pick it up and re-establish that service, or failing to do that he is declared a failing contractor. Now, you see the difference between the two. Here is the contractor bound hand and foot by the most rigid contract that the most astute lawyers in the employ of the Government can draw up, held in a vise by a contract drawn for the purpose of enforcing upon him the performance of that service during a period of four years. His sureties are bound in the same way, because they are careful to say in that contract and in that obligation to carry the mail that every surety is made a principal. The subcontractor, as I said before, can throw it down whenever it does not suit his convenience to carry it. I am not confining what I now say to the nineteen routes in this indictment. The parties having the contracts proceeded and sublet the service. One conspicuous case was in Oregon, where several routes were let to one sub-tractor, to whom I have already alluded. He failed to put on his service, and the failure of this subcontractor of course brought the contractors in default. Under the practice and the law regulating the department, a contractor who is declared a failing contractor is, as I have said, subjected to serious pecuniary responsibilities. This subcontractor having failed to put on the service, it was necessary for the contractors themselves to proceed to put the service on or find other subcontractors to do it. This required delay. The contractors expected the service to start on the 1st day of July. They had proceeded just as any business man would proceed and let the contracts, and, relying upon the subcontractors, they expected to have the mail started on the 1st of July. But a subcontractor failed, and there they were. Finding themselves in that position they made application to General Brady for time. He was about to declare them failing contractors, the consequences of which I have just mentioned. Gentlemen, do you not remember that testimony? He was about to declare them failing contractors. How is that consistent with the idea of a conspiracy between him and them? Do you not remember how the testimony has disclosed the fact that Miner was seeking some way by which he could extricate himself from this difficulty which threatened him of being declared a failing contractor? Do you suppose that if he was then in a conspiracy with Brady, and Dorsey, and Vaile, and Peck, he would have had that trouble? Do you suppose if he had then been in a conspiracy to defraud the Government by means of these very contracts he would have had to be shinning around Washington or anywhere else to get time? I say that that in and of itself condemns the whole theory of the Government's case. At this point Mr. Miner for the first time invoked the good offices, and afterwards the active assistance pecuniarily, of Mr. Vaile. Then for the first time we hear of Vaile in connection with this business. A great deal has been said during the course of this argument in the way of criticism of Mr. Vaile's conduct and appealing to you to draw from his conduct motives other than motives of integrity. It seemed to be utterly impossible for these gentlemen to conceive that a business man in this age of the world could do a kind act for his fellow man. They seem to think that if a man does a decent, generous thing, helps his fellow-man when he is in trouble, that he must be prompted to do it by some wicked and corrupt motive. I decline to believe that human nature had fallen so low as that. I believe that there are yet men in this world, and I am glad to say that I have met many of them, who are willing to put themselves to some inconvenience, and even to loss at times for the purpose of helping their fellows. I never want to see the day, so far as I am concerned, when, from a generous motive; when, from a generous act, nothing can be extracted but the evidence of a criminal purpose. Well, Mr. Vaile first makes his appearance at this stage of the case. Mr. Vaile had been a contractor for twenty years. General Brady has said he was one of the best that the department had. Naturally, Mr. Miner would turn to a man like Mr. Vaile for help in an hour of emergency. Mr. Vaile tells you, and he tells it with more modesty than I thought was necessary, that he could at that time if he had been disposed to do so, seeing the straits into which Miner had fallen, and seeing that unless he got assistance he would be declared a failing contractor, have made a combination with others of these large and experienced contractors, so that just as soon as Miner and his associates were declared failing contractors they could pick that service up at an increased price over what Miner and his associates were getting. As you know these bids were all arranged in the order of amounts. The man to whom a contract is awarded is the lowest bidder, his name being down at the bottom of the list. In the event of his being declared a failing contractor they start up the list, and the next bidder above him takes the service. Mr. Vaile, as he tells you, could have combined with these other contractors and have allowed Mr. Miner to become a failing contractor and then take this service wholly independent of him. Because he did not choose to do that mean thing; because, on the contrary, he was willing to embark with Mr. Miner in putting the service upon these routes and carrying out these contracts, the gentlemen of the prosecution ask you to say that that can be attributed to no other motives than that he was engaged in a conspiracy to defraud the Government of the United States. You may believe it, gentlemen; but when I can attribute to a man either a motive high-minded and honorable or a motive base and disreputable, if it will bear the one rather than the other, I am willing to give him the benefit of saying that he has some feeling of humanity in his heart.

At the instance of Mr. Miner—I am now talking about matters as to which there is no dispute—Mr. Vaile sought for an extension of time to put on this service. He went to General Brady and asked him to give these men a chance; not to crush them out, but to give them a chance. A brief extension of time was granted for the reasons given to you in the testimony, and about which there is no dispute. They were reasonable reasons, if I may use such a form of expression. They were first that if the contractors could put the service on they could put it on quicker than any new contractor could do it. Is not that reasonable? Suppose you were Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and a man came to you and said, "These men have been disappointed in their subcontractors. They have done all that they could reasonably be expected to do. They went ahead and made their subcontracts, and the subcontractors have failed. Give them time." "Why?" "Because if you don't give them time, if you make a new contract with somebody else, that man will have to have time to put the service on the route. He will have to get his horses there, he will have to get his men there, and he will have to get his supplies there? It will take time. If you kill these men off, if you destroy them, you injure them, and yet get the service no sooner and do the Government no good. Therefore I urge it upon you, Mr. Second Assistant Postmaster-General, to give these men a little time. You will get the service just as soon and you will harm nobody. You will not harm the Government, because the Government never pays for service that is not rendered." That is one reason. The next reason is because, if they were declared failing contractors, under another practice of the department the next bidder, as I have before said, would get the contract, which would involve an additional cost to the Government. It is, however, proper that I should say the Government would have a right to recover from a failing contractor by a suit on his bond; but how would that benefit the Government. The Government would get the money back, to be sure. It would not lose anything. It would recover the damages on the bond, but would get no more than what the original contract gave to it, and it would suffer a loss in that it would bring harm to one of its citizens. There was a brief extension granted. Mr. Vaile induced General Brady not to declare them failing contractors, and suggested that in the event additional time was given he might consent to assist them in respect of putting on this service and carrying out these contracts if they were not able to do it themselves. Upon that, as all the testimony shows, and as to which there is no dispute, General Brady granted additional time, and Mr. Vaile went to his home, in Independence, Missouri.

Now, gentlemen, I venture to say right here—I can't put you in the position of Second Assistant, for that would hardly be proper—but I venture to say that if you will take nine hundred and ninety-nine out of a thousand of the business men of the country and put them in precisely the same position they would do precisely the same thing. After Mr. Vaile went to his home, in Independence, Missouri, complaint having come to the department that the service had not been started on The Dalles and Baker City route, General Brady telegraphed to Mr. Vaile to know what of the service of Miner, Peck, Dorsey, and Watts he would put on. I want to read that telegram to you, for it seems to me to be exceedingly significant in this case. It shows right upon its face that there was no such combination between these parties as the Government is seeking to make you believe. Here is the telegram:

WASHINGTON, August 20, 1878.

To H. M. VAILE,
Independence, Missouri:

What service of Miner, Peck, Dorsey & Watts do you expect to put in operation? Postmaster at Dalles, Oregon, says routes from there not carried and mails lying in office. This cannot be permitted longer.

THOMAS J. BRADY,
2d Ass't P. M. General.

He had given them time for the reasons I have named, and when it became known that the subcontractor had failed Mr. Vaile had gone to him, as this very telegram shows. This telegram confirms every word that Mr. Vaile has said, that Mr. Miner has said, and that General Brady has said. General Brady having given them time and Mr. Vaile having gone away, these complaints came in and General Brady telegraphed to Vaile:

Postmaster at Dalles, Oregon, says routes from there not carried and mails lying in office. This cannot be permitted longer.

Now, to that, gentlemen of the jury, Mr. Vaile responded in substance that he would put on certain of this service, and that the service of Watts he would not put on. Then Mr. Vaile proceeded and did put on that service, either himself or by means of subcontractors. In that way Mr. Vaile became connected with this business. I am not now, gentlemen, going into minute details. Some of them will come hereafter, possibly by me, certainly by others who will follow me. In putting on this service Mr. Vaile expended a large amount of money, and became largely involved in the business in a pecuniary way. Now, gentlemen, you recollect that General Brady telegraphed him—

This cannot be permitted longer—and he proceeded promptly to put the service on. Recollect, gentlemen, that they were not dealing simply with the nineteen routes in this indictment. This action embraced one hundred and thirty routes all told that these parties had, and it was with the whole one hundred and thirty that these parties were dealing. Don't forget that. Now, having gone on and put on the service as expeditiously as he could, the parties were afterwards to come together and fix up an agreement. That had been talked over and arranged for before Vaile went West. Do not forget that, if you please. You will remember Miner did not know whether Brady was going to accept this arrangement or not. He could not tell what was going to happen to them, and therefore they made all the preliminary arrangements in the way of Vaile leaving here proposals to take the service in the event that Brady should declare them failing contractors. How is that consistent with the idea that there was a conspiracy between these parties? They were in doubt as to what Brady would do in regard to this matter, and therefore fearing the worst, and not knowing what would happen in regard to it, they made all the preliminary arrangements before Mr. Vaile went away, Vaile leaving proposals here to take the service if these other parties were declared failing contractors, and by that means to go on. But Brady concluded to do the other thing, and Vaile did go on and put on the service. Then what happened? After this had been done, Mr. Vaile came here, and they entered into a formal written agreement perfecting the arrangements that were contemplated between them. What was that, gentlemen? As simple, plain, and straightforward a business agreement as ever was made by two or more men in the world about any legitimate business.

This agreement, dated the 16th of August, 1878, by and between H. M. Vaile, of Independence, Missouri; John R. Miner, of Sandusky, Ohio; John M. Peck, of Colfax County, New Mexico; and John W. Dorsey, of Middlebury, Vermont, witnesseth as follows:

There was something said about this agreement not being signed until some time in September. It had to be sent out to Peck and these other parties to sign.

1st. A copartnership is hereby formed by and between the above-mentioned parties, for the purpose of managing certain mail routes in the Western States and Territories. Said routes are all those which have been awarded to said Miner, Peck, and Dorsey for the contract term from July 1st, 1878, to June 30, 1882.

All of the gentlemen, not simply these nineteen. They entered into a partnership for the purpose of carrying the mail on all these one hundred and thirty routes.

2nd. Said H. M. Vaile is hereby made treasurer of said copartnership.

Why? Because H. M. Vaile had put in the money that was carrying on the business. Is there anything suspicious about that? Is there anything in that that any discreet man would not do? Is there anything in that from which any one of you, gentlemen, would infer that this man was engaged in some rascality?

And the other parties hereby agree, by suitable powers of attorney or drafts on the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department, to authorize the said Vaile to demand and receive all mail pay on said routes—

Why? Is there anything unusual about it? Anything wrong about it? Any indication of fraud in it? As he had put his money in there, they simply agreed that he should be the treasurer, and that they, by suitable powers of attorney, would enable him to draw the money that was received from these routes. Let us go a little further:

and with said mail pay to pay, first, all subcontractors the amounts due them—

They were not going to cheat any subcontractors.

second, the expenses necessary and incident to the proper doing of the business; third, to divide the profits remaining among the parties hereto each quarter, as hereinafter specified.

3rd. Said J. R. Miner is hereby made secretary of the said copartnership, and shall keep an accurate record of the receipts and expenses of the company, and of correspondence with subcontractors and others.

I have read so much of that paper to show to you the character of the arrangement that these parties made. Here were Miner, Peck, and Dorsey who were unable to carry out their contracts. They had to have assistance. They brought to their aid Mr. Vaile, just as any other firm might bring in a man of substance to help them out. They made a partnership agreement for the purpose of carrying on this legitimate business. Gentlemen, is not that a fair statement of this history? Can any of the notes which these gentlemen have set floating in the atmosphere of this case make it other than as I have stated it to be?

Now let us go back a little and take up this history from another point. When John W. Dorsey, Miner, and Peck engaged in this business, if there is any truth in man, and if we may at all rely upon the testimony of these defendants where there is absolutely nothing to contradict it, Stephen W. Dorsey advanced to them money from time to time and indorsed notes for them upon which they procured money, and thus they became very largely indebted to him. In order to secure himself for the repayment of these moneys and to protect himself against these indorsements that he had thus given to them, they drew in his favor certain postal drafts, as they are called, as collateral security for the loans and indorsements. I wish you to understand particularly and clearly, gentlemen, what these postal drafts are, and at the expense of being tedious I must bring your attention to them. All these things, as you will presently see, cut a figure in this case. Let us see what these postal drafts are. They have been recognized and sanctioned by the Treasury Department. You may remember that they are not drafts of the United States or of any officer of the United States. They are simply orders given by the contractor upon his pay for a particular quarter. It is precisely the same as one private individual giving an order on another individual to a third party for money that is due or is to become due to the party who gives the order. These orders are given in blank. They are filed in the office of the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department, which office for convenience is located in the Post-Office Department building, because that particular office has relation to payments out of the Treasury for the mail service. These orders are drawn in blank. There is nothing unusual about it. It is a common thing in the department. They are recognized by the Sixth Auditor's office, and payments are made on them to the parties in whose favor they are drawn. Remember, I beg you, gentlemen of the jury, in this case, that those orders are never filed in the office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General. They are filed in the Sixth Auditor's office. The Second Assistant Postmaster-General does not know anything about them. The Postmaster-General knows nothing about them. Nobody in the Post-Office Department knows anything about them. They are filed in the Sixth Auditor's office. The orders are drawn in blank, because it is not possible for the contractor to know how much will be due on any given contract in any given quarter; because for every failure to carry the mail according to contract there is a deduction, and for every delinquency in the matter of the proper care of the mail there is a fine imposed. Not until the end of the quarter and the report from the inspection division of the Second Assistant's office can the Sixth Auditor know what will be the amount to be paid to the contractor for a particular quarter. Until this is done the contractor cannot know what amount will be due him for any particular quarter. Hence these orders are drawn in blank. They are drawn by the contractor and recognized by the Sixth Auditor's office, for the purpose of enabling the contractor to raise money by their hypothecation to carry on the service. Stephen W. Dorsey having thus advanced money to these parties, they executed to him these post-office orders as security to him for the money which he had advanced and the indorsements he had given. So you will see that the execution of these orders was in the direct line of their recognition by the Treasury Department. There was nothing novel, unusual, or suspicious in respect of them. They were just such orders as all other contractors all over the country were issuing day by day for the purpose of raising money to perform this most important service to the Government. Thus Stephen W. Dorsey became connected with this business before Vaile became connected with it in the manner which I have stated before.

Now, mark you, and please put a pin down here, will you? After Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey had made these advancements and taken his security he went away from the city of Washington to his home in Arkansas; was away four months; was not here at all; knew nothing at all about the difficulties these parties were having with reference to putting this service on; knew nothing of Miner's tribulations and the means that he was resorting to for the purpose of relieving himself from those responsibilities and difficulties; had no knowledge that Miner, acting under the authority that he had from Peck and John W. Dorsey, &c., &c., had made this arrangement which it was necessary for him to make in order to save all these parties from loss; and had no knowledge that Miner had made that arrangement with Mr. Vaile.

About the 1st of December Senator Dorsey comes back here, because Vaile, having become connected with it, as I have stated, they having made an agreement with him, by virtue of which he was to collect all this money that was to be derived from these mail routes, he having taken subcontracts and other papers that authorized him to collect all the money that was to be paid on account of these contracts, a perfectly proper thing for him to do and a thing that any business man would have done—Stephen W. Dorsey came back to the city of Washington and to the Senate in December, and he found this changed condition of things. He found that Mr. Vaile had filed these subcontracts in the department, and the filing of those subcontracts had the effect to have the payments for the service upon those routes made directly to Mr. Vaile, and the result of that would be to cut out and make absolutely worthless the postal drafts which had been given to Stephen W. Dorsey as his security for the money he had advanced and the liabilities he had incurred through his indorsements for these parties.

I want you to bear in mind, in addition to this, the fact that during the period of these negotiations with Mr. Vaile Stephen W. Dorsey was not in Washington, as I have said, and was not cognizant of them, as I have said, in any manner, form, or shape whatever. He had left Washington in the spring of 1878, and did not return until he came to the Senate in December of that year. In the mean time all these negotiations and transactions, so far as Mr. Vaile was concerned, had transpired, and of them he knew absolutely nothing. I challenge you, gentlemen of the jury; I challenge the counsel for the Government; I challenge anybody to point to any testimony to the contrary of what I have just said. So that when Stephen W. Dorsey came back to Washington he found this whole business had changed. He found that the security for the moneys he had advanced and the liabilities he had incurred had all been wiped out of existence, and was absolutely worthless.

Now, gentlemen, if there had been a conspiracy between these parties would these complications ever have arisen? If these parties were acting in harmony with each other, in concert with each other, pursuant to a mutual understanding and agreement as to how this business should be conducted, do you suppose that those complications ever would have occurred? And even if they had occurred, why, they were occurring among themselves, and there would have been no occasion for any disturbance among them, but they would have said, "Gentlemen, this is all in the family of us conspirators; we have got it all cut and dried; we are going to rob the Treasury of the United States; why should we trouble ourselves in regard to it? These things are mere matters of form, and in the end we will pocket the spoils, and there is no occasion for having any disturbance among ourselves about it." If there had been a conspiracy, a combination, a confederation, such as these gentlemen say there was, these troubles between those parties never would have arisen.

Naturally enough, Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey—and this is consistent with our theory that there was no conspiracy, and utterly inconsistent with the theory of the Government that there was a conspiracy—was exceedingly dissatisfied with what had occurred. This large amount of money and this large responsibility was likely to be a total loss to him. The result was a controversy between the parties in respect of these matters, and that dragged along in an unsettled condition, the parties at war with each other, hostile to each other, quarreling about it, quarreling because Stephen W. Dorsey said "I have loaned my money, and you gave me security, and now you have made an arrangement which deprives me of my security;" Vaile saying, "You are a lot of contractors, about to be declared failing contractors; you are on the brink of ruin; you invited me in here to assist you out of the difficulty, and I have put my money into it, and I have protected myself, as I had a right to do." I do not know what Vaile did say to Mr. Dorsey, but I can imagine what I would say or what you would say under such circumstances: "Mr. Dorsey, you did embark your money in that enterprise, you did advance money to these people, you did loan them the money with security, and don't you see, Mr. Dorsey, that they were about to be declared failing contractors? Now, if they had been declared failing contractors would not you have lost all your money? And when I stepped in and saved them from being declared failing contractors where was there anything wrong in my taking care of myself in respect of moneys that I put into the business?" Vaile could well have said that to him. But Mr. Dorsey felt aggrieved. He thought the parties whom he had assisted ought not to have done this thing without taking care of him as to this large amount of money and liability. And the war waxed hot, and it went on furiously between these parties. They were at daggers' points, hostile as they could be in respect of these matters. Is that consistent with the idea that there was a conspiracy?

Thus this thing dragged along until S. W. Dorsey went out of the Senate of the United States. Then what happened? You recollect that the very moment he got out of the Senate he commenced to protect himself, as I claim, in respect of these matters. These gentlemen say that he commenced to show himself as an original conspirator; as a party originally, essentially, inherently interested in the whole business from the beginning. They say that he was a secret party to all the contracts, while we say and he says—and there is no evidence to the contrary—that he was in this just as many men have gotten into trouble by becoming security for others or by loaning money to others who were not able to return the loan. After his retirement from the Senate the parties got together to settle this trouble. They divided this route. S. W. Dorsey bought out John W. Dorsey and Peck.

Now recollect, gentlemen, that these routes were the stock in trade, the assets, of this concern. Miner took certain routes and Vaile took certain routes, and S. W. Dorsey took certain of them, and it was agreed that the indebtedness of the parties in respect of these several routes should be divided in certain ways and taken care of, and that each should thereafter go his own way. The division was made. All these parties testified to it. Nobody disputes it. Even Mr. Bliss, on the last day of his argument, conceded it, as I understood it.

To place this beyond all sort of question, we have the testimony of Mr. Turner in addition to the testimony of the parties themselves, that a list of the routes that Mr. Dorsey took and a list of those taken by Miner and Vaile were given to Mr. Turner, the corresponding clerk, so that he should know exactly what routes belonged respectively to Miner and Vaile, and to Dorsey. Miner and Vaile united their respective routes under the common ownership of Vaile and Miner. Turner tells you that those lists were given to him by these respective parties—this occurred in March, 1879—and that thereafter each party attended to his own routes, and neither had anything whatever to do with the routes held by the other. Each got the pay appertaining to his own routes. Here was an absolute, direct, distinct, unmistakable division of these assets between these respective parties, and thenceforward neither had anything to do with the routes of the others. Each was responsible for the performance of the service on his own routes. Each drew the money payable on account of his own routes wholly irrespective and independent of the other. As to this, it seems to me, there can be no possibility of dispute if there is any faith whatever to be put in human testimony.

I want to get your attention now, because I think what I am going to say will help you to get rid of a great deal of stuff in this case. To effect this separation, inasmuch as the law does not allow the assignment of a contract with the Government, the parties made to each other, respectively, subcontracts, by means of which subcontracts the party who acquired a particular route was authorized to receive the entire pay upon that route. In other words, the law, not recognizing assignments, but recognizing subcontracts, each made to another a subcontract covering the contract period for the full amount of the pay to be made by the Government to the contractor under the original contract, and the subcontractor became practically the owner of the route, although the Government, on its records, only knew the contractor, and as such looked to him for the performance of the service.

Right at the beginning of this case, in the very earliest stages of the testimony, two witnesses were brought here from the city post-office to prove to you who had lock-boxes 706 and 714. The purpose was to show, of course, the association of these parties with each other, the commingling, the common receiving of their mail matter from the department in respect of these routes. Whenever the Government makes a contract with a man, it wants to know where he lives, and where it can reach him, and it is especially so in regard to Post-Office Department matters. They want to know, because, you see, this business is subcontracted, like any other. They know that these contractors make subcontracts; that not one in a thousand of all the routes is carried by the original contractor himself, but by subcontractors. But the Government does not recognize anybody but the contractor; it does not recognize the subcontractor at all; it holds the contractor all the time; it never lets him get out of its grip, and, therefore, it wants to know where he lives, so that if any complaint comes in from anywhere that he is not properly performing the service, they may know just how to reach him ; and so that if there is any change to be made in the service they may know just where to notify him. One of the features of this business is to keep the run of the contractors. You see a great many orders entered up in this case. My Brother Ker has, I think, spent about twelve months of his valuable time in hunting up orders directing a change of the address of the contractor. Whenever the contractor changes his address in any way he notifies the department of that fact, so that the department can always know exactly where to find him. When Vaile and Miner and John W. and Stephen W. Dorsey made this arrangement by which they divided these routes they arranged also for this change of address, and that which one was to be responsible for was to be sent to a particular address, and that which the other was to be responsible for was to go to another particular address. Stephen W. Dorsey right at that time employed Rer-dell to look after his business, and they gave the directions to the Post-Office Department that the address would be so and so as to those routes, and asked to have all communications of the department sent to that address. The Post-Office Department thereupon, as is always done, invariably—a refusal was never heard of—made the order on the jackets to change the address according to request. Out of that mere matter of changing the address, just for the convenience of the department and for the interest of the department, they got, I do not know how many—not a ton, nor half a ton, nor a thousand—but a great many orders of that kind, merely changing the address, put in here to swell these volumes of testimony, when they had no more relation to this case, gentlemen of the jury, than what is happening in England to-day.

Now, the subcontractor became practically the owner of the route, although the Government on its records only knew the contractor as such and looked to him. Thus, I repeat, these parties became absolutely separated from each other, and thenceforward had nothing to do with each other in the management of the business, except in so far as it might be necessary to use the name of the contractor in order to carry out the requirements of the law and the rules and practice of the department. And this is further confirmed, if further confirmation is necessary, by the fact—and which fact will hereafter come to be an exceedingly important one—and it is verified by the records of the department, namely, that these parties from that time forward, as I repeat, respectively drew their money from the department according to their several respective routes.

Again, gentlemen, I ask you to take a survey of this entire field and see what there is, if anything, in all this, other than a simple, straightforward business transaction, not at all out of the usual and ordinary affairs of men. They were just such transactions and such controversies as occur in the usual business affairs of life, and just such transactions and controversies as are inconsistent absolutely with any theory of a combination between these parties to defraud the Government. For, if there had been such a combination—of which I will hereafter speak—then it is inconceivable that such a separation, such a division, such a parting and keeping apart and going in their several ways, should have occurred. We claim that such a combination as that charged would have kept the parties together. And again I ask you to take a survey of this entire field and to point to me, if you can, a solitary circumstance anywhere indicating that General Brady was at all cognizant of the relations between these parties or had anything to do whatever with these transactions that were occurring between them. There is no evidence of that character.

So that, from the inception of this business, away back in 1877, when Peck spoke to Miner, or Miner to Peck (which is the first we know of these parties having any relation to each other), down to the period when the final separation occurred in the spring of 1879, there is not anything whatever to indicate that General Brady knew anything about any of these affairs, or that he ever knew of them until disclosed before this court, except the circumstances to which I have alluded; that is to say, that Vaile asked him to grant them further time, and that he telegraphed Vaile to ascertain what service he (Vaile) would put on, and his (Vaile's) answer to Brady, informing him what service he would put on or attend to. That is the whole of it, and if you can find anything else than that I would be glad to have you mention it now.

This brings us, gentlemen, up to May, 1879, in this history. And now I turn from this to bring your attention to the charge that is made against these defendants in this indictment. This indictment was found on the 20th day of May, 1882. It charges that on the 23d of May, 1879, these defendants (John W. Dorsey, Stephen W. Dorsey, Vaile, Miner, Peck, Turner, and Brady) conspired, confederated, and agreed together to defraud the United States. Mr. Ker stopped to tell you who were on trial and who were not. He said to you that Peck was not on trial, and he gave you the reason, because he was dead. He said Turner was not on trial, but he would not stop to give you the reason why he was not on trial. He need not have been modest on that subject. He knew the reason, and he knew that you knew the reason that Turner was not on trial, because, although they charged him with having agreed to make false entries upon jackets and thereby to deceive the Postmaster-General, yet there was nothing against him and a jury had so said. You have heard all this case, gentlemen, and it is perhaps not out of place for me to say that you know now how much reason there was for all the anxiety and injury that was cast upon Mr. Turner by this transaction.

This indictment charges that these parties were mutually interested in these contracts when they entered into the conspiracy. If the conspiracy was entered into prior to August, 1879, as these gentlemen would have you believe (if they mean anything by the testimony of those drivers that were brought here, who testified as to what John W. Dorsey said to them around that camp-fire out in Dakota, by which testimony they seemed to try to make the impression upon your minds that even then, prior to July, 1878, this unholy combination existed), if that is their theory of this case, if they are trying to convince you that that is the time when this conspiracy was formed, then at that time Mr. Vaile was not interested mutually with these parties, because you know from this testimony that not until in August did he have any relations whatever to them.

Mr. KER. We do not charge that they were all mutually interested.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Ker says he does not charge that they were all mutually interested.

Mr. DAVIDGE. The indictment does.

Mr. WILSON. The indictment says that all the parties were mutually interested, excepting Brady and Turner, in all these contracts. Now, I say if they locate their conspiracy back there where that testimony I have just alluded to would indicate that they are seeking to locate it, then it is not true, because Vaile was not interested at that time, as everybody knows who has paid any attention to this case. If they locate this conspiracy at the time they say in the indictment that they locate it (to wit, on the 17th day of April), that will not do, because you know, and I know, and they know that these parties had separated and each had gone his own way in March, and they were not mutually interested then. If they locate this conspiracy after that, then it was not a conspiracy for the mutual benefit of these parties, because we know that Dorsey had some routes independent of Miner and Vaile, and Miner and Vaile had other routes wholly independent of Dorsey. So that if they locate the conspiracy after that date, then we are simply in this position—a position that the law never allows the prosecution to put the defendant in—that “it is this thing or that thing, and we will take our chances as to which it is.” A defendant is always entitled to notice of what he is called upon to defend against. But thus we are out in the air, so to speak, with reference to this charge. It avers that they were to accomplish this conspiracy to defraud the United States by means of false communications, false petitions, and false affidavits to be procured and made and filed by the defendants other than Turner or Brady; and by means of Turner making false indorsements upon jackets for increase and expedition of service; and by means of Brady making orders for increase and expedition of service as to routes named in the indictment; and by means of his granting to them a month’s extra pay for service dispensed with; and by means of his refusing—and I will come to this more particularly after a while—to impose fines and make deductions. That is to say, that although they did not carry the mail, and although they did not take care of the mail, yet a part of the bargain with Brady was that when they did fail to carry or care for the mail he was to refuse to make fines and deductions, and thereby money would go into the pockets of these parties that they ought not to have. That was one of the means that they were to resort to. Now, these are some of the means—and there are others which I will speak of hereafter, perhaps—by which, as they say, this fraud was to be perpetrated upon the Government.

Now, gentlemen, we come, after this somewhat lengthy preliminary statement in respect of this case, to the consideration of the offense with which these defendants are charged. A moment ago I spoke, in a very brief way, of what the indictment sets forth. It is an indictment for conspiracy. Will you please remember that? That is the first question which it is important to determine, and that you have to determine, for that is the offense with which these defendants are charged. They must be found guilty of that or they cannot be found guilty under this indictment.

The Constitution and the laws of this Government have provided that a party shall be advised by an indictment of the offense with which he is charged. He can only be tried for the particular offense that is set forth in that indictment. And no matter what other offense he may have committed, until he is charged with it he cannot be tried for it, and that charge must be made by an indictment. These defendants, therefore, have come here at the instance of the Government (the Government having selected an offense which it says they have committed) to answer to this specific charge, and they cannot be required, nor will you require of them, that they shall here before you answer for anything other than that which has been charged against them in this particular indictment.

As I have said, the charge is conspiracy. It is a charge made either under section 5440 of the Revised Statutes, or it is a charge made under the act of May 17, 1879; and whether it is the one or the other, so far as the character of the offense is concerned, it is immaterial, because the offense created by those two sections is precisely the same in all essential particulars. Gentlemen, this statute has been read severa-times in your hearing, but I will read it again, because upon this is predicated this indictment:

If two or more persons conspire either to commit any offense against the United States—

Mark the language—

either to commit any offense against the United States or to defraud the United States in any manner or for any purpose, and one or more of such parties do any act to effect the object of the conspiracy, all the parties to such conspiracy shall be liable to a penalty, &c.

That is the statute. If two or more parties shall conspire to either commit an offense against the United States or to defraud the United States, and do an overt act, they shall be deemed guilty and punished, &c. This indictment charges that these defendants have offended against the provisions of this statute. It charges that these parties conspired, confederated, and agreed together to do the particular thing named, to wit, to defraud the United States.

If you will allow me to revert to that statute you will see that there are two offenses named in it; one is a conspiracy to commit an offense against the United States, the other is a conspiracy to defraud the United States, and as to these two several offenses I shall have something to say hereafter.

Now, they say that these parties conspired, confederated, and agreed together to do this particular thing; that is to say, to defraud the United States. So that the question that you have to determine is, did these parties conspire, confederate, and agree together? That is the question.

What is a conspiracy, gentlemen? It is where parties agree together to do some forbidden thing. They must agree together. There must be a mutual understanding arrived at between them. Their minds must have come together in agreeing or understanding that they will do the thing which it is alleged they were to accomplish. I cannot state this better, gentlemen, than I find it stated by a very learned judge in the case of the United States vs. Goldberg, 7 Bissell, 179, where he says—

Mr. KER. [Interposing.] I hope the rule will be observed of having the law read to the court rather than to the jury. At the last trial your honor said that the counsel should read the law to the court. If the law is to be discussed now before the jury I would like to know it.

The COURT. By way of telling what a conspiracy is, the counsel may be permitted to read from a book. Counsel is not now engaged in discussing any question of law to the court.

Mr. WILSON. Not at all. I do not want to trespass upon the rules of court.

Mr. DAVIDGE. He is simply referring to a definition, that is all.

Mr. WILSON. To describe to the jury what a conspiracy is; that is all that I want. This learned judge says:

A conspiracy is formed when two or more persons agree together to do an unlawful act—in other words, when they combine to accomplish by their united action a criminal or unlawful purpose; and the statutory offense is consummated when such agreement is made, or such combination is entered into, and one or more of the parties does any act to effect the object of such conspiracy. If two or more persons agree together that they will commit a certain offense against the United States, as that they will enter a public office of the United States and take and carry away papers and records there deposited, with intent to steal or destroy them, and one or more of the persons so agreeing does any act to effect the object of such agreement, they are guilty of the offense of conspiracy.

It is not necessary, to constitute a conspiracy, that two or more persons should meet together, and enter into an explicit or formal agreement for an unlawful scheme, or that they should directly by words or in writing, state what the unlawful scheme is to be, and the details of the plan or means by which the unlawful combination is to be made effective. It is sufficient if two or more persons, in any manner or through any contrivance, positively or tacitly, come to a mutual understanding to accomplish a common and unlawful design.

Of course a mere discussion between parties about entering into a conspiracy, or as to the means to be adopted for the performance of an unlawful act, does not constitute a conspiracy, unless the scheme or some proposed scheme is in fact assented to—concurred in by the parties in some manner, so that their minds meet for the accomplishment of the proposed unlawful act.

I read that, gentlemen of the jury, for the purpose of calling to your attention what it is that constitutes a conspiracy. A conspiracy can only exist where the parties have agreed together. There must be a mutual understanding between them. Their minds must meet upon the subject, in order to constitute conspiracy. That is what they have charged against these defendants in this case. They say that they came to a mutual understanding and agreement; that they agreed together that by means of fraudulent petitions, fraudulent letters, fraudulent affidavits, and so on, and so on, which I need not repeat, they would defraud the United States. That is the charge, and that is what the Government has to prove. That is the very point and the only point in this case, except the proof of overt acts, to which I will refer hereafter. The first thing and the only thing, with a single exception, which I will mention in a moment, to be determined by you, is, did these parties thus agree together? Did they conspire together for the purpose of accomplishing this object?

Then the Government must not only prove that they did conspire together, but this statute requires that one further step shall be taken by the Government in the way of proof, to wit, that they must prove an overt act; that is to say, that some act was done by some one of the parties to accomplish the object of that conspiracy or that agreement.

Hereafter I shall wish to call attention to what has recently been determined by the Supreme Court of the United States, which I will do, as a matter of course, with submission to the court, in submitting what I have to say to the court on that subject touching the interpretation of this statute.

Before I do that, however, gentlemen, you must understand, and it is important that you shall understand and keep it distinctly in mind, that the offense charged is conspiracy. The overt act comes after the conspiracy. The conspiracy, as you will see after awhile, is the offense. So that the first thing for the Government to do is to show that these parties agreed together; and after that, then the next step is taken, which is the proof of the overt act. The overt act comes after the conspiracy, and each and every overt act laid in this indictment may be proved to have been committed, and each overt act may be as bad as bad can be, as bad as these gentlemen can possibly paint it, and yet it would be of no avail unless the conspiracy is proved.

Mr. DAVIDGE. The language of the statute is that it must be in pursuance of the conspiracy.

Mr. WILSON. The conspiracy is the offense, and not the overt act; and that distinction, gentlemen, I wish to impress upon your minds, in view of what I shall hereafter have to say to you on the subject.

The COURT. Do you mean to contend that conspiracy must first be made out before the overt acts in pursuit of the conspiracy can be entered into?

Mr. WILSON. I mean to say that the Government must establish that fact that there is a conspiracy.

The COURT. Do you mean to say that the overt acts cannot be used for the purpose of proving the conspiracy?

Mr. WILSON. That I want to discuss hereafter. I shall not argue the case upon the theory that they cannot, but I shall argue the case, as I proceed, upon the theory that they may use them for the purpose of establishing a conspiracy.

The COURT. I am inclined to think that overt acts, if they are of a character tending to prove the conspiracy, may be used not only as overt acts, but for the purpose of establishing the conspiracy.

Mr. WILSON. I can see where there could be serious difference of opinion in respect to that matter. But I propose to attempt to show to the jury that there is not an overt act laid in this indictment as having been committed by my client, or by any of the other defendants with which he had anything to do—no overt act, so far as he is concerned, except an official act, and that an official act is an act of such a character that an inference of conspiracy cannot properly be drawn from it. But that is a question which I will discuss only at a later stage.

The COURT. I would like to hear you on that subject.

Mr. WILSON. It is so near the hour of adjournment that I would be glad to stop here for to-day.

The COURT. I shall administer justice with mercy.

Mr. WILSON. I am glad you are merciful to the jury.

Thereupon (at 3 o'clock and 56 minutes p. m.) the court adjourned until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

THURSDAY, MAY 10, 1883.

The court met at 11 o'clock.

Present, counsel for the Government and for the defendants.

The COURT. Before Mr. Wilson proceeds I wish to make one remark. I remember that on yesterday when Mr. Wilson referred to the testimony of Rerdell in regard to his proposal to challenge a juror, and after he had made his remarks on that subject, an expression was used by the court, which seemed to imply a censure upon Mr. Blackmar. I think probably that remark was undeserved on the part of Mr. Blackmar. There is no evidence of Rerdell's that Blackmar made any proposition at all. It was wholly the plot and suggestion of Rerdell himself, made to Mr. Blackmar and to which Mr. Blackmar made no answer. So far as his failure to make any answer is concerned, and so far as Rerdell's testimony is concerned there might be some ground of complaint against Mr. Blackmar. But as no such suggestion was made by Blackmar to Rerdell, and the whole thing was Rerdell's own conception, and we have not heard from Mr. Blackmar on the subject, I think it is proper that the court should retract anything like censure in the remark made by the court yesterday. It was a brief remark, but it seemed to imply some censure upon Mr. Blackmar. I do not wish to be understood now in that way. I merely wish to be understood as confining the censure of the court in regard to that matter to Rerdell himself.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Will your honor let me say a word?

The COURT. It is hardly worth while to discuss the question.

Mr. DAVIDGE. You are mistaken with regard to the facts. There is no doubt whatever, assuming the evidence of Rerdell to be true, that there was not a mere proposition made by Rerdell to Blackmar, but there was a positive bargain and compact entered into between Rerdell and Blackmar, a Government agent. The only way in which this matter can be cleared up is for Mr. Blackmar to explain or for the Government to explain. We are perfectly willing that the trial shall be suspended and Mr. Blackmar put on the stand and allowed to testify as to the real facts connected with this matter. It may be that this was a mere voluntary act on the part of Blackmar. It may be that it was done in his superfluous zeal to help the Government, a most unnatural and most improbable thing. It may also be that Mr. Blackmar, an agent and employé of the Government, obtained his instructions from some Government officer. I do not think anybody will assume that Blackmar volunteered in this work of iniquity. It is more likely that he acted as an agent. We are perfectly willing, however, that the argument be suspended and that Mr. Blackmar take the stand and testify whether he acted at his own instance, and whether he voluntarily embarked in this work of iniquity, or on the other hand whether he acted under orders.

Mr. KER. If your honor please, it seems to me that my friend, Mr. Davidge, will have an opportunity before the jury to argue this matter. We have the testimony very fully upon the subject. Rerdell was examined and cross-examined and re-examined. But if it would be any satisfaction to my friend, and if the court thinks it is proper I will certainly not object to Mr. Blackmar's submitting himself to a cross-examination. My friends can have every opportunity to cross-examine him and I assure them that Mr. Blackmar will come out straight in the matter.

Mr. DAVIDGE. It is not for me to do it. I take the record as it stands, and find on the record that a Government officer made this iniquitous bargain. That is enough for me.

The COURT. I do not understand the evidence to show any such thing as that.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I understand it that way.

The COURT. It does not seem so to me; but if Mr. Blackmar is willing he may state the facts on both sides. [To Mr. Blackmar.] Are you willing?

Mr. BLACKMAR. Yes, sir.

The COURT. Administer the oath to him.

CHARLES P. BLACKMAR affirmed.

Mr. KER. Now, Mr. Davidge, proceed with your inquiry.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Mr. Ingersoll will examine Mr. Blackmar.

By Mr. INGERSOLL :

Question. Were you present in court when Mr. Rerdell testified in regard to having made an arrangement with you that he would sit with the defendants and challenge such jurors as the Government might indicate?

Mr. KER. Wait one moment. If your honor please, Mr. Rerdell made no such statement. Mr. Rerdell said he had told Mr. Blackmar what he would do. Let the counsel modify his question.

The COURT. [To the witness.] You can state what you know in regard to Rerdell's testimony.

Q. Were you present in court when Mr. Rerdell testified on this subject?—A. I was going to answer the other question in this way: That I was present in court and heard all that Mr. Rerdell said on the subject, but I did not understand him to state it as you embraced it in your question.

Q. You may state what you wish as to what that arrangement was, if there was an arrangement?—A. I made no arrangement whatever with him.

Q. Did he make any proposition to you?—A. He made a suggestion to me that he was willing to go on the stand and testify.

Q. That I do not want. Did he make a proposition to you that he would sit with the defendants and challenge such men as the Government might suggest?—A. He made a statement like this: That he should claim his right to challenge his proportion of the jurors.

Q. Do what?—A. That he should claim the privilege of challenging his pro rata or proportion of the jurors.

Q. How would he exercise that right, for the Government or against the Government?—A. He wanted me to communicate that fact to the Government—to the counsel for the Government.

Q. Did you give him a list of the names of jurors to be challenged?—A. I did not.

Q. Did he give you a list of the names that he would challenge?—A. He did.

Q. Four names?—A. Whether there were four or more than four I cannot say.

Q. He gave you a list?—A. He gave me a list of the names of the persons he should challenge.

Q. What did you do with the list?—A. I have been trying to think since that testimony of Rerdell's just what I did do with that list. I have got that list in my house now. If I had supposed I was to be examined on that subject I would have brought the original list here. That list, I would say, has never been out of my room.

Q. Did you communicate those names to anybody?—A. I communicated the fact to Mr. Merrick.

Q. When?—A. Immediately; long before the trial began.

Q. What did you tell him?—A. I told him just what Mr. Rerdell said.

Q. Did you give those names to Mr. Merrick?—A. I hardly think I did. I don't think I did.

Q. Will you say you did not?—A. I said I had been trying to think whether I did or not. I will not say that I did not. The original list, however, is in my room, and never has been out of it.

Q. Do you remember the names on that list?—A. No, sir; I do not remember the names.

Q. If you have that list will you furnish it some time?—A. I will. The last time I looked it was on my table, just where it was originally, and I presume it is there now. If it has not been destroyed I will furnish it.

Q. Do you know as a matter of fact whether Mr. Rerdell endeavored to challenge one of the jurors whose name was on that list?—A. I know from the record.

Mr. KER. If your honor please, that is a matter of record.

Q. Was it one whose name was on the list?—A. That I cannot tell you.

Q. Without looking at the list?—A. I could not say even then. I do not know who it was he wanted to challenge. I do not know to-day.

Q. Will you go and get that list?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was it understood that Mr. Rerdell was to challenge in favor of the Government?—A. It was not. Now, I would like to be permitted to say what I want to say.

The COURT. You may go on.

A. [Continuing.] I reported this fact to Mr. Merrick, he being the only Government attorney in the city at the time. I had been directed to listen to what might be said to me.

Q. By whom?—A. By the counsel; and cautioned as to what I should say myself. Of course I considered it my duty to report what Mr. Rerdell had said to me. I did so report it, and Mr. Merrick peremptorily ordered me to say to Mr. Rerdell that that proposition could not be entertained; that it would not be proper for the Government counsel to consent to any such proposition; that it would not be honorable towards the defendants' counsel, and that it would not be listened to for a moment.

Q. Then you told Rerdell that, did you?—A. I did. I told him the next time I saw him that it could not be entertained.

Q. Did you have a conversation with S. W. Dorsey on yesterday about this very matter?—A. I had a conversation with him yesterday afternoon on the sidewalk, as I was getting into a car. I do not think it was on this matter, only as I commented on the remarks of Judge Wilson and what was said in regard to it.

Q. Did you in that conversation tell him you did make that arrangement with Rerdell?—A. No, sir.

Q. That you made it?—A. No, sir. Oh, no, sir. I hardly think Mr. Dorsey will say that either.

Q. I will ask you if you did not say to Stephen W. Dorsey yesterday in front of the court-house that you ought not to be blamed for this Rerdell matter, because every step you had taken you took under the direction of Mr. Merrick?—A. I said to Mr. Dorsey with regard to everything I had done in connection with this trial that my hands were clean, and I spread my hands out before him like that [illustrating].

Q. What else did you say?—A. And that the remarks that were made yesterday in connection with it were unfair towards me.

Q. Did you not also say that everything you had done in that connection you had done under advice of the Government counsel?—A. I said perhaps—I did not say it in that way. I said I had not done anything but what I had been instructed to do.

Q. And that you thought the defense was a little hard on you?—A. I did not say it in that way. I said I thought the remarks were unfair towards me.

Q. Did you have a conversation with Mr. Boone yesterday?—A. Mr. Boone was in here and spoke to me.

Q. Did you have any conversation with him anywhere in this building?—A. I had a conversation right here yesterday at recess.

Q. Did you say to him in that conversation that you thought it was unfair to make you bear that load?—A. I said to Mr. Boone just what I said to Mr. Dorsey, and I made the same remark to Mr. Davidge, that it was an unfair reference to me, and it was unkind towards me, and I made the same remark about my hands being clean.

Q. Did you say to him that you did not make the arrangement with Rerdell?—A. I said then and I say now, and shall continue to say to the day of my death, that I made no arrangement with Mr. Rerdell.

Q. Did you tell Mr. Boone so yesterday?

The WITNESS. Did I tell him what?

Mr. INGERSOLL. That you made no such arrangement with Mr. Rerdell?

A. I do not know that I said it. If I said anything on the subject I said it.

Q. Did you say to Mr. Davidge that you made no such arrangement with Mr. Rerdell?—A. I don't think I said so. I could not have said that I made the arrangement with Mr. Rerdell.

Q. You do not seem to understand me. Did you say to them that you did not make the arrangement with Rerdell? Did you deny having made the arrangement with Rerdell?—A. I do not know that I denied it. It was not my place then and there to deny it.

Q. Did you deny it?—A. I do not know that I did.

Q. Did you deny it to Mr. Boone?—A. I do not know that I did. I have not denied it anywhere. I have been very close in my conversation about this matter. I have not allowed myself to be interviewed or questioned on the subject.

Q. Did you not at that time urge as your defense, and as your only defense, that you were acting under orders?—A. I say that now.

Q. At the time you told them you were acting under orders, did you deny that you had made this arrangement with Rerdell?—A. I do not know that I did. I was not under obligation to inform them.

Q. I understand that. Did you not say to Mr. Boone that you were going to come out and put the load where it belonged?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did you not say to Mr. Boone that they could not come any Bowen or Hoover business over you?—A. I don't think I said any such thing.

Q. Did you not say that they could not play the Fall business on you?—A. I don't think I said any such thing.

Q. Did you not say that you would not carry their load; that they would have to take it?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did you not say this to Mr. Boone: "The whole plan was conceived by Woodward, but I would not carry it out until I had consulted with the counsel for the Government, and I did consult with Mr. Merrick?"—A. No, sir; I say I have been very careful in my conversations. I had no right to talk with other persons on the subject.

Q. I don't care about your right; but did you?—A. I am giving it as a reason.

Q. Did you agree on a system of signals with Rerdell about the clock?—A. Yes, sir. Now, if the court please, I would like to explain the matter.

The COURT. Certainly.

A. [Continuing.] As I stated in the first place, or if I have not stated I will state, that the first interview I had with Mr. Rerdell was at the Hamilton House at the time referred to in Mr. Rerdell's evidence. It was in September, immediately after his release from prison. I was getting ready to go on my leave of absence, and I had stepped out of the office for a few moments. On my return I found a note on my desk informing me that Mr. Woodward had returned from Connecticut and desired to see me, and wanted me to call at the hotel that evening, which was Saturday. I called at the hotel, and he gave me instruction to be at the hotel the next morning. The next morning I was at the hotel, and I found Mr. Rerdell was there. That was the first interview I had with Mr. Rerdell, and on that day I received my instructions from Mr. Woodward. Mr. Rerdell and I had one or two interviews after that. After my return from my leave of absence, perhaps not far from the middle of November, the 10th, or 11th, or 12th, somewhere along there, he came to see me, and after a short conversation he stated that he was going to Hartford. In all the interviews that Mr. Rerdell and I have had since then he has sought me.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I am not talking about that.

The WITNESS. I desire to say that.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I am not talking about that, but about the signals.

The WITNESS. I desire to make my explanation.

The COURT. You have that privilege.

The WITNESS. I am coming to the signals.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Start at the signals.

A. [Continuing.] I told him that I could not be confined to my room all the time, and if I must see him I must know when. Whether I said this first, or he said it to me, I cannot just now remember, but at all events he told me that whenever he desired to see me he would notify me by looking at the clock, and I would understand by that that he wanted to see me that evening at my room, and that I must not go out. Those were the signals.

Q. Was that during the trial?—A. Yes, sir; that was during the trial.

Q. Had the jury been selected when that signal was agreed upon?—

A. Yes, sir; and the trial had progressed some weeks.

Q. Did he meet you by virtue of such signal?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And talked to you?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you report the conversations?

The WITNESS. To whom?

Mr. INGERSOLL. To anybody.

A. Sometimes I did.

Q. To whom?—A. To the Government counsel.

Q. To Mr. Merrick, Mr. Bliss, or Mr. Ker?—A. Sometimes to Mr. Merrick and sometimes to Mr. Bliss.

Q. And Mr. Ker?—A. Never to Mr. Ker in the world, I think.

Q. At that time Mr. Rerdell was sitting with the defendants, was he?—A. Mr. Rerdell had not read his statement in open court.

Q. He was then sitting with the defendants?—A. I do not know whether he was sitting with them; he had not come out.

Q. He was not sitting between the Government attorneys, as he afterwards was, was he?—A. No, sir.

Q. He met you from day to day to tell you what?—A. I have not said he met me from day to day to tell me.

Q. He met you, you say, at your house according to a signal?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And he would tell you something?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. The signal was looking at the clock?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And then you would meet him?—A. No, sir; I do not want it stated in that way—that I would meet him. I did not go from my room. Don't try to warp what I say.

Q. He came to you?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. To tell you something?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. About what; about this case?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did he tell you what the defendants were doing?—A. I cannot remember now what he told me.

Q. State in a general way.

The COURT. You must confine your cross-examination strictly to the subject under investigation, and that is to what passed between Rerdell and the witness touching this matter of the selection of the jury.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I don't want to know the exact things that he told him, but I want to know generally. I want to know if he told him what the defense were doing or saying.

The COURT. That is another subject altogether.

Mr. INGERSOLL. It is a subject cousin-german to this thing.

The COURT. We will not go into the cousin-german.

Mr. INGERSOLL. It is a direct brother, and he opened it himself.

The COURT. We will not go into the brother. Keep to the subject itself.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I want to know whether he was told by the Government counsel to stop receiving reports from Rerdell.

The COURT. I do not think that is proper. The inquiry must be strictly confined, especially at this stage of the case, to the subject to which the witness was called. The witness was called for a special purpose, simply in regard to the challenging of jurors.

Mr. INGERSOLL. He has now denied having made the arrangement or accepted the proposition made by Rerdell. In making that denial he tells what he did do. What he did do was to have one of the defendants, who was apparently acting with the other defendants, report to him from day to day what the defendants were doing.

The COURT. That was brought out by your cross-examination.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I understand that; but it is just as bad an arrangement as the other, just as devilish, just as infamous. This man, one of the defendants, was sitting with us, hearing our conversations and then taking them to this witness, by this witness apparently to be turned over to the counsel for the Government.

The COURT. Rerdell had given you notice long before.

Mr. INGERSOLL. No, sir; no, sir; no, sir.

Mr. CARPENTER. The first notice we had was when he went on the stand.

Mr. INGERSOLL. He had taken pains to deny in the public prints that there was any truth in it, and up to within two or three days of the time when he went over he had taken pains to borrow money from one of the defendants to buy bread and meat to give him strength to swear against that very defendant. I want to show that he carried this information day after day to this witness and this witness turned it over to the counsel for the Government.

The COURT. The court will not permit any extension of the examination beyond the particular point to which the witness was called.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I would be glad to do it.

The COURT. That point is directly in regard to the selection of the jury. That is what he is admitted for. I would not certainly have allowed him to go on the stand and interrupt the regular course of the proceedings for the purpose of going into the whole field of inquiry in regard to Rerdell's course.

Mr. DAVIDGE. May it please your honor—

The COURT. [Interposing.] I cannot hear any argument, Mr. Davidge; I will not.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I want the witness to produce the list of names given him by Rerdell.

Mr. CARPENTER. He said he will do that.

The WITNESS. I will do that if I can find it.

The COURT. I do not know that the court will even allow that. Your inquiry is in relation to the selection of the jury and whether the arrangement spoken of, or this statement of Rerdell's, brought any agent of the Government into collusion with Rerdell as to the selection of the jury?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes.

The COURT. It must be confined to that particular point, and not go beyond it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I am confining it to that particular point—in regard to the list of four names which Rerdell gave him.

The COURT. No matter at all what names were on that list.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Let us see what names were on it.

The COURT. No, no; it is simply a question whether this was a proposition of Mr. Rerdell's own conception, or whether it was agreed upon by the agent of the Government.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Admit that it was not agreed upon by the agent of the Government, then let us take the next step and show that it was acted upon, and the list of names will show that the persons named on that list were challenged from the jury.

The COURT. That would be going into too large a field entirely at this time. The witness has stated what he is able to testify to in regard to what took place yesterday. It was charged yesterday in the speech of Mr. Wilson that this was an agreement entered into between a Government agent and Rerdell in regard to the selection of jurors. The simple question is whether there was such a stipulation or agreement between Mr. Blackmar and Mr. Rerdell. [The witness here spoke to the court in an undertone.] He says his recollection is refreshed, and he wants to state one thing.

The WITNESS. It is matter about which my memory is now thoroughly refreshed. You asked me if I gave Mr. Merrick a list of names. This occurred along in the early part of November. I could not have furnished him a list of names at that time. The first report I made to Mr. Merrick was this fact of Rerdell being willing to challenge a juror. I reported that to Mr. Merrick, and he was very much offended and was very emphatic about it, and gave me my instruction that the proposition could not be entertained. Said I, "What must I do? This is disagreeable for me, and I want instructions." Said he, "You cannot be prevented from listening, and it is your duty to listen, to what is said to you; but the matter of protecting him by ourselves consenting that he shall challenge jurors on behalf of the Government in any manner cannot be entertained." That list I referred to never went out of my room, and I could not have given it to Mr. Merrick then or afterwards, nor to any one else. I am positive about that, and I wish it so understood.

By Mr. DAVIDGE:

Q. You gave the names or the list to Mr. Merrick, I understand?—

A. No, sir; I never gave it to him, because this occurred early in November, and the names were not produced then.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I understood you to say that you gave the names to Mr. Merrick.

The WITNESS. I was not in the court-room; Mr. Rerdell came to my house without me knowing that he was coming, and he said that it had gone so far that he would give me the names, and he wrote down a list of the names, and said he, "These names are the names of the jurors that I am going to challenge."

By Mr. INGERSOLL:

Q. Who wrote the list?—A. Mr. Rerdell wrote it.

Q. Let me read this:

Q. Had you agreed that if the court allowed each defendant to challenge four, you would challenge any four the Government might select for you to challenge?—A. I sent word myself, or, at least, I told Mr. Blackmar I was willing to do that.

Was he to select the jurors, or were you to do it?—A. I certainly was not.

Q. Was the Government to select the jurors?—A. The Government was not to do it.

Q. Then, what did he offer to do?—A. He offered to challenge certain men on the jury, whose names he furnished on the list.

Q. And he selected them?—A. Certainly.

Q. And not the Government?—A. Not the Government.

Q. Had he any means of knowing whether the Government wanted those four or did not want them?—A. Not that I know of.

Q. When he said that the Government would select them, was that true?—A. I cannot tell whether it is true or not. If it is in any conversation with me I can answer it and say emphatically that it was not so.

The COURT. So far as you are concerned?

The WITNESS. Yes, sir.

Q. Here are the questions to Mr. Rerdell, on page 2521:

Had you agreed that if the court allowed each defendant to challenge four, you would challenge any four the Government might select for you to challenge?—A. I sent word myself, or, at least, I told Mr. Blackmar, I was willing to do that.

Now, did he tell you that he was willing to challenge any four the Government might select?

Mr. KER. I want the answer all read. Mr. Ingersoll has no right to stop reading in the middle of it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I have a right to stop where I please.

Mr. KER. I submit that the answer should all be given.

The COURT. Read the whole of it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. [Reading:]

Had you agreed that if the Government allowed each defendant to challenge four, you would challenge any four the Government might select for you to challenge?

That is the question, and now I will read the answer:

I sent word myself, or, at least, I told Mr. Blackmar, I was willing to do that.

The point is, was the Government to select the jurors, or was he to select them. The rest of the answer is:

To show my good faith to the Government.

That has nothing to do with it at all. The point was whether he was to select them.

The COURT. Then it will do no harm to read it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. And it will do no good.

Q. Did he offer to let the Government select the four jurors for him to challenge?—A. He offered to; yes, sir.

Q. Was he to select them, or was the Government?—A. I do not know. So far as I know, his answer there is positively untrue. There was no arrangement made whatever whereby the Government was to furnish a single name to challenge.

The COURT. He did not say that.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Let me read it again:

Q. Had you agreed that if the court allowed each defendant to challenge four, you would challenge any four the Government might select for you to challenge?—A. I sent word myself—

That is the first part of it—or, at least, I told Mr. Blackmar, I was willing to do that, to show my good faith to the Government.

Now let us go on :

Q. At the same time that you were sitting with the defendants as a codefendant ?—

A. Yes, sir.

Q. You told Mr. Blackmar you were willing, if the court allowed you, to challenge four men ; to challenge the four that the Government should suggest ?—A. No, sir ; not that the Government would suggest ; that Mr. Blackmar would give me.

Q. Is that true, Mr. Blackmar ?—A. That is not true.

Q. You understood that he was on the side of the prosecution ?—A. Oh, certainly.

Q. Do you now tell the jury that you at that time made that proposition ?

That is, the proposition for the Government to select four jurors.

A. I think I did.

Q. Did you afterwards endeavor to carry it out ?—A. I did.

Q. Did you while sitting with the other defendants tell them that you would in good faith try to challenge four men that you thought might be friendly to the defendants ?—A. I did.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Now I ask Mr. Blackmar if it is true that he made a proposition that the Government was to select four names ?

The COURT. [To the witness.] You can answer that.

A. He made the proposition that he would challenge four men.

Q. Who was to select the four men ?

The COURT. What was his proposition ?

A. His proposition was to exercise his right as one of the defendants to challenge, and that the Government might have the benefit of it.

Q. As a matter of fact, do you know whether he tried to carry it out ?—A. I do not know, sir. I was not in court when the jury were made up.

The COURT. The simple point is whether you agreed to his proposition.

The WITNESS. I emphatically refused to do so

The COURT. The inquire this morning is whether Mr. Blackmar, representing the Government, agreed to what Rerdell proposed.

The WITNESS. I received my instructions early in November from Mr. Merrick.

Q. Did you give Mr. Rerdell any names of any jurors to be challenged ?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did you receive from any Government officer—counsel or no matter what—any names to be given to Mr. Rerdell to be challenged ?—A. No, sir.

The COURT. That is going beyond the limits, but still——

Mr. INGERSOLL. [Interposing.] It is in favor of the other side, if the court please.

The COURT. The answer makes it so.

Mr. INGERSOLL. He has already said substantially that.

Q. Now, I understand you substantially to say that you did not give the list. By the list, do you mean the paper, or do you mean the names ? Do you now say that you never gave the names that were written on the list to any other Government officer than yourself ?—A. I certainly did not give the list ; that I am positive of.

Q. Did you give the names ?—A. I don't think I did ; I cannot say positively just at this moment. I have tried to refresh my memory by reading Rerdell's testimony, in order that I might give a truthful answer. I am quite confident I furnished no list whatever.

Q. Do not say list. Did you furnish names ? The list you did not furnish, I know.—A. I am not so confident about the names.

Q. You will not state whether you gave the names or not ?—A. I cannot say positively about that.

Q. What position did you then occupy in the Government?—A. Clerk in the Post-Office Department.

Q. Had you been assigned to any particular duty in this case? That is what I want to know.—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What?

The WITNESS. Since the trial began?

Q. What was your position at that time?—A. I was clerk in the Post-Office Department detailed to assist the counsel in whatever they might call upon me to do, I suppose.

Q. How long before that time were you detailed?—A. I think as long ago, colonel, as September, 1881; I think it was September, 1881.

Q. At the time you had this conversation with Mr. Rerdell had he agreed to go over to the Government?—A. I don't know anything about that.

Q. You made no agreement with him?—A. No, sir; I made no agreement with anybody.

Q. What was the first time that you remember that you met Mr. Rerdell?—A. I do not know that I ever met Mr. Rerdell to speak with him until about the 17th or 18th of September, 1882, last year.

Q. How often did you meet him during the trial up to the time he went on the stand?—A. I could not say, colonel.

Q. A great many times?—A. Not a great many.

Q. Was it a part of your business to meet him?—A. No, sir; I cannot say that at all. I did not meet him; he met me.

Q. Were you instructed to see him?—A. I was not instructed to see him, particularly. I was not instructed to turn him away from my door if he came to my room. I was instructed to listen to what he had to say.

Q. And to take it down?—A. I was told that my instructions were to listen to what he said to me or to others.

Q. Did you write it down at the various times?—A. I am very happy to say that I never wrote a word of what he said.

Q. You reported it from memory?—A. No, sir.

Q. You did not report it at all?—A. I did.

Q. Who did write it down?—A. Mr. Rerdell wrote down whatever was reported.

Q. And you handed it to others?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. To whom did you hand it?—A. Generally, to Mr. Bliss.

Q. Who else?

The COURT. That is going beyond the limits of this inquiry. Mr. Blackmar has been engaged openly here in handling the papers; we all know that.

Q. Do you know where those papers are that Mr. Rerdell wrote and handed to you—those propositions and statements that he wrote and gave to you and which you gave to Mr. Bliss?—A. I do not.

The COURT. That is going beyond the limit again.

Q. In order that there may be no mistake about it, I ask you if you, in conversation with Mr. Boone yesterday (I mean A. E. Boone) in the court-house, said that the arrangement you made with Rerdell was made under authority from the Government counsel?

[The witness spoke to the court in an undertone.]

The COURT. Let me hear the question.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I told him that Mr. A. E. Boone was the Boone I meant before when I just used his surname, Boone, and I asked him whether he said to Mr. A. E. Boone in the court-house on yesterday that the arrangement he made with Rerdell was made by the authority of the Government counsel, and that he did not propose to bear the burden.

The COURT. You have asked him that already.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I want to know whether the witness says any such conversation occurred between himself and Mr. A. E. Boone at any time or place.

The WITNESS. I never told anybody that the arrangement I made with Rerdell was by authority of the Government, because I made no arrangement with Mr. Rerdell.

Q. Was the proposition put in writing by Rerdell to challenge any four jurors that might be selected by the Government?—A. I don't think that was. I think his first interview was early in November after his return from Hartford, and I do not think that was put in writing. I won't be positive about it, but I am quite confident.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is all, except that I want the list of the four names.

The COURT. The witness pronounced a statement made by Rerdell as untrue. I think this was the question he referred to, which was asked of Rerdell :

Q. You told Mr. Blackmar you were willing, if the court allowed you, to challenge four men ; to challenge the four that the Government should suggest.

And here is the answer of Rerdell :

No, sir ; not that the Government would suggest ; that Mr. Blackmar would give me—

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes, sir.

The WITNESS. Did I say that was not true ?

The COURT. I think you did, though I did not believe you understood it.

The WITNESS. I did not understand it. I mean to be understood as saying that no such proposition whatever was entertained. No names were taken or given ; that is, I gave no names whatever.

Q. You said you took four names?—A. I said he gave me the names.

Q. And you said you took them?—A. I did not say I took them, but I wrote them down. Perhaps there were more than four names.

Q. The question is, was he——

The COURT. [Interposing.] The whole thing has been gone over, and I only put that one question to him because I thought he did not understand it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I want the court to put it so that we will understand whether that is true or not. He stated once that it was not true, and now he says that it is true that he made a proposition that he should challenge the four men that Mr. Blackmar would suggest.

The WITNESS. I cannot deny that. I cannot say that that was untrue.

Q. So you do not know now whether his proposition was that you were to furnish the names, or that he would furnish the names ?

The WITNESS. That Mr. Rerdell was to furnish the names ?

Q. Were you to furnish them, or was he to furnish them?—A. I certainly did not furnish them.

Q. Were you, or was he?—A. I cannot say.

By the COURT :

Q. What was his proposition to you?—A. To challenge four jurors.

By Mr. INGERSOLL :

Q. That you would suggest, or that he would suggest?—A. That was not entered into at all.

Q. Sir?—A. That was not stated. He came to me and said he was going to challenge four jurors. That is the way he said it.

Q. And that is all he said?—A. No; it was not all he said, but I cannot remember what else he said. That was the proposition.

Q. Were those four jurors to be challenged in the interest of the Government, or in the interest of the defendants?—A. In the interest of the Government, as I supposed.

Q. Were they to be suggested by the Government?—A. No. He made the list right on the spot, right then, and that is the list that he said he intended to challenge.

The COURT. That will do. Now, we have gone over the whole matter.

Q. I want to know whether he said the men whose names were on that list given to you were friendly to the defense, or to the prosecution?—A. Nothing was said about that.

The COURT. [To the witness.] That will do, sir.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Will the court allow us to call Mr. Boone?

The COURT. No.

Mr. DAVIDGE. We have laid the foundation for the introduction of the evidence of Mr. Boone.

The COURT. The court is not going to open this whole trial; I do not know where it would run, if that was done.

Mr. DAVIDGE. He would be very explicit, and, as I think, would throw a great deal of light upon the subject.

The COURT. What he would say might be explicit or it might not be, and it might be credible or it might not be.

Mr. INGERSOLL. He is a Government witness.

The COURT. Yes.

Mr. DAVIDGE. This is his imprimatur, and he must be credited, I suppose.

The COURT. I am not going any further.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Will the court allow us to ask S. W. Dorsey about the conversation?

The COURT. No.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Well, we except.

The COURT. [To Mr. Wilson.] We will not charge you with this hour.

The reason I decline to allow these other witnesses to be called is this: This witness was called out of time and out of place by consent of counsel, and he could not be examined beyond the reach or consent of counsel.

Mr. DAVIDGE. They have not objected to the calling of Mr. Boone.

The COURT. They gave their consent to Mr. Blackmar.

Mr. DAVIDGE. They have not objected to Mr. Boone yet, or to Mr. Dorsey.

The COURT. It does not need an objection, and I cannot hear anything more. You can go on, Mr. Wilson. I will not open this matter any further. I did not suppose it would take ten minutes.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Nor I.

The COURT. It has taken an hour.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I supposed the whole thing was reopened in the interest of the administration of justice.

The COURT. So it is.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I did not think it depended in any degree upon either side. It was a flagitious, malicious interference with the administration of justice which has been brought to the knowledge of your honor, and your honor very properly, in my judgment, determined that a matter of that sort ought to be cleared up at once. Hence, I could not understand, pending the examination, the ruling of your honor touching examination-in-chief or cross-examination. I never regarded a matter of this sort, involving the dignity of the court, as subjected to the ordinary rules of evidence, where a witness is put upon the stand by either one side or the other. I have regarded this man as a witness called by the court, as you might call anybody to testify about a matter of this sort.

The COURT. This witness was not called by the court.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Not in a strictly technical sense, and yet the court deemed it proper to admit the testimony of this witness, in view of the scandalous and infamous character of the transaction. Now, I say that I cannot perceive what the consent of the parties has to do with the matter. Suppose we could put Mr. Boone upon the stand to state what was said yesterday, what was said over and over again in the past. Suppose we put upon the stand S. W. Dorsey, and he testified as to what was yesterday represented to him; will your honor decide that that is not pertinent in a matter of this sort, affecting the dignity of this court and the administration of justice? For I do not put it upon the narrow ground of parties at all.

The COURT. I cannot at all sympathize with this declamation of the most violent kind which I have listened to yesterday and to-day, charging Government officers with entering into a combination with Rerdell for the purpose of violating the jury law and obtaining improper members of the jury. Rerdell was examined on this subject, and an interpretation was given yesterday by Mr. Wilson to what Rerdell said that produced astonishment in my mind, because in the course of the testimony I was not conscious that any such conclusion could be reached from Rerdell's testimony. But when Mr. Wilson put the construction upon the testimony in regard to that transaction which he did yesterday, and charged corruption upon the part of the agents of the Government in seducing Rerdell—

Mr. DAVIDGE. [Interposing.] Not seducing him, your honor.

The COURT. He was seduced before.

Mr. DAVIDGE. His virginity disappeared some time ago.

The COURT. I say that I was astonished at the suggestion of this attempt upon the sacredness of the jury gotten up between a Government officer on one side and Rerdell on the other, and I called for the evidence upon the subject. The evidence was read, and so far as it appeared, after reading the evidence, I came to the conclusion that it was a suggestion of Rerdell's received in silence by Mr. Blackmar. I thought probably that Mr. Blackmar had not done his whole duty, according to Rerdell's testimony, in not denouncing it at the time. But on the face of that evidence I did not see any foundation for the indignation against the course of the Government which has been expressed by counsel, and after reflecting upon the subject during the night I thought it possible, and I thought it most likely, that I had done injustice to Mr. Blackmar in suggesting that he was in fault as well as Rerdell. There was no question about Rerdell on either side. But I thought probably the slight censure which I expressed yesterday with regard to Mr. Blackmar was undeserved, and I did not wish him to lie under that any longer than was necessary, and for that reason I wished to make the correction which I suggested this morning. That correction was merely that I thought I had probably uttered a censure yesterday in regard to Mr. Blackmar which was not deserved. Then it was proposed upon your side to call Mr. Blackmar himself on this subject. I should not have allowed Mr. Blackmar to be called without the consent of the other side. Mr. Ker then rose and said that on his side he was willing to consent that Mr. Blackmar should be examined out of time, out of place, in this irregular way, in regard to this particular point as to whether he had suggested any such scheme as that to Rerdell, or had entertained it, or whether counsel had entertained it after it was suggested. That was the limit of the inquiry and the limit of the consent. Mr. Blackmar's tale has been told, and now you propose to call other witnesses to contradict him in regard to questions which he has answered on cross-examination, and touching his credibility. I have not heard and I did not hear any consent on the part of Government counsel to go further into the inquiry than they have already done.

Mr. DAVIDGE. They have not refused.

The COURT. I know; but it requires positive consent to go further in this irregular way.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Will your honor put the question whether they do consent? For this further examination will take but little time, and it really appears to me that this matter is of the greatest importance, and ought to be cleared up.

The COURT. I do not think it is of any importance myself, or very little, because if an agent of the Government should so violate his duty not only to the Government, but to the administration of justice, as to enter into an arrangement of this kind, I do not think that the case before the court ought to be damaged or prejudiced by the misconduct of such an agent. The administration of justice would be clogged and embarrassed, and, in fact, even overthrown, if agents employed by the Government were to bind the Government by their own misconduct. The Government has to employ agents, and so long as those agents act within the sphere of their duties, the Government will be bound by them. But if they enter into outside operations—as in the case of the Fall business, and other things of that kind that are notorious in this community—those things drawn into the trial ought not to disturb the regular course of the trial.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I did not mean to assert that the Government is bound, but that the spirit of the Government prosecution is illustrated by the conduct of the Government agents.

The COURT. The jury are not bound to try the spirit of the prosecution.

Mr. DAVIDGE. But it is a fact. The spirit of the Government is not unlike the spirit of a man. All that I ask is whether your honor will inquire of the other side whether they will allow the evidence of Boone to be given on that subject at this time.

The COURT. I do not think I would admit it if they would consent, but I will ask them.

Mr. KER. Your honor, I will say that so far as the Government is concerned, we do not ask anything. We have no offer to make at all. I thought it was a judicial inquiry, to which I readily assented, so far as Mr. Blackmar is concerned, and if your honor thinks it ought to go further I am perfectly willing. But what good would it do to indulge the other side by allowing Boone to be called to contradict Mr. Blackmar? It would amount to nothing. Rerdell had been making offers to the Government which had been regularly rejected, and, in order to "show his good faith," as he said, he made the proposition to Mr. Blackmar in regard to challenging the jurors. Mr. Blackmar has nothing to do with the case. He has had charge of the records. According to his testimony, he reported Mr. Rerdell's proposition to Mr. Merrick, and it was instantaneously rejected. What good would it do to go any further? Still, if your honor thinks proper to go farther, I am perfectly willing.

The COURT. I decidedly say no.

Mr. DAVIDGE. That ends it.

Mr. WILSON. I suppose I am the only one permitted to go on. The jury will not charge this time up to me.

Mr. DAVIDGE. It has occupied an hour and a quarter. These judicial inquiries always take longer than any other.

The COURT. They do, I believe.

Mr. WILSON. [Resuming.] May it please your honor, at the adjournment last evening I was about to consider the construction of section 5440 of the Revised Statutes, or the act of May 17, 1879, which is practically the same thing. I know, if your honor please, that that provision of the law has been the subject of a great deal of discussion, and not only in this court, but it has likewise been the subject of discussion and serious controversy in other courts. And up to about the time the testimony closed in this case, none of us had had the benefit of any decision by the Supreme Court of the United States in respect of this statute. I find, as I say, that here is not the first place where lawyers, and even judges, have differed in respect of this law, because it appears now that two distinguished judges of the United States courts, being unable to agree about this thing, certified the case, involving this very statute, to the Supreme Court of the United States. They certified it because they could not agree, as some of us have not been able to agree, as to the true construction of that law. And within the past month the Supreme Court of the United States has passed upon and settled something in respect to this law, and, to the extent to which that court has gone, that decision is now authoritative and the law is settled.

The COURT. As to what point?

Mr. WILSON. I was going to read to your honor the decision, but first let me state a little in regard to this case. I refer to the case of the United States against James H. Britton et al., that came from the eastern district of Missouri.

The COURT. In order that I may comprehend your authority I want to understand the point you make in this case about that law.

Mr. WILSON. I make this point, if your honor please: I was discussing yesterday the point that conspiracy is the crime alleged.

The COURT. Undoubtedly it is.

Mr. WILSON. That the conspiracy is the offense for which these parties are to be punished, if it all. I was careful to say yesterday that this statute had two branches to it.

The COURT. Is that section 5440 or the later statute?

Mr. WILSON. Either of them; they are precisely the same.

Mr. INGERSOLL. They are precisely alike except as to punishment.

The COURT. Yes; I know.

Mr. WILSON. I do not care which you take. It has two branches to it:

If two or more persons conspire either to commit any offense against the United States or to defraud the United States in any manner or for any purposes, and one or more of such parties do any act to effect the object of the conspiracy, all the parties to such conspiracy shall be liable to a penalty, &c.

Now my point is, first, that we have no common-law offenses in this country.

The COURT. In the District of Columbia?

Mr. WILSON. I thought that had been settled by this court.

The COURT. No common-law offenses in the District?

Mr. HENKLE. Against the United States.

Mr. WILSON. Against the United States.

The COURT. In this District?

Mr. WILSON. In this District.

The COURT. I have never agreed with you in that.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Anyway, this indictment is under the statute.

The COURT. Undoubtedly this indictment is under the statute. I have ruled that. The counsel for the Government at the beginning had some doubts. I remember very well that at the former trial that question came up, and Mr. Bliss declined to say whether he stood upon the statute or upon the common law, or had one foot upon the common law and the other upon the statute; and I never had an answer from him exactly as to that. But the court was of the opinion that this was an indictment under the statute.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is sufficient for our purpose.

Mr. WILSON. That is sufficient for the purposes of my argument. But I go a step further, if your honor please: I say that whenever the Congress of the United States legislates upon a particular subject they exhaust that subject, and that the only offense there can be is such an offense as is designated by that legislation.

The COURT. You may take it for granted that the court is going to hold this indictment under that statute.

Mr. WILSON. Section 5440?

The COURT. Or the other; it makes no difference to me which one, because they are the same except as to punishment. I am inclined to think that the later statute, of May 17, 1879, is the one under which we are acting.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Yes; I understood your honor to rule that.

Mr. WILSON. I think there cannot be any question about that.

The COURT. I think I ruled that in the case, and I think you may assume that that will continue to be the ruling of the court.

Mr. WILSON. I am glad to have that intimation from the court that we are proceeding under the statute of May 17, 1879. What does that statute provide, your honor? It provides that if two or more persons shall conspire to commit an offense against the United States, and do an act in pursuance of that, or if two or more persons shall conspire to commit a fraud against the United States, they shall be punished thus and so. Now, my point is this—and this case that I have referred to settles that—I do not know whether your honor has ever seen it or not—the Supreme Court say that it must be some crime which is designated by law as a crime; and although in this very case the indictment charged in so many words that the parties had conspired to violate a particular section of the statute which created a crime, to wit, the willful misapplication of the moneys of a national bank; and the statute provided that the willful misapplication of moneys of a national bank was a crime; the Supreme Court say to the gentlemen who made that indictment, "That will not do; you must set out the means by which that misapplication was to be accomplished; and if those means do not constitute the crime defined by that section prohibiting misapplication, then your indictment is bad." Then that court review the character of the means that were set out in this indictment, and say that those means, if they had done everything set out, would not constitute that offense, and therefore that indictment is bad.

The COURT. Allow me to suggest that you postpone the argument upon that point until the argument upon the facts is closed, when I will pass upon it, and in the mean time I will have an opportunity to examine this decision.

Mr. WILSON. That is entirely satisfactory to me, and if your honor will allow me I will pass up these papers.

The COURT. I should be glad to see them.

Mr. WILSON. There are three cases here, all of which are upon the same statute. You will see that the case No. 407, and the case I have just alluded to are very intimately connected. The cases are of exceeding importance, and I rose, if your honor please, before the argument began at all, to bring your honor's attention to it, but was interrupted by what happened at the time. I thought then it ought to be presented.

The COURT. If rightly presented it may rule this case.

Mr. HENKLE. That would save a good deal of argument.

Mr. WILSON. That is the very reason why I wanted to present it at the beginning, but there were objections interposed and I was prevented from doing it. I thought then that I would bring it to your honor's attention at the earliest opportunity, because I shall ultimately claim that that decision of the Supreme Court makes this indictment just so much waste paper, just so much valuable paper that has been spoiled by having this indictment written upon it.

Mr. DAVIDGE. A good deal of it, too.

Mr. WILSON. But I will postpone what I was going to say, and pass on with my argument to the jury. I am really very glad to be relieved from the discussion of that question this morning.

And now, gentlemen of the jury, I come back to the question I was discussing before you last evening at the adjournment: Did these parties agree together? Did they conspire? That is the great central question in this case. It is the question in this case, and I wish you just here distinctly to understand that I am not contending, nor shall I contend, that the Government must prove by distinct, direct testimony that the parties met together and entered into some formal agreement. Do not understand me as claiming more than I do claim. I want you to understand me as conceding that, while the Government is bound to prove this agreement, it is not bound to prove that these men gathered together around a table and came to a formal, distinct agreement. I am not contending that they are bound to prove by direct testimony that somebody heard them reach this agreement while they were sitting about that table. I am conceding that they may prove this great central and only issue in this case by circumstantial evidence, precisely as you may prove any other fact alleged against a party by circumstantial testimony.

In the nature of things, gentlemen, direct, positive proof of such an agreement is scarcely possible. But in this case, if such an agreement was ever entered into, it was possible. It was possible in this case to prove it directly. Why? Because the Government has made use, as a witness, of one of the very men who, it alleges, entered into this conspiracy with the men on trial. If at any time, in any place, these men ever agreed to do this thing, that man Rerdell could have proved it before you directly. He has come here before you, gentlemen of the jury, in the presence of this court and withdrawn his plea of not guilty, and formally entered his plea of guilty as charged in this indictment. Gentlemen of the jury, either that plea is a lie, or Rerdell is perjured before you. One or the other of those things is inevitably true. And why? He has said before this court, "I am guilty of this offense." And yet he comes here, placing himself upon that witness-stand in the interest of the Government, and he proves, if you believe what he says, that he is not guilty of this offense.

I always want to do a kind thing and a just thing, if I can, to every man, no matter how mean and wicked he may be. That is about all the religion I have, if I have any. I think it is a pretty good religion for this world, whether it will do any good in the world to come or not. But I am going to take some chances on that, and therefore, gentlemen of the jury, I am going to stop right here to do a good thing for this man Rerdell, who has, in every way that he could, by devilish and wicked devices, sought to injure my client. Notwithstanding that, I am going to do him a good turn, if I can. Now, look at this, gentlemen. What has he testified before you, notwithstanding this plea? He has said to you that he was first sent out by Stephen W. Dorsey to assist John W. Dorsey in putting service on these routes; that he had no interest in them in the world except to do a kindly act to Stephen W. Dorsey, who had done many kindly acts to him.

Then what? Why, after these parties separated, Rerdell, holding an office down here under the District government, Stephen W. Dorsey employed as his agent and confidential man to attend to this business for him, and he has told you over and over again, that in all his relations to this case he had nothing to do with it except as a confidential agent and clerk of Stephen W. Dorsey, upon a salary; and that when any paper was to be drawn, any blank was to be filled up, any alteration in a paper was to be made, he was simply the right hand of Stephen W. Dorsey to do that thing at his request. Now, look all through this case, gentlemen of the jury, all through his own declarations as to his relations to this case, and what position has Rerdell occupied in relation to it except that he was the agent, the clerk of Stephen W. Dorsey, simply carrying out the work or doing the work according to the directions of his employer, getting his salary month by month, but never getting a farthing of any of the proceeds of these contracts? Do I overstate it, gentlemen? Do I understate it? Have I not stated it exactly as it is? And I say, if that is true, this man is no more a conspirator than I am; no more deserving punishment than I am; no more than Kellogg or any other of the men who wrote papers and acted as private secretaries to Stephen W. Dorsey.

And yet the fact that this man has pleaded guilty in this case, in the face of these facts, is paraded and held up before this jury for the purpose of persuading this jury to find a verdict against these other defendants. Now, I say if there had been a conspiracy such as these gentlemen talk about, they undertook to prove it by Rerdell, but they have not done it, gentlemen of the jury. But I do not say they are bound to do it. I do not even say they are bound to accept his testimony proving himself not guilty. They are not bound to accept that testimony, and they are not willing to accept that testimony.

I care nothing for the question whether they could or could not have proved it by direct and positive testimony. You will remember that I am conceding, gentlemen, that they have a right to prove this agreement by evidence circumstantial in its character, and that they are not bound to prove a formal agreement by direct testimony. They may prove it by circumstances. And, as all the writers say, in the nature of things it must be proved by circumstantial evidence.

We have, therefore, to consider whether or not the proofs that have been adduced by the Government in this case are sufficient to show that they did thus confederate and agree together. They may prove it, I repeat, by circumstantial testimony. But all the books say and all the courts say that whenever the Government undertakes to prove any case by circumstantial evidence, every circumstance must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt. And the circumstances, when they are all gathered together, and linked one with another, must make an unbroken chain, leading the mind to a conclusion beyond a reasonable doubt, and to the exclusion of any and every other reasonable hypothesis, that the agreement was entered into or the understanding was reached which is charged in the indictment. A distinguished judge, Judge Dillon, said (I read from 3 Dillon, page 621):

The evidence must be such as to exclude every reasonable hypothesis but that of his guilt of the offense imputed to him; or, in other words, the facts proved must all be consistent with and point to his guilt not only, but they must be inconsistent with his innocence. If the evidence can be reconciled either with the theory of innocence or of guilt, the law requires the jury to give the accused the benefit of the doubt and to adopt the former. The burden of proof does not shift in criminal cases. It is on the prosecution throughout to establish the defendant's guilt by the evidence, and in criminal cases the defendant, not being permitted to testify, cannot be called upon to explain or produce any proof until the prosecution, by the evidence it actually produces, establishes the defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt.

I read you that, gentlemen of the jury, for the purpose of showing to you just what the rule of law is in respect of this matter of proving a man guilty by circumstantial testimony. I think in a few words I can show you something of the philosophy of that law. I want to impress this upon your mind, for it has much to do with what I shall say to you hereafter. A man may be environed by a thousand circumstances. A crime has been committed. The circumstances may point towards him as the party who is guilty of that crime. But suppose that these circumstances are all entirely consistent with his innocence, the question is, are you to adopt the theory that he is guilty because they point to him as guilty, or are you to adopt the other theory that he is innocent, because they are entirely consistent with and point to his innocence. The law is a law in the interests of justice, in the interests of the protection of the citizen against unwarranted punishment for crime. It is simply this: That if when you have gathered all these circumstances together, put them together, linked them together, they are consistent with his innocence, you are then bound to find that he is innocent. They may raise suspicions in his mind. Yet if they are consistent with his innocence you are bound to adopt that idea. In order to show that the defendants are guilty of this offense, in order to prove that they did conspire together to do this thing, they must produce to you and all of you evidence that excludes every reasonable hypothesis except that a party is guilty. Now, if they point to guilt and guilt alone, and there can be no reasonable hypothesis other than guilt, then that is sufficient in the eye of the law to warrant a jury in finding a verdict of guilty against a defendant.

I do not believe, gentlemen of the jury, that there will be any serious dispute over the soundness of the proposition which I have just attempted to present to you. Therefore I will presently proceed to examine this case somewhat in detail for the purpose of seeing whether or not it is sufficient to warrant you in finding a verdict against these defendants. The defendants other than General Brady have counsel of their own who are far more capable of discussing the features of the case applicable to them than I am. I will not presume to deal with the part of the case that particularly belongs to them further than as it may be connected with that which it is especially my duty to consider. Now, gentlemen, I ask you to look over the entire field of this case from horizon to horizon, to look it through and through, and to go into every highway and byway of it. I ask you to look into every room and closet and crack and cranny, from cellar to garret of this whole structure, and see if you can find a single solitary act done by General Brady except that he made certain official orders in his capacity as Second Assistant Postmaster-General. Turn it over in your minds now and see if you can find one act. You cannot find a single act; not one.

Now, mark you, gentlemen, they are trying to prove this conspiracy by circumstances. They are trying to prove that my client was in this conspiracy by circumstances. In all the range of circumstances that they have brought to your mind, can you find a thing done by him that was not an official order made by him in the discharge of his duties as Second Assistant Postmaster-General of the United States? Not a single one. In a moment I shall have occasion to call your attention to an authority or two, preliminary to which I want to make this proposition: that no one man can confess another man into a conspiracy. No man out on the street can, by saying that you were in a conspiracy, put you into that conspiracy. No man, in New York or somewhere else, by doing something there, can make you a party to a conspiracy. The agreement of somebody else will not answer the purpose. It must be your agreement. Nobody can make that agreement for you. If the law were otherwise, any man could be drawn into crime, convicted by a jury and lodged in the penitentiary. The law is nothing but a little common sense. It is very much befogged oftentimes for want of common sense, but it is nothing but a little common sense. Your common sense and the common sense of each one of you, gentlemen, teaches you that no man can make you responsible for a crime. He cannot confess you to be responsible for a crime. It is only your own acts, your own doings, your own confessions, that can bind you in the meshes of the law.

Now, remember that they are trying to prove a conspiracy against these defendants. They do not pretend to have proved it directly. Oh, no. They say they cannot do that. They do not even assume to have proved it by Rerdell. They propose to prove it by circumstances, and these circumstances, so far as my client is concerned, are the official orders made by him. What are these official orders, gentlemen of the jury, of which the Government complains as against my client, and against all these defendants, and which are relied upon, so far as my client is concerned, to prove this conspiracy against him as well as them.

Let me enumerate:

1st. They say that he made certain orders for the increase of service on these nineteen routes when such increase was not needed, and he knew that it was not needed. There are three points for consideration as to that class of orders: First, that it was not needed; second, that he knew it was not needed; and third, that he made the order and made it fraudulently for his own gain in connection with the other defendants. That is one class. Then there is another class.

2d. That he made orders for the expedition of service on these routes when such expedition was not needed, and he knew that it was not needed. There are three elements also here: First, that it was not needed; second, that he knew it was not needed; and third, that he made the orders and made them, as a matter of course, fraudulently knowing them not to be needed. There are two points. Now, the next:

3d. That he made orders placing post-offices on these routes, and then gave to the contractors pay for supplying those post-offices with the mail.

4th. That he made orders granting additional pay for increased distance by reason of these new post-offices embraced on these routes.

5th. That he made orders granting a month's extra pay where the service was discontinued or dispensed with.

6th. That he made orders fixing the schedule time on routes, and not adjusting the running of the mail on those routes with other routes with which they were connected.

7th. That he made orders granting pay for expedition in excess of 50 per cent. of the original letting price after the passage of the act of 1880.

8th. That he made orders granting increase of pay prior to the orders for increase of service. That is what they call retroactive orders.

9th. I will mention for convenience that it is imputed as an indication of conspiracy on his part that he omitted, when requested to do so, to increase the running time on a certain route. That, you will observe, is an averment of an act of commission, but they aver that he omitted or refused to do a certain thing that was requested, and that is brought here as an indication that he was engaged in the conspiracy.

At this point (1 p. m.) the court took its usual recess.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. WILSON. [Resuming.] Gentlemen, I said to you before recess, in substance, that whenever the proof relied upon is consistent with innocence it cannot avail to convict. In that connection I desire to consider these alleged orders of General Brady, and see whether they are consistent with innocence of this charge. If I can demonstrate to you, as I think I can, that they are, then they will cut no figure in this case so far as he is concerned, or so far as any defendant in this case is concerned, and the Government will have to look elsewhere than to these orders to satisfy you that he or they conspired. I desire to repeat, and I trust you will bear it in mind, that you cannot prove him or any of these parties guilty of a conspiracy by what somebody else may have said or done. After the conspiracy is established you may consider what is done by one to further the object as against every other, but not until then; and that for the reasons which I stated before recess. In that connection I want to read a single paragraph from the case of The United States against Goldsborough, 7 Bissell, page 188:

If a conspiracy—

be shown to exist the question then follows, were the defendants on trial, or either of them, connected with that conspiracy as parties thereto. To establish the connection of either of the defendants therewith, such connection must be shown by facts or circumstances independent of the declarations of others, or by his own acts, conduct, or declarations, and until this fact is established he is not to be bound by the declarations or statements of others.

Now, I will proceed, gentlemen, to consider these various orders that were made by General Brady which have been introduced in evidence and commented upon by counsel for the Government during the progress of this trial as being evidence tending to prove a conspiracy. It is necessary in order to make myself entirely understood, and I wish in justice to you to read two or three provisions of the statute, and also some regulations that have been commented upon, in order that you may have them in your mind. I read first section 3965 of the Revised Statutes :

The Postmaster-General shall provide for carrying the mail on all the post-roads established by law as often as he, having due regard to productiveness and other circumstances, may think proper.

I want to say right here that Congress establishes these postal routes. The department has nothing to do with them. Whenever Congress sees fit in its wisdom to establish a post route it establishes it, and the executive department of the Government has nothing to do with it, and no control over it. That is a matter that belongs to the legislative branch of the Government. I mention this right in the present connection, so that whenever your minds recur in the progress of this case to the fact that here was a mail route running over a mountain or through a wilderness, it was not made to run over that mountain or through that wilderness by the action of the Post-Office Department, but Congress, having the supreme legislative power in this Government, strung it across the top of the mountain or planted it in the wilderness.

I will pause here just long enough to say that the regulations of the Post-Office Department are not made by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General. They are made by the Postmaster-General, and they are made by him because Congress has authorized him by law to make them, and they become, by operation of the law, law themselves. In other words Congress has authorized the Postmaster-General by a statute to make regulations for the government of that department, and then has provided that those regulations thus made shall have the force of law. During the progress of this case you have had this presented to you, and if some person who never had looked into the subject at all had listened to what has transpired in this case, such person would have supposed that this matter of increase and expedition of service was a new thing that had been devised and put into operation for the express purpose of forwarding a scheme to defraud the Government of the United States. Section 3960 of the Revised Statutes, which is an old statute brought down in the revision, provides as follows :

Compensation for additional service in carrying the mail shall not be in excess of the exact proportion which the original compensation bears to the original service, and when any such additional service is ordered, the sum to be allowed therefor shall be expressed in the order, and entered upon the books of the department; and no compensation shall be paid for additional regular service rendered before the issuing of such order.

Now you see that that bears upon two or three distinct features in this case. First, it provides that where the service is increased or additional service is provided for, the compensation shall not be in excess of the exact proportion which the original compensation bears to the original service. They say that Brady violated that provision of the statute. It further provides :

No compensation shall be paid for additional regular service rendered before the issuing of such order.

They say that he violated that provision, in that he made retroactive orders. I am particular, gentlemen, to bring your attention to these provisions of the law, because presently I propose to take this case as the Government has presented it and see whether there has been a single instance of violation of these provisions of the statute. I will now read to you section 3961 of the Revised Statutes :

No extra allowance shall be made for any increase of expedition in carrying the mail, unless thereby the employment of additional stock and carriers is made necessary, and in such case the additional compensation shall bear no greater proportion to the additional stock and carriers necessarily employed than the compensation in the original contract bears to the stock and carriers necessarily employed in its execution.

Now, you see from these two sections of the statute, gentlemen, that increase of service, that is to say, mere multiplication of trips, as for instance, where there is one trip a week extending it to two trips a week, or three trips a week, or six, or seven, as the case may be, is expressly provided for and contemplated by law. Then, you will observe that the law likewise provides for what is called increased celerity, or, as it has been expressed during this trial, for expedition of service. That is to say, Congress has said to the Postmaster-General, "If it so happens that a mail is being carried on too slow a schedule, if the contract that has been made for carrying the mail does not provide for carrying it as fast as the needs of the people require that it shall be carried, or as rapidly as the harmony of the postal system requires that that particular mail shall be carried, he may increase the speed of that route." It is expressly provided by law that he may increase that speed. It was necessary to have that authority rest in the Postmaster-General, or somewhere else than in Congress. Otherwise they would be running contracts for four years probably on some route that connected with some other route at too slow rate of speed and with no power to increase that rate to make it conform to the general wants of the system and to the general developments of the country. You will see, gentlemen, that if they were simply going to multiply the trips there would be no trouble about the compensation, because if the amount given for one trip a week was $100, the amount for two trips a week would be $200. That is the provision of the law in regard to increase of trips. But when you come to this other matter of increase of speed, then you have got a new element. It is the same kind of element that enters into every question involving the doing of something in a shorter space of time than it has been done heretofore. For instance, if you start to run a steamship across the ocean it will require so much power to make it go five miles an hour. But if you undertake to drive it ten miles an hour, can you do it for the same cost? Everybody knows you cannot. Suppose you were running a railroad train ten miles an hour and put up the rate of speed to forty miles an hour. Then the proportion of cost to the speed is very greatly increased. It does not simply multiply by the number of miles per hour that you put on, but every additional mile you put on per hour you more than in the same proportion enhance the cost of that transportation. That is a rule that is recognized in physics. Science recognizes it. Everybody knows it. Therefore, when you come to this feature of the case you have introduced an entirely different and exceedingly difficult problem to solve. How are you going to get at just exactly what is the additional compensation that ought to be paid when a party is required to increase the speed? When a horse can walk all day he can perhaps go twenty or twenty-five miles; but if you are going to put him to a five-mile gait how far can he travel? Any one of you knows how easily you can walk from here to Georgetown. You can saunter along, and when you get there you will not be fatigued. But start and run to Georgetown and see how soon you will be fatigued. Perchance you would give out by the time you got to Ninth street. The same principle prevails in regard to horse-flesh. The same principle prevails everywhere. And therefore Congress had to make a different provision in regard to this matter of increase of speed, and they said what is thus written in the statute, which I have already read to you, that for the purpose of ascertaining you should take the number of men and animals necessary to carry it under the existing schedule or rate of speed, and you should take the number of men and animals that would be necessary on the proposed rate of speed, and that would furnish the ratio. Do you not see, gentlemen, what an element of uncertainty lies right there? I have no doubt some of you gentlemen have had something to do with horses, but whether you have or not, do you not see that here is an element of uncertainty? It is an element of calculation. It is a subject upon which, perhaps, no two men would exactly agree. Recollect now it is not the number of men and horses that were actually used. I will come to that after a while. We are now talking about the number of men and animals that are necessary to be used. Take any two men, and I do not care if they have spent their lives in dealing with horses, they will not agree as to how many are necessary. These contracts have to run for four years, winter and summer, hot and cold. We have to take into consideration the roads over which these mails are to be carried, and a thousand other considerations. There may not be a blacksmith shop from one end of the route to the other, and a man may have to put up his own blacksmith shop to shoe his horses. It is not like this settled country, where at every cross-road you will find a blacksmith shop where a cast shoe can be replaced, or where a broken vehicle can be repaired, or where a driver can stop and get dinner at any place within a mile, or where he can get a horse fed. That is not the kind of situation you have to deal with. We are dealing with a new country. Take two men or a dozen men, and let them sit down to make a calculation, each separately from the other, of how many men and horses would be necessary to carry the mail on the existing schedule. One will say, "I have got to do that for four years?" "Yes." "Will there be bad roads in that four years?" "Yes." "There will be storms. There is uncertainty about getting supplies and all these things. I think that so many will be necessary." Another man sitting right by will make the same calculation and say, "I think so many would be necessary," and that would differ very widely from the first calculation. But when you go into the prospective, the calculation becomes still more difficult. Why? Because you are going to increase the speed, and you have a larger element of calculation and a larger element of uncertainty. You will probably find no two men who would agree in respect to that. It is a matter of judgment; it is a matter of calculation, as to which possibly no two men would ever come to the same calculation. Surrounded with uncertainty as it is, you may not think that this rule of the law and the regulations is a wise rule. Nevertheless it is the rule that has been provided by law, and I want these learned gentlemen at some time or some place in this case to show where my client violated that rule that has been laid down for his conduct. They wanted him to adopt some other rule, to do some other thing. The law says, "This is the way to do this thing," and he did it in that way, and now these gentlemen have the unblushing effrontery to come here and say that because he did not do it in some other way he must be criminal. That is the logic of this argument of these learned gentleman. Let me read you a little further. Here come the regulations:

When it becomes necessary to increase the speed on any route, the contractor will be required to state under oath the number of men and horses required to perform the service according to contract schedule and the number required to perform it with the proposed increase of speed.

The COURT. Mr. Wilson, when was that regulation adopted? I see it is one of the regulations—

Mr. INGERSOLL. [Interposing.] The 1st day of July, 1879. Mr. Brady says there had been a general custom of that kind in the department, but that is the first time it was reduced to writing and formally promulgated.

The COURT. I see it is not contained in the regulations of 1873.

Mr. INGERSOLL. No, sir; I find it in the regulations of 1879.

Mr. WILSON. If I may be permitted to use it I have it here in the report of the Postmaster-General.

The COURT. I think Mr. Kirby was the witness who was examined in regard to these regulations.

Mr. WILSON. Yes.

The COURT. He said that the regulations of 1873 were regarded as in force until the promulgation of these regulations of 1879.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes, sir.

The COURT. But he said that possibly there might have been regulations adopted between the date of 1873 and the date of 1879.

Mr. INGERSOLL. And that he would look.

The COURT. He could not tell by looking at the book of 1879 at what exact time they had been adopted. This regulation No. 620 appears in the book of 1879 for the first time in the published regulations of the department, and it does not show on its face at what time it came into use in the department between June, 1873, and June, 1879.

Mr. INGERSOLL. There is so much testimony I may have forgotten, but my recollection now is that Mr. Kirby, if that was the name of the witness, said he could not find out without looking over a large number of pages, but that he would go and do so.

The COURT. And he never did.

Mr. INGERSOLL. We never heard of him any more, and possibly he did not find it.

The COURT. I know I felt a curiosity to learn at what particular time this regulation No. 620 was adopted in the department, because it was not in force in 1873.

Mr. INGERSOLL. It was not in force until July 1, 1879.

The COURT. It was not promulgated until that time, but may have been adopted between 1873 and 1879.

Mr. INGERSOLL. But there is no evidence to show.

The COURT. It was certainly acted upon in the department before the 1st of July, 1879.

Mr. WILSON. Perhaps I ought not to say it, but it is a regulation that was suggested by General Brady, because the thing was running at loose ends there in the department. Whether that is for or against us I am perfectly willing it should be known. That is the fact.

The COURT. General Brady suggested that regulation.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Himself, sir.

Mr. WILSON. Because there was a loose-jointed way of doing things in the department. I have here a statement of the manner in which they did it, and I will show it to the court.

The COURT. I think Kirby was the first or second witness produced on the part of the Government.

Mr. INGERSOLL. All we know is that the evidence shows it was adopted July 1, 1879. There is no other evidence on the subject.

Mr. WILSON. That is all.

The COURT. The evidence in the case shows it was in practical use in the department prior to that time.

Mr. WILSON. Oh, yes; there is no doubt about that.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That simply shows the promulgation of the order.

The COURT. It shows the promulgation, but does not show when it first came into use.

Mr. WILSON. Oh, no; because it was bound in this particular volume of regulations, that does not show when it went into operation. You recollect the witness said that from time to time the regulations were changed, and that each regulation went into effect from its adoption.

The COURT. Undoubtedly the regulation was adopted between 1873 and 1879. This regulation, of course, does not appear in the published regulations of 1873. It appears first in the published regulations of 1879. Its publication does not show the time when any particular regulation which had been adopted between these two dates went in fact into use.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The Government failed to prove when this regulation was adopted.

The COURT. They only proved that it was not in force in 1873, and that it was published as a regulation of the department in 1879.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is it exactly.

The COURT. At what particular time between these periods this regulation, No. 620, was adopted by the department has not been shown.

Mr. INGERSOLL. No, sir.

The COURT. But it certainly was in use in the department prior to the time of the publication of these regulations in 1879.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I do not know about that, your honor.

The COURT. The evidence in this case shows it.

Mr. DAVIDGE. It shows they did file these affidavits, but there was no regulation requiring them to be filed and no practice, as I understand. Before that regulation was adopted I have been informed that the Second Assistant would sit down with the contractor and go over the matter and fix it up in that way between them. It was to get rid of that uncertain mode of doing business that it was formulated in the shape of a regulation.

The COURT. It might not have been in the form of a regulation prior to the publishing of the regulations of 1879, but it was in practical use in the department prior to that date. When it was first brought into use we are in the dark; we have no information.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I do not mean to deny that before that time contractors who wanted expedition might file affidavits. That might be. But I do deny that before the promulgation of the regulations the affidavit, if filed, had not the potency that the regulations attached to it afterwards.

Mr. WILSON. I will come back to this after a while, gentlemen, in another connection. I can do it just as well then as now, and I will therefore pass on. I will now read regulation 621:

The Postmaster-General may discontinue or curtail the service on any route, in whole or in part, in order to place on the route superior service, or whenever the public interests, in his judgment, shall require such discontinuance or curtailment for any other cause; he allowing—

Now mark this, because you will see that each one of these paragraphs that I am reading is very pertinent to the matters that we have in hand—as full indemnity to contractor, one month's extra pay on the amount of service dispensed with—

Mark that. He has the right to curtail it at any time he pleases, but he shall allow to the contractor a month's extra pay for the amount of service dispensed with—and a pro rata compensation for the amount of service retained and continued.

Please recollect that. Then the next regulation, No. 622, is as follows :

The Postmaster-General may change schedules of departures and arrivals in all cases, particularly to make them conform to connections with railroads, without increase of pay, provided the running time be not abridged. But an application for schedule change cannot be granted—

Mark it; cannot be granted—

1. Without the assent of the postmasters at the ends of the routes, except in case of manifest necessity.

2. Unless agreed to by the contractor, except in cases where the propriety of the change is clearly shown.

3. If more running time is asked than is given in the contract schedules.

Then it cannot be done. Now, gentlemen, as I have said, increase and expedition of the service is not a matter that originated with General Brady. It originated in the statute law of this Government. The idea of giving a contractor a month's extra pay did not originate with General Brady. That originated elsewhere. He had nothing to do with it. I told you on yesterday that the form of contract was prepared by the law officer of the Post-Office Department, a man especially selected to look after the legal affairs of the department, and having his office in that department. I told you yesterday that the contracts that were used during a particular contract period with which we are dealing were the same that had been in use by the Government for at least twenty years before General Brady came into the office of Second Assistant Postmaster-General. Now, we have three of these different contracts in evidence in this case. On page 4335 of the record you will find the contract which was in use between the years 1860 and 1870. Let me read you one of the provisions of that contract:

It is hereby stipulated and agreed, by the said contractors and their sureties, that the Postmaster-General may alter the contract, and alter the schedule, he allowing a pro rata increase of compensation within the restrictions imposed by law for the additional service required, or for the increased speed.

Will you mark that——if the employment of additional stock and carriers is rendered necessary.

Away back in 1860 you find this provision lodged in the contracts that were entered into between the Government and those who carried the mails:

But the contractors may, in case of increased expedition, relinquish the contract on timely notice, if they prefer it to the change; also, that the Postmaster-General may discontinue or curtail the service in whole or in part, in order to place on the route a greater degree of service—

As, for example, if a railroad runs over a star route he can stop the stage from carrying the mail and put it on the railroad, and the contractor cannot say nay—or whenever the public interests in his judgment shall require such discontinuance or curtailment for any other cause; he allowing as a full indemnity to contractors one month's extra pay on the amount of service dispensed with, and a pro rata compensation for the amount of service retained and continued.

Those are the stipulations of the contract, gentlemen, binding the contractor and binding the Government in respect of these very things that are complained of in this indictment as having been done by my client. I am not going to take your time, gentlemen, to read precisely the same provision as it occurs in the form of contract that was used from 1870 to 1880—a form of contract adopted, and “kept in stock,” to use the language of one of the witnesses. In 1870—four years or more before my client came to be Second Assistant Postmaster-General—precisely the same provision is found in that contract adopted and used from 1870 to 1880. I have here likewise, gentlemen, the form of contract adopted in 1880 while my client was Second Assistant Postmaster-General, to be used from 1880 to 1890, prepared by the same law officer of the Government and containing precisely the same provisions. Now, if you will please bear that in mind, gentlemen, I will proceed to save your time as well as my own and your patience as well as my strength. I propose to group some of these complaints they have made against my client, and instead of taking them up one by one, and therefore having to travel over the very same ground repeatedly, I propose to take them up in their groups, and see if I cannot dispose of every one of them to your entire satisfaction. I want to see if I cannot demonstrate to the satisfaction of every gentleman on this jury that not one of all these orders, with a slight exception, to which I will refer, was a violation of the law or a departure from any regulation; but that every one of them was perfectly consistent with the law, and it was demanded of General Brady by the contract of these parties which had been entered into between them and the Government.

Take the matter of one month's extra pay. Let us look at that for a moment. I have shown to you that the contract stipulates that when service is dispensed with the contractor is by the contract and by the law entitled to a month's extra pay. In whose interest, gentlemen of the jury, was that regulation made, and in whose interest was that stipulation put in the contract? Was it in the interest of the contractor? No, gentlemen. It was in the interest of the Government, as I will show you. Let us see what the Government wanted to do. It wanted to avoid the danger of being held for damages if it dispensed with service. Let us take this case, and it is not an extreme case either. You remember as a part of the history of this country that there was a mail route established running from over just beyond the Mississippi River clear across to San Francisco, and it was put across there at a time when there was scarcely a hut between the Mississippi River or the Missouri River and San Francisco. The Mormons, it is true, were at Salt Lake City, but there were immense reaches of alkali plains where nobody lived. There were the Rocky Mountains and the Sierra Nevadas to be traversed. Take a route like that. The Government enters into a contract with a man to carry the mail for all those thousands of miles. It requires a vast horde of horses, if I may use such an expression with reference to horses. It requires an army of men. It requires men to take care of these men and protect them, for they traveled through a country inhabited by savages. A man must make a great many preparations in a case of that kind. He must provide himself with horses and with all the appliances to carry the mail, not for a month or for a year, but for four years. After going to all this enormous outlay for the purpose of carrying that mail, the Government comes to the conclusion that it is not needed, and they had better send it around by way of Cape Horn or by the Isthmus and get rid of this route and the expense of operating it, and so they say, acting upon the authority provided by law, "We will discontinue this service," and they have a right to do it. Just see how much damage the Government would lay itself liable to, if it cut that contract up by the roots and left that man with all of this outlay and this preparation and all this stock on his hands. You see the Government would be liable to be mulcted in very heavy damages if that thing was done. Therefore the Government stipulates in the contract and says, "We will reserve to ourselves the right to discontinue this service any day that we please, but you shall not have the right to claim unlimited damages from us. We will settle this question of damages right here on this contract. We will give you one month's extra pay." Now, in the case that I have just put, you will see that that contract would be largely to the advantage of the Government, because the month's extra pay that the party would get would probably in no degree meet the actual loss of the party. Then, on the other hand, there may be a case where the amount of service dispensed with would be comparatively insignificant, and comparatively harmless to the contractor. There the month's extra pay would more than compensate him for the injury that was sustained. So it is a thing that works both ways. That provision is put in these contracts so that the question of damages shall never be open to controversy. They stipulate that "Whenever we dispense with any part of this service we will give you a month's extra pay for that part of the service we thus dispense with."

I need not elaborate that further.

Without going into the details of the particular cases to which they have referred, I invite you, gentlemen, to look into this testimony, and I invite these gentlemen, at the conclusion of this case, to look into this testimony and point out, if they can, a single case where General Brady ever granted a month's extra pay, excepting just such as was demanded by the contract. There is no such case. Why, they say that he granted a month's extra pay in respect of some place where the contractor had not performed the service, as for, example, not running to a post-office that had been put on a route. He was ordered to put it on, but, in point of fact, he did not do it. Have they brought to your attention a single case where he, having knowledge of that fact, granted a month's extra pay to a contractor who had not put the service on? It is an easy matter to bring a witness here three or four years afterwards, who was a mail-carrier, and have him swear that he did not ride to that post-office. That is the way they are trying to make out this case. In point of fact, there is no such case, except one, and there is not a scintilla, a syllable of evidence in this case to show that that fact ever came to the knowledge of the department until long after the matter had been settled and the money paid. He could not do anything else but grant this month's extra pay. It was impossible. The contract stipulated that it should be paid. There was a contract made in that form for the express purpose of protecting the Government against excessive damages, lawsuits, &c.

That is all I have to say about this month's extra pay business.

Now let us look at this matter of retroactive orders. These retroactive orders, they say, had relation to Pagosa Springs, Raton, Brighton, and Fitzalon. What do they say? They say that he made an order, for instance, to-day, to pay a man money from last July. They say that is a retroactive order, and all those I have mentioned are of that character. Each one of those was a case where a new post-office had been put on these several routes. The law is, and the regulation is, as I have just shown you, that whenever increase of service is required, then the contractor is to be paid pro rata. Take, for example, Pagosa Springs or Fitzalon, or any other of these places where a new post-office is established. I explained to you yesterday that the Second Assistant Postmaster-General does not make the new post-offices, but the First Assistant does that. In other words, he orders that the contractor, instead of going along the routes that were established at the time the advertisement was made, and when he took his contract, shall go out of his way to reach this new office, and that increases the distance. Will you tell me, gentlemen of the jury, how it is possible for the Second Assistant to know how much the distance is increased by putting on that route? How should he find out? The First Assistant has made this post-office; he has to put it somewhere, and he puts it on this route as being the most contiguous to the new office. What is the practice of the department, gentlemen? As shown in the testimony in this case—for I am going to keep myself inside of this record—what is the practice in a case like that? It is the simplest thing in the world. As soon as he says to embrace this post-office on this route, then this corresponding clerk sends out what they call a distance circular to the postmaster at the head of the route. That postmaster is required to fill up that distance circular by stating how far it is to the next post-office; he then sends it to the next postmaster, who states upon it how far it is to the next one; it is then sent to the third postmaster, and he states how far it is to the next post-office; it is then sent to this new post-office, and the postmaster there states how far it is to that office and how far it is to where the route again unites with the original route; and so on until you come to the end. That distance circular comes into the Post-Office Department, showing the distance between all those post-offices, including the new one that has been placed upon the route. When that reaches the department it discloses the fact that there has been an increase of the length of that line. Now for that increased length, they make to the contractor a pro rata compensation. The order embracing the office on the route is made, we will say, on the 1st of July, and the contractor is notified immediately, and he puts on the service, we will say, on the 1st of July. Of course there will be a few days intervening in order to have the papers reach him, but we will say for convenience that he puts on the service on the 1st of July. Then this distance circular goes out, he all the time carrying the mail, you recollect, backward and forward, while this distance circular is traveling around among the post-offices to gather up the necessary information. After awhile, probably two or three months afterwards, it comes back to the Post-Office Department, showing what the increased distance is, and then the Second Assistant Postmaster-General makes his order, saying, "Pay this man from the day that he commenced this service."

And yet, because orders were made to pay contractors for performing service that they were ordered to perform, these gentlemen come here and say that they are retroactive orders and violations of law. They are not, in any sense, retroactive orders. The order was made to supply this post-office with this service, and the contractor goes on and performs that service, and just so soon as the department can find out what his pay is under the contract and under the law, they direct that he be paid for the service that he has thus rendered. And because my client was following the regular practice and custom of the department time out of mind these gentlemen come to you here and say that that is an indication of conspiracy and fraud.

On this branch of the case let us take the post-office you have heard so much about, Raton, and you will pardon me for coming back to Raton after awhile, in another connection, when I come to deal with the route itself. But for the purposes of my present point I want to see if I can clear this thing up as I go along. On page 1028 of this record you find a jacket, which they have put in. It is dated—

June 6, 1878. State, Colorado.

Then, down at the bottom of it:

Embrace Raton, next after Trinidad, from July 1, 1878, without change of distance or pay.

BRADY.

Now, there we stood. The service was put on, as the records show. That was Brady's order, to embrace it without change of distance or pay. On page 1031 comes the next thing in this order.

Mr. GREENE. (a juror). May I ask whether the order putting on Raton was made by the First Assistant Postmaster-General, or by the Second Assistant?

Mr. WILSON. The First Assistant simply creates the post-office. Then the Second Assistant Postmaster-General's Office has to supply it with mail. Now, the Second Assistant had determined how he would supply that office with mail, and he made an order to embrace it on this route (Trinidad to Madison) next after Trinidad.

Mr. GREENE. I understood a while ago that the First Assistant made the post-offices?

Mr. WILSON. Yes; that is right.

Mr. GREENE. He makes the post-offices, and the Second Assistant directs them to be put on the route; is that the idea?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir; that is it. The First Assistant says, "We will have a post-office right here," and having established that post-office, he gives notice to the Second Assistant's office, or to that of the Postmaster-General, as the case may be—we will say, for the purposes of the case, to the Second Assistant—saying, "I have made a post-office right here; now you supply it with mail." And when the First Assistant has done that his duty with that is ended. Then comes the duty of the Second Assistant. What is that? To supply it with mail. So, the First Assistant having made a post-office at Raton, the Second Assistant, on the 6th of June, 1878, directed, by an order, that the office be embraced on the route from Trinidad to Madison, next after Trinidad, and his order was "without change of distance or pay."

Now let us see what comes next: After that had been put on by Brady, on the 13th of November, 1878, this occurs (I read from the jacket on page 1031):

The office of Raton was embraced on this route from July 1, 1878, without change of distance or pay. It now appears from d. c. that the distance was actually increased twenty-three miles. Contractor now asks pro rata pay for increased distance.

Now, there is a sample case, where a post-office was put on a route. Brady ordered that to be done. He said to do that without change of distance or pay, and to put it on this route. Very well. Then the distance circular went out in the manner in which I have already indicated, and after a while, away down in November, it comes back. The other occurred in June. The distance circular comes back in November, and they find by that that the distance has been increased twenty-three miles. How do they find out that the distance was increased? Why, as I have already told you, by the certificates of the postmasters along the route. They state to the Department, "You have increased this distance twenty-three miles," and the distance circular shows that there was an actual increase of twenty-three miles. The contractor now asks pro rata pay for that increased distance. Was he not entitled to it under the law and under his contract? Had not the contract stipulated that if they increased the distance they would pay him pro rata? Certainly; and because Brady did not violate that contract, these gentlemen come here and say to you that that is an evidence of fraud. Was there ever anything more absurd? And yet the absurdity of this does not stop there, gentlemen. Let me read you the order:

Modify order of June 6, 1878—]

That is the one Brady made—

No. 4215, so as to increase distance twenty-three miles, and contractor's pay $172.75 per annum, being pro rata.

Who made that order? Brady? No, sir; it was made by French. Need I say anything more about that? It seems to me not. In the first place, Mr. French was justifiable in making that order for that pay, because, as I say, the contract not only authorized, but required it. But it is carrying the joke of this case a long way to seek to make Brady responsible for the order which was made by French.

Now, let us go a little further. Let us take Pagosa Springs. And here I am afraid I shall have to confess, gentlemen, that they have the advantage of us just a little. It is the only place in all this case where I have been able to find that they have a little the advantage of us, and I am not sure that they have here. Perhaps the apparent difficulty is caused by a 1 being printed for a 7. However that may be, I am going to take the record as printed, without referring to the original papers, for the purpose of this argument. Pagosa Springs was a post-office that was put on the Ojo Caliente route, as you remember. You will remember that my Brother Ingersoll, after the Government had exhausted itself and had not given you any very definite information in regard to this matter, took the trouble to go to the department and fish out a lot of records in respect of Pagosa Springs. But for the purposes of my argument I will confine myself to what the Government itself has shown in this case. The order in reference to Pagosa Springs was made on the 24th of April, 1879, and the recital in respect of that order on this jacket is this:

July 7, 1878, the office of Pagosa Springs was established on this route.

That is enough for us. My Brother Ingersoll need not have worn out his shoe-leather in going to hunt these things up, for the Government brought here the record evidence of the fact that on the 7th of July, 1878, Pagosa Springs was established on the Ojo Caliente route.

What further? The distance circular indicates that the distance was thereby increased twenty miles. That is to say, just the same process had been gone through as before. Pagosa Springs had been put on on the 7th of July, 1878. This distance circular came back, and it showed that the distance had been increased twenty miles. Now follows the order:

1. From July 1, 1878, allow contractor $190.62 per annum additional pay, being pro rata, on twenty miles' increase in distance, caused by embracing Pagosa Springs next after Park View.

2. From July 1 to Dec. 31, 1878, allow subcontractor $125 per annum additional pay, being pro rata.

So you see, gentlemen of the jury, this is one of those cases which they call retroactive; and you will remember, gentlemen—I will not stop to turn to the evidence—that we called back upon the witness-stand Jaramillo and Anthony Joseph, who carried the mail on that route, and showed by them that they did carry the mail to Pagosa Springs. We did that simply for the purpose of closing the mouths of this prosecution, so that they never could be able to say that we were paying for service that was not actually performed.

Mr. INGERSOLL. What page was that order on?

Mr. WILSON. 1152.

Mr. DAVIDGE. How much would it amount to in money for those six days?

Mr. WILSON. Now, Mr. Davidge, you can calculate that at your leisure; I have not time to do it.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Three dollars I make it.

Mr. WILSON. Pagosa Springs was put on the route on the 7th of July. After the distance circular came back the order was to pay from the 1st of July. They have got us there for those six days at the rate of $190 a year. It does seem as though that was put back there six days before Pagosa Springs was put upon the route, and to that extent, as I said awhile ago, they have rather got us, to use a vulgar phrase. I hardly think, gentlemen of the jury, that you will believe that General Brady dated that back six days too far, for his proportion, as they say, of that six days' compensation. That is getting this enormous conspiracy down to proportions entirely too small. It would be an insult to your intelligence, gentlemen of the jury, to argue before you that General Brady was not moved to make that order six days too soon for the amount of money that would come out of it, according to the theory of the prosecution.

Then there is Fitzalon. This is on the route from Kearney to Kent. The jacket is on page 589, dated May 3, 1878:

From July 1, 1878, embrace Fitzalon next after Sweetwater.

That is signed by Brady. I must give Brady credit for all the good things he did in supplying these people with postal facilities, and I want him to have credit for that. The next order was made on the 24th of September:

Allow contractor $112.24 per annum additional pro rata for 15 miles increase for Fitzalon, from July 1, 1878.

That is the time when it was put on. So that when they made the distance, as I have stated, then they made this allowance to the contractor for the service that he was required to perform.

That is all I shall have to say, gentlemen of the jury, in regard to these retroactive orders.

Now, we come to another class, and I am going to speak of them in a group. They say that Brady exceeded this 50 per cent. law. What is their point about that? They say that on the 7th of April, 1880, Congress passed an act making this provision:

That the Postmaster-General shall not hereafter have the power to expedite—shall not have the power to expedite the service on any contract, either now existing or hereafter given, to a rate of pay exceeding 50 per centum upon the contract as originally let.

You see, gentlemen of the jury, that that statute is expressly confined to expedition of service and not increase of trips. By that statute Congress said, "If you expedite a route after the passage of this act you shall not allow for the expedition more than 50 per cent. of the price as the contract was originally let." The misfortune of these gentlemen, in respect of this class of cases, is that not a single case of expedition is brought to your knowledge after the passage of that act. There is none such in evidence.

How do they undertake to make this a violation of that law, gentlemen of the jury? They say that prior to the passage of that law contracts had been let and they had been expedited; as, for example, here was a contract that was being run in one hundred hours, and, when it was perfectly lawful to do so and before this act was passed, that time was expedited to fifty hours. When it was expedited to fifty hours there was a contract existing between the Government and the contractor to carry the mail in fifty hours for a specified sum, and that was the condition of these contracts that they talk about when this law was passed. After the law was passed, as I have said, there was no expedition. All that was done after that was to increase the trips; that is to say, here was one trip a week in fifty hours. That is the condition into which the contract had come at the time of the passage of this law. It afterwards becomes necessary to make two trips a week, we will say, for the convenience of illustration. What does he do? He simply gives for the two trips just twice what was being paid for the one. He did not change the time of carrying the mail one whit. Now, how are you to say that that was a violation of this statute? And yet, gentlemen, these gentlemen parade it as such. Why, gentlemen, the theory of their argument must be this—and the absurdity of it is right upon its face: Here is a party carrying mail once a week in fifty hours at a certain price. They say now that he has got to put on an additional trip. I am assuming, for the purposes of the argument, that it is necessary to have an additional trip. What is to be the pay for that additional trip? Is it to be some different rate of pay from the other trip? Is he to be carrying one trip for $1,000 per trip and the other trip for $100? Is that the meaning of this law? Will anybody suppose that this law was intended to work out any such absurd results as that?

But I need not go into any minutiae about it. I say that the statute in terms says that if he expedites he shall not exceed 50 per centum of the price at the original letting. Now let them produce a case where he expedited one. None such exists, nor do they pretend that any such exists. And yet, by the way, these gentlemen have urged this thing upon you as being an indication of fraud upon the part of my client. My Brother Ker took it up and chewed it over; then he laid it aside, and came back and picked it up and chewed it over again and again. And after it had been thus handled for about seven days, my Brother Bliss comes in, and he takes up the same old "chaw," and chews it over again and again ad nauseum. And that is all there is of it, and there is nothing of it, gentlemen of the jury.

There is another class of orders, gentlemen. They say that in making orders Brady did not separate that which was for increase of trips from that which was for expedition, because, in the order it was not stated that so much was for trips and so much was for expedition; and consequently that must be a violation of law. They say that there was some purpose evidently to hide something, because in those orders they said it was less than pro rata. Now, there was a cat in that meal-tub; there was some scorpion in that grass; there was a fraud hidden away in that. Let us see how much there is in that. You know the law is that for increase of trips you simply multiply. If it is one trip now, and they are going to make it three, they multiply by three. If it is one trip at $900, and they want to make it two trips, that would be $1,800. That is very simple. There is no trouble about that part of it. Now, the $1,800 with some other sums added to it has the expedition in it. They say we have not separated them. How long does it take you to separate a case of that kind? You know that the increase of trips is simply multiplication of the original sum by the number of trips, and the balance is expedition. It is a mere matter of mathematical calculation, a mere matter of subtraction. That boy over there would tell you in two minutes how much the expedition would be. And yet, because that formality was not gone through with in the way of cypthering this out, which anybody could see at a glance, they say that that is an evidence of fraud.

There is one other thing in that connection that I want to bring to your attention. There is not a gentleman on this jury that does not know perfectly well that all these things are made up by the corresponding clerk and brought to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General for his signature; and if there is anybody who has committed an oversight in this matter, it is the corresponding clerk, who did not make that separation of these two items.

But is not this too trivial to talk about? Ought I to waste your time further about it? You can see yourselves that what I have said is all there is of it. And they find, I believe it is, two cases of that kind out of these nineteen routes. I will not take your time now, for I may have to refer to it hereafter, to speak further than I have already done as to this putting on of new post-offices and giving pay for the increased distance. I do not think I need to occupy your time further about that.

That leaves, gentlemen, of all these orders, the question of the propriety of those ordering increase and expedition. I had classified these orders, you will recollect, and I have taken up all of them except the orders themselves making increase and expedition, and I come now to consider those, because right in here lies a very great and important question. To those I now invite your attention. You will recollect that this indictment charges that Brady made these orders when they were not needed—the orders for increase of trips when the additional trips were not needed—the orders for the expedition of the service when the expedition was not needed—and that he knew that neither the trips nor the expedition ordered was needed.

I beg first to attract your attention to that which is of very great importance. General Brady was Second Assistant Postmaster-General. That is an office in one of the executive departments of the Government. According to the theory of this indictment that office devolved upon him the performance of certain duties. In the exercise of the functions of that office and in the discharge of the duties imposed upon him by law, according to the theory of this indictment, he had general charge of this mail service. When, for any cause, the question of an increase of trips upon any route arose, it was his duty to decide that question. If a question of increase of speed on any route was brought up the duty of deciding it resided with him. The law made him the judge as to whether increase or expedition should be given. In the nature of things this duty of increasing the service, either by multiplication of trips or by expediting, must rest upon some officer of the Government, and according to the theory of this indictment it rested upon him. Whenever, therefore, any question of that kind arose it was his duty to decide in respect of it. If a new post-office was created it became his duty to determine the manner in which that office should be supplied. If a railroad was constructed along a part of one of these routes it became his duty to determine as to putting the service upon the railroad, so far as constructed, to curtail the other service. If curtailed the contract left him no discretion; he must grant one month's extra pay.

Let us now see what is the logical result of all this. Here is an officer of the Government upon whom the law imposes these duties. He has this vast business to supervise. He has these questions which in the management of these affairs he must decide. Just as the judge of a court, when cases are brought before him, is compelled to decide from time to time the questions that arise, so this officer in another department of the Government is compelled to decide from time to time, as the questions arise, these matters that are committed to him by the law. It would be a fearful position in which to place the judge of a court if you could, from his decision, draw an inference against him in a criminal prosecution. Now what I contend for in this case is simply this: that from the official acts or decisions of a judge who sits upon the bench you cannot draw an inference of criminality, nor can you from the official acts of an executive officer draw an inference of criminality against him; or, in other words, the proof in this case that General Brady made orders in the discharge of his duties as Second Assistant Postmaster-General, even though you may be of the opinion that his orders were not wise orders, amounts to nothing in a case such as this. You cannot sit in review of his judgments. It would be monstrous if an executive officer in the discharge of his duties, doing his duty as he thought it necessary that he should do it, should afterwards be condemned as a criminal because a jury of twelve men should come to the conclusion that his judgment in respect of these matters was not a sound one. Just think of it for a moment. An executive officer, one of these accounting officers in the Treasury Department, for example, or the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, or the Secretary of the Interior makes a decision in a given case, as they are making decisions in many cases every day of their official lives; then you turn about and say that that decision was wrong. Twelve men are put in the box to give their judgment as to whether it was a right or a wrong decision, and they conclude that it was wrong, and from that reach the result that the officer who made that decision had made it from some criminal or corrupt motive. Do you not see that such a proposition is absolutely monstrous, and that if it were permitted to prevail in this country not an executive officer from the President down would be safe for a moment. Every time that he made a decision he would be in peril of the penitentiary. I want to impress this upon your minds, for you will see, as I go along, that it is exceedingly important in this case—important not merely to my client but important to the administrative affairs of this Government.

And right here I might say another thing, gentlemen of the jury, it seems to me, with some profit. I talked to you a while ago about the mode of proving a conspiracy, and I am talking to you now about the effect of these orders as tending to prove a conspiracy. Now, what would you think of a case of this kind? Take one of these accounting officers in the Treasury. A man files a claim before him. The claimant goes out and gets a thousand false affidavits. He goes and gets somebody to personate somebody else and make an affidavit. He does a thousand things, and they all have the semblance of being exactly right, perfectly fair, all "straight as a string," to use the common phrase. They come before that officer, and he orders the payment of $20,000 out of the Treasury upon the faith of them. Now, gentlemen of the jury, would you say, or would anybody say, that the fact that that official made that order, causing the payment of that money out of the Treasury, would justify an inference against him that he was part and parcel of a conspiracy to rob the Government? You see it will not do, gentlemen of the jury. That kind of logic will not do. The argument that I am making to you, and propose to make to you hereafter more particularly, is that these orders in and of themselves and by themselves prove nothing of this conspiracy, and that from them you cannot draw an inference of criminality.

Here is an executive officer now on trial before you, and you are asked to take his official decisions and to examine into those decisions, to say that you would not have decided as he decided, and that because you would not have decided as he decided that therefore his decision must have been a criminal act on his part. You see, gentlemen, that that will not do, but that the evidence in this case must go much beyond that. Now my proposition, I repeat it, is this, and I think you will see the plain common sense of it and the force of it when I state it; namely, that from the decisions of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, even though you may conclude that his decisions were wrong, you cannot draw an inference of guilt, and the proof of such decision does not prove that he was engaged in a conspiracy such as is charged in this indictment, nor can you from the proof of such orders or decisions draw an inference that he was engaged in a conspiracy, nor are these official acts or orders of his circumstances tending to prove that he was engaged in a conspiracy.

Gentlemen, at this point as well as anywhere I may consider one of the features of this case greatly relied upon by the Government. Much has been said not merely in the opening statement of counsel for the Government, but during the long progress of this trial and during the arguments that have thus far been presented to you by the Government upon the testimony that has been adduced in respect of that provision of the law which directs the Postmaster-General in the matter of the carrying of the mails or placing service upon the routes to have due regard to productiveness "and other circumstances." You will remember, gentlemen, that the argument has been that he put on too much service; that he paid too much for it; that it did not produce as much as it cost; and because it did not produce as much as it cost it is an indication of fraud on the part of the officer who made the order by which that additional service was granted. You cannot have failed to observe, gentlemen, that the counsel for the Government have laid great stress upon that word "productiveness." Tables have been introduced here for the purpose of showing you the productiveness of those routes. They have, however, given but little consideration in the presentation of this case to the other word in that statute, to wit, "other circumstances."

Would the court just as lief adjourn at this point? It lacks but five minutes of the usual time.

The COURT. Really, this clock is about 10 minutes too fast. It wants a quarter of 4 now by my time, but if you are exhausted of course we will adjourn.

Mr. WILSON. My time is two minutes slower than this. I am not exhausted, but I would like to stop for to-day.

Mr. DAVIDGE. He is about beginning a new subject, and that will have to go over until to-morrow, at any rate.

Mr. WILSON. I would be glad to make up the time by commencing ten minutes earlier to-morrow morning.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I would prefer to have the clock set back in the morning.

The COURT. I suppose it ought to be made slow in the morning and fast in the afternoon.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Like Charles Lamb, when he came late in the morning he went away early in the afternoon, to make up for it.

Thereupon (at 3 o'clock and 56 minutes p. m.) the court adjourned until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

FRIDAY, MAY 11, 1883.

The court met at 11 o'clock.

Present, counsel for the Government and for the defendants.

Mr. WILSON. [Resuming.] Gentlemen of the jury, at the adjournment last evening I had just commenced calling your attention to a feature of this case upon which the prosecution has laid very great stress, predicated upon a provision of the statute to which your attention was called by the prosecution, and to which I have likewise called your attention, which in substance is that the Postmaster-General is to put service upon the routes established by Congress, "having due regard to productiveness and other circumstances." You have observed, gentlemen, as I believe I remarked yesterday afternoon, that the prosecution lay great stress upon the word "productiveness." They claim that that is the great and controlling word in the statute. You have observed that they have given but little attention to those other words, "and other circumstances." At this point, gentlemen of the jury, we enter upon a vast field—a field that I know I am incapable of adequately presenting to your consideration, and a subject that I fear even you will scarcely be able to entirely grasp. It is a subject that may well command the most careful and thoughtful attention of the greatest intellects of this or any other country. It is a subject upon which men will differ in opinion, and honestly differ in opinion. The Government proceeds upon the theory that productiveness, that is to say, the relation between the amount of money that it requires to perform the service and the amount of revenue derived from any particular route, is the great and paramount consideration which is to operate upon and guide the Postmaster-General, or the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, or whatever officer of the Government is charged with the duty of managing this matter. It proceeds upon the theory, gentlemen of the jury, that each route is to be considered independent of all other routes. It proceeds upon the theory that each route is to be considered as a separate and independent thing, and to be dealt with as a separate and independent thing. Now, I contend, and my client has contended, and upon that theory has administered the affairs of this great office, that productiveness is not the great and paramount consideration as to these several routes. I contend as he contends—and upon which theory he administered the affairs of this office, as he has told you, not merely by his acts, but under his oath before this jury—that the "other circumstances" are in almost if not in all cases the great and paramount consideration. He contends, as I contend, that these routes are to be dealt with not as separate, independent routes, but as part and parcel of the vast system of mail carrying, to which I called your attention at an earlier period in what I have been presenting to you.

Now, gentlemen, what are these "other circumstances?" Remember that this country in which we live reaches more than three thousand miles north and south, and more than three thousand miles east and west. It extends from the limits of almost perpetual frost on the north to the regions of almost perpetual summer on the south. It is washed on the east by the Atlantic and on the west by the Pacific, upon the bosoms of which float the commerce of the world. Its rocky, manufacturing New England, its regions of iron and coal, its fertile valleys and plains and prairies adapted to agriculture, its mountains filled with precious metals, its vast areas adapted to the purposes of grazing, are scattered about and intermingled with each other throughout all its vast extent. Its people are a homogeneous people. Throughout all the country they come and go. The school-boy or the college-boy of New England to-day, is digging in the mines or herding cattle on the plains in the far-off West to-morrow. The banker or merchant of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, or Washington has his branch establishment in some far-off region. For business purposes there are no State lines, there are no county lines, there are no township lines, but all this country is a vast hive of industry, each part working in harmony with and dependent upon every other, and the interests of all aggregated together constitute the vast interests of this vast Republic. Upon their harmonious action in connection with each other depend the prosperity and the greatness of this country of ours. To bring all these multifarious interests into close communion with each other as instantaneous as it is possible to make them is a matter of infinite importance to the prosperity of the country. The closer you can bring them to each other, the more expeditious you can make the communication between these different sections of the country, the more you add to its prosperity and its greatness. Therefore speedy and frequent mails is one of the great appliances to national growth and greatness. You must remember, gentlemen, that the wealth of this country and its prosperity do not depend upon the aggregation of people in the cities, do not depend upon the amount of business that may be done in Boston, or in New York, or Philadelphia, or any other of the great centers of trade. These aggregations are only the result of the rills and the brooks and the rivers of business that come together and concentrate in these centers, just as the oceans are made of the rills and the brooks and the rivers, that, uniting together, make them. Look at it for a moment, gentlemen. In the various sections of this country each man is working in his own way. The farmer, on his forty or eighty or a hundred and sixty acres of land, plows, and sows, and reaps. The result in itself is meager; but that is going on all over this great country, and the aggregation of these little things makes the vast amount of agricultural products which make this country famous throughout the world, not only feeding the fifty millions here at home in our country but freighting innumerable ships to feed other millions beyond the seas. The miner delves in the mountain. His individual product is but little, yet the aggregate of it all is the vast amount of the precious metal that goes out to aid in the commerce of the world. The manufacturer plies his comparatively little trade. In itself it is insignificant, but when you aggregate these things they furnish the appliances with which the farmer carries on his occupation, the articles of use and luxury which enter into all the homes of the country, the apparel with which we all are clothed, and I might go on and enumerate indefinitely, but it is unnecessary for the purposes of my argument. Now, gentlemen, do you not see that to bring all these things close together, to bring all these things in the closest possible relationship to each other, to afford all these various interests the most speedy communication with each other is of the utmost importance to the prosperity of this country. These are some of the "other circumstances" which are to be taken into consideration, and which, as I contend, are of vastly more importance than the mere matter of the amount of money that is to be derived by the Government from the means by which these interests are thus united and brought in close contact with each other. There are other circumstances which I shall take occasion to consider hereafter when I come to deal more specifically with some of the other features of this case, but I want to say this much at this time, in order that you may get at the idea that I desire to impress upon your minds and the theory upon which my client has administered this office, and which he believed then and believes now to be the true theory for the administration of this particular department of the Government. He has told you that he administered this office upon the theory that there should be a daily mail everywhere. That is one of the elements that enters into this case. You see, therefore, gentlemen, that this is a subject, as I said a moment ago, that it requires a statesman to grapple with. It is a subject as to which men may honestly differ in opinion. My client might honestly believe with Secretary Teller or with General Sherman or with Major Macginnis or with Mr. Belford that that is the true theory. Just in that connection, gentlemen of the jury, I want to read to you a little from this testimony. I want to show to you, gentlemen, that men of ability, men of high standing, men of undoubted integrity, men holding then and holding now high official position in this Government, trusted and honored by the Government, thought of this question precisely as my client thought of it. I want to show to you, gentlemen, for this is a vital question in this case, that my client could be honest in thus administering the affairs of this Government, because you have to determine whether or not the motive by which he was moved was a corrupt motive or whether it was a motive consistent with and demanded by the highest integrity.

Mr. Teller was brought upon the stand, and at the risk of wearying you, I want to refresh your memory as to his testimony by reading it, for it is exactly applicable to the point which I am now presenting. I read from page 2813:

Question. Were you a Senator from the State of Colorado in Congress in 1878?—
Answer. I was.

Q. When did you first enter the Senate?—A. In December, 1876.

Q. When did you leave the Senate?—A. April, 1882.

Q. Do you hold any office at present?—A. I am Secretary of the Interior.

Q. While a Senator, and representing in part the State of Colorado, did you ever call upon Thomas J. Brady, say, in the years 1878, 1879, and 1880, and urge upon him the necessity for the increase or expedition of any mail routes in your State; if so, will you be kind enough to state to the jury, as nearly as you can remember, the reasons that you urged for such action?—A. I very frequently called on Mr. Brady, when he was acting as Second Assistant Postmaster-General, for the purpose of having routes expedited and service increased and all those things pertaining to this business. I do not think I ever called except in response to a petition or urgent letters from people from that section. I have no recollection of calling at any other time.

Q. Did you, as a matter of fact, receive many letters upon the subject?—A. A great many.

Q. Letters asking you to use your influence?

Then an objection was interposed, and I will pass over that:

Q. Did you receive a great many letters from your constituents on that subject?—
A. Yes, sir; I did, and I called on the Second Assistant sometimes with the letters. I think sometimes I filed the letters, and sometimes I did not. I think I always filed the petitions.

Q. If you gave any reasons to General Brady why certain action should be taken by him in regard to the mail service, will you be kind enough to state to the jury what was said, or the substance of what was said?—A. Well, I have not a very distinct recollection of what I did say. Sometimes I suppose I would say one thing, and sometimes another. One case would present one reason, and perhaps another might present a great many others. I was always quite urgent to have great mail facilities within the State, especially as we were starting a number of new mining camps in different parts of the State. I was quite anxious to have a daily mail if possible.

Then, passing over another interruption, he says:

I do not myself know what routes are in the indictment, and if I did I probably would not be able to separate them, and state what I said with regard to any particular route. I have a very distinct recollection about the general way in which I presented the case, if that will do.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes; that is what we want.

The COURT. Yes.

Now I come, gentlemen, to what I want more especially to direct your attention to :

The WITNESS. It was substantially the same view that I had taken in the discussion of the matter in the Senate, so that I have quite a clear recollection about it. I frequently insisted that those people who had come from the East were especially accustomed to frequent mails, and had been all their lives, and they seemed to feel the need of mails more out in that country than did the people who had been there longer. Therefore I pressed upon him—the fact that the mail facilities should be increased, that these people might communicate with their friends. Then I also suggested on various occasions that it was a sort of opening wedge and an opening up of the new country there.

I pressed upon him—

There is a whole volume in that sentence. It is directly in the line of what I have just said, or rather what I have just said is directly in the line of what Senator Teller had been urging upon the floor of the Senate, and was repeating over and over again to my client in respect to this matter. It was an opening wedge to the development of that vast region of country teeming with wealth in its soil and filled with precious metals in its mountains:

The people used the mail for carrying packages and all sorts of things, and it was very desirable that the people should have frequent and prompt and expeditious mails. I am not able to say what I said with regard to any special route.

Gentlemen, he was broad enough not to get down to some particular route. Here was a vast empire to be peopled, and that was to contribute to the greatness and the renown of this country, and he was not picking around as to this particular spot or that, but with broad-minded statesmanship he was looking into this vast question :

Q. Did you say anything to him on the question of the right of these people living in the West to have mails as frequently as though they lived in the East?—A. I did; I very frequently discussed that question with him, or rather I do not know that I discussed it with him, but I insisted that it was not a matter for him to say whether it paid or not; that the question was whether the people had gone into this section. If they had, I insisted that it was then the duty of the Government to furnish them the mail facilities.

Oh, no. When Mr. Teller went to General Brady he said to him, "Sir, it is not for you to say whether this particular thing pays or not. That is not the question. It is a bigger and a broader and a higher and a deeper question than that." And he insisted with my client that productiveness, the argument that these gentlemen are using here by the hour, by the day, by the week, and by the month before you, was not the question. It was the "other circumstances," the development of this country, the performance of a great duty by the Government to the people. That was the question, and whether it paid or not that duty he insisted this Government ought to perform. I venture to say that every one of you will decide that that duty this Government was bound to perform. Now, let us go a little further:

Q. If you said anything to him about the mail being an instrumentality in the settlement of the country or the civilization of the people, please state what it was.—

A. As I said before, that was my theory, which I frequently pressed upon him as well as on others.

Q. Was there anything said by you to the Second Assistant with regard to the question of the department being self-sustaining or running any parallel between that and the Army or Navy?—A. Well, I would not be able to say positively now that I said that to Brady, because I might confound it with what I said in other places. For instance, I very frequently said it in the Senate.

That is to say, here we have one department, or one part of the business of this Government, that goes to every home and brings all parts of this country together. If your son goes to Colorado, or to Dakota, or Oregon, or wherever else he may see fit to cast his lot and start out to fight the battle of life in this great world, you are very much interested in keeping up communication with him, and the Post-Office Department is the department by which that is to be accomplished. Here is a system or business of the Government which it carries on itself and will not let anybody else interfere with. It comes directly home to each and all of the fifty millions of people of this country. That is one department, or a part of one department. Here is another, the War Department, that is doing a great work in this country; and another department, the Navy Department, that goes to all the governments in the world, protecting our interests at sea. The War Department is not productive of money, is it? Every dollar of the millions upon millions paid out for the War Department of this Government is just so much taken out of the public Treasury, without a farthing of return. And so of the millions and millions that are expended in the Navy Department. Does anybody say they ought to be self-sustaining? Does anybody say they shall be self-sustaining? Of course not. But when you come to this other department, which goes right home to all the people, then these gentlemen come and say, "Oh, it must be self-sustaining, it must be productive, and if it is not productive the people must not have these privileges."

Mr. BLISS. Mr. Wilson, I expressly said to the contrary.

Mr. WILSON. Now you see, gentlemen, just what Secretary Teller was referring to. He said he would not be able to state positively whether he had drawn a parallel between this department and the Army and Navy or not, to General Brady; that he was afraid to say he had, because he might be confounding that with what he had said in the Senate. He had frequently said that in the Senate. Let us go a little further:

Q. Did you say anything to Mr. Brady with regard to the growth of the State and with regard to the Post-Office Department keeping up or not keeping up with the growth of the State?—A. Yes, sir; I did contend very frequently that the postal facilities did not keep pace with the immigration and development of the country.

The postal facilities did not keep pace with the immigration and development of the country. Will any of you tell me why they should not keep pace with the growth and development of the country?

Q. Did you state to him anything about the number of men that would be entitled to mail facilities, that is as to whether there had to be a great number or whether a small number would be entitled to their letters and papers. What was the theory that you advanced to him?—A. The theory that I went on was—

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] Was it the theory you urged upon him?

The WITNESS. Yes, sir; that whenever a mining camp was established or any number of people, even though it might be quite small, it was the duty of the Government to furnish them mail facilities. I think I recollect saying to him that twenty people were entitled to a mail.

Q. Was that whether it paid or not?—A. I never had any reference to whether it paid or not. I did not know whether it paid, and did not inquire, and, frankly I will say, I did not care.

Q. Did you say anything to him, if you remember, with regard to the influence of frequent mails upon the Indian question?—A. I would not be able to say that I ever discussed the question of its effect upon the Indian question with Mr. Brady.

Q. You do not remember that you did with him?—A. I have in other places, but I would not venture to say I did with him, for fear I might be mistaken.

Then, on page 2823 :

Q. About how many times, Mr. Secretary, did you go to see the Second Assistant Postmaster-General for the purpose of urging these expeditions and increases?—A. I went a very great many times, because I received frequent letters about the mail, and I was quite apt to go when I received an urgent letter and urge it upon either the Postmaster-General or the Second Assistant.

Q. You say you went a great many times?—A. Yes; a great many times.

Q. Could you give the least idea as to how many times?—A. I would not like to do that.

Q. As many as a hundred?—A. That would be mere guess. I think a great many letters of mine must be on file. I would indorse people's letters to me and carry them to the department, and I would frequently go there when I left nothing. I would not undertake to say how many times I went there on that business.

Now, gentlemen, remember the point I am immediately pressing upon you is that a man who entertains precisely the ideas of this subject that my client did may act upon them and be entirely honest and his action be entirely inconsistent with any theory that he was engaged in a conspiracy to defraud the Government, because the thing didn't pay. Here you have Secretary Teller testifying before you that he went to General Brady and urged upon him to do these very things, pressed them upon him with argument, insisted upon it, did not care whether it paid or not, demanded it for the people of his State, in their interest, and in the interest of the country.

Now, gentlemen, if Secretary Teller, who occupies one of the most responsible positions in this Government, had had the misfortune to have been the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and had carried out his ideas, which was no more than what my client did, instead of occupying that position which he now holds he would have been here in the criminal dock, called upon to answer to the charge that my client is now called upon to answer unto. And why? Because, as I told you before, you may search this record from beginning to end, and you will find nothing in this case, so far as any acts are concerned, except the official orders of my client, as against him; I am not speaking about what others have said about him, which I will come to in the due course of my argument. But here you have just that state of affairs, gentlemen. Look it squarely in the face. Mr. Teller, lately a Senator of the United States, representing the people of a State which, in itself, is an empire—a State that first began to grow and give signs of vigor but just a few years ago and just when these things were beginning to happen—Secretary Teller comes here and tells you that he urged and urged (in obedience to the demands of the people and pursuant to his own ideas and theories of the powers and duties of the Government towards its people) my client to do the very things and pursue the very policy that he has pursued. And I repeat it, if he had been Second Assistant Postmaster-General and had carried out the ideas he urged upon my client he would not to-day be Secretary of the Interior, but he would be arraigned before this court, charged with a great crime.

Now, let us go a little further. There is another distinguished gentleman who has testified in this case. I refer to General Sherman, and without very much comment—for I see that I am consuming entirely too much time, and I know must be wearying you—I want to read an extract from his testimony. Some objection having been interposed by the counsel for the Government, finally the General was permitted to testify, and here is what he said :

A. Ever since the close of our civil war there has been a tendency to push westward by every available route. The war was hardly over before I went out on the plains in person, and I have seen it progress from that time to this. I have been across the continent by every known route, in wagon, on horseback, and by rail.

The first stations along the Kansas Pacific to Denver were sod-houses every twenty miles, at which the stage company kept from two to five men to take care of the teams not on the road. Those men were armed with Spencer rifles and the best kind of arms.

This is a magnificent picture, gentlemen, of the character of that country, of frontier life and growth.

The stations averaged from about seventeen to twenty miles apart all the way to Denver. At that time that country was traversed back and forth by the Cheyennes, as troublesome and dangerous Indians as ever inhabited this country.

Permit me, right here, to pause and state as history that when the Union Pacific Railroad was built across that country—which by the way, followed a star route; the star route was the pioneer of that great railroad—one man would dig with a spade or a mattock and pick, and another man would stand guard over him with a musket. That was the way that road was built, and that was what General Sherman was here referring to.

The way this work was done on that stage line was a demonstration to my mind, from personal observation, that it was the best picket line possible to an army. I saw the same from Omaha clear to the Summit, and the same in Texas. I have traveled along similar routes, and I know that there have grown up in that country a class of men who are as brave as soldiers, and who are in fact soldiers. They take all the risks of soldiers. They know no fear. If these stations about twenty miles apart are attacked by the Indians, they fight them.

And yet these gentlemen come here and tell you that those men who performed that great service to this country ought not to have a mail, because the postage-stamps do not pay for carrying it.

Finally, settlers come, and then this condition of things is soon followed by a better. From 1875 up to 1879 or 1880, I saw that that was the very best method of protecting that line from the Sitting Bull Indians, who had gone north to Canada, and keeping them from having any kind of communication with their fellows down in the Indian reservation. By making a barrier of that kind and cutting off communication you at once separate them into two distinct bands or tribes. That resulted exactly as we foresaw. Mr. Sitting Bull soon got very tired and sick of his game and asked to come back, and now we have got him down the river, a poor, harmless, miserable Indian, whereas, before that, he was a very dangerous warrior, followed by four hundred or five hundred as desperate men as were ever known to carry on war in this country.

That is what the Bismarck and Tongue River route did for this Government. It suppressed or greatly aided the Government in suppressing that Indian war, in bringing into subjection to the Government and making quiet and peaceful this band of as desperate men as ever shouldered muskets and went forth to battle.

That road from Bismarck to Keogh, Keogh to Custer, and Custer to Bozeman was one of those westward lines from the Mississippi River to the Rocky Mountains, which formed a barrier between the different parts of the Sioux Nation and which has produced results we now enjoy.

Gentlemen, if the Army had gone out, at an expense of ten, fifteen, twenty, or thirty million dollars, and suppressed these Indians—because I believe it is estimated that it takes about a million dollars to kill an Indian—the money would have been gone; but General Sherman tells you that the expenditure upon the Bismarck and Tongue River route has accomplished all this, and yet it only cost $65,000, besides giving the people their mails.

It is a perfect line, the best line possible for that purpose. The distance between Bismarck and Fort Keogh must be about three hundred and seventy-five miles, and if we had had two regiments of troops along that line we could not have picketed it better than was done by the stage company. [Page 3608.]

Now, what do you say about that? This stage company picketed that line as well as could have been done by two regiments of the Army of the United States.

There is another portion of General Sherman's testimony that I would beg your attention to in another connection. I am using this, gentlemen, because you will remember, when I recall it to your recollection, that he said in his testimony that when they were attempting to suppress these Indian wars they thought it was no more than the Government should do to step in and aid them through the instrumentality of the Post-Office Department. But that I will come to again after awhile; I cannot refer to it just at this moment.

I will not stop to read the testimony of Major Maginnis or Mr. Belford, which goes upon the same general theory, for it would occupy too much of your time; but you see, and I bring this testimony to your attention for the purpose of having you to see, that this is a question certainly as to which men may honestly differ, and I have read you thus much to show that some of the most eminent men of this country take precisely the same view of it that my client took.

They believe, many honest people believe, that by administering the affairs of this department upon that principle; that is to say, upon the principle of frequent and expeditious communication between the various sections of the country, although it may cost more money than is derived from it, is infinitely profitable to the country, because although it costs more than it produces in the mere sense of paying out money for it and receiving money from it, it yields to the country in the facilities it furnishes for business, and for the increase of intelligence, and for the development of undeveloped regions, and for the development of the natural resources, agricultural, manufacturing, and mineral, vastly more than the difference between cost and revenue, and although in one direction you pay out more than you receive, yet in the other directions to which I have alluded, the increase, the growth, the profit is enormously greater than this disparity between cost and revenue. That is the policy—that is the theory upon which my client administered this office. Will you say that it is an unwise policy; can you say that it is not the best policy? But even if you should think it is not the best policy, even if you think it is not the wisest policy to thus bring these different sections of the country in close communication with each other, because it costs more than it actually produces, are you sitting here to say that a man who honestly differs with you in opinion on this subject is a rascal and is to be incarcerated in the penitentiary for entertaining views different from you upon so great a question as this? But that is what you are called upon in this case to do. You are called upon to say—and that is the great burden of the argument of the Government in this case—you are called upon to say that because my client made orders for carrying the mails over routes where the cost of carrying was greater, and, if you please, I will say vastly greater than the revenues derived from it, that, therefore, he is to be regarded as having made those orders for a criminal purpose, or, in other words, you are asked to draw an inference from his having made such orders that those orders were made for some corrupt purpose, and that he was engaged in a conspiracy when he made them. You are asked to say that because he made these orders, in carrying out this great policy, this broad-minded policy which I say commends itself to every broad-minded man, to every statesman, those orders tend to prove that he was engaged in a conspiracy to rob this Government.

You will see, therefore, gentlemen, what I mean when I say that from these orders in and of themselves you can draw no inference against him in this case. They cannot in and of themselves be circumstances tending to prove that my client when he made them was making them pursuant to some conspiracy. In and of themselves they do not prove or tend to prove this charge of a conspiracy, because they are entirely consistent with the highest integrity.

Now, a great parade has been made here, gentlemen, before you on the subject of cost and revenue. It has been the burden of the Government's song, and I want to show you before I leave this case how unutterably fallacious all that is as they have presented it to you, as they have undertaken to show you, of how little importance these postal routes are. They take one of them, and they say the revenues from that office are so much. Then they turn around and say to you, "Look here at what it cost! Look at these enormous figures of cost! Here is this little bit of revenue and this enormous cost!" And by that means they undertake to impress you with the idea that the revenue that they present here represents the importance of that line. Is that so, gentlemen of the jury? It is not so. Why? What appears by these revenues? Only the stamps that are sold at the offices on the line, that is all. So that if a ton of letters is started from the city of New York, another ton from Philadelphia, another ton from Boston, and another ton from Washington, and every one of those tons of letters were to pass over a route, the records of the department would not show that a single one of them had passed over that route—not one. Why? Because all that those records show is the stamps sold at the offices. Now let me show you how that will work. I wish I had something here by which I could make a diagram, but I guess I can state it so that you can comprehend it. Now recollect, I said that these routes are part and parcel of the system. Suppose a route starting from New York goes out a certain distance and there connects with another route, and that one connects with another route, and that with still another, until it reaches its destination, at, say, Chicago. They start ten tons of letters out of New York to Chicago. Every one of those ten tons passes over these intermediate routes, don't they? But when you come to the consideration of the revenues of those intermediate routes would you find anything of those ten tons there? No; there might not be a stamp sold on those intermediate routes. The record might be an absolute blank as to those intermediate routes, so far as revenues were concerned. And yet those ten tons of letters passed over those routes daily.

Now, do you not see, gentlemen, from that simple illustration, how absolutely ridiculous, fallacious, and misleading is this testimony that these gentlemen have brought here for the purpose of influencing your minds and judgments in this case?

Let me take a very striking illustration: You recollect—and I have referred to it heretofore—that they established the great overland mail between the Missouri River and San Francisco. The mail from New York, Philadelphia, Boston, all over the country, went over that line, we will suppose. They had another route, by the Isthmus, but I will suppose that that was the only one. You know that between the Missouri River, at that time, and San Francisco, as I said before, this route traversed uninhabited plains for hundreds and hundreds of miles; it went over mountain tops and through canyons and gorges, until it reached San Francisco. Now, here is a route, which, of course, I am not permitted to state, because it is not in evidence, as to how much it cost, although I think I might venture to do it, because it is history, and the amount that it has cost could be shown by the statutes of this country; but I will not venture to state that. However, in the nature of things, you know that to carry that overland mail cost an immense sum of money ; you also know that the stamps that were sold on that line were nothing, because there was nobody there to buy them. Here you have a great route apparently producing absolutely nothing, but in fact a great deal. And why? Because, as I said, gentlemen, these routes are part and parcel of a vast system, and the revenues that were earned by that route were paid not along the line, but in Boston and New York, Philadelphia and Cincinnati, and in all the hamlets throughout this county this side of the Missouri River. But they want you to say that it is only what is sold upon this particular route that is the guide and is the indication of its importance.. You see it is absurd, gentlemen. Here, all this mail that is being concentrated, is chargeable not merely to this place or that place or the other place, but it is being operated as a vast system, of which this particular route is a part. It is performing its part of this work, and all of this revenue is to be attributed to it just as much as to the offices where the stamps are sold from which the revenue is derived.

The commercial centers are the places from which the revenues are received. New York sends out tons and tons, car-loads, team-loads every day. Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Chicago, Saint Louis, Cincinnati, do the same. They are so many great hearts throwing out this life-blood of business and social affairs into the great arteries, to be carried into every part of this great body-politic, utilizing it and making it the giant that it is. And therefore it is, gentlemen, as I said before, that in dealing with this question, you have to deal with a system and not with separate and independent routes.

Just here I want to make one or two other observations in aid of what I have already said. Counsel for the Government have referred to the fact that recently the postage has been reduced from three to two cents. They hold it before you and say, "Why, here we have got a reform administration." How many times during the progress of this case have they talked about a reform administration, by way, as a matter of course, of casting reflections upon the administration that preceded it, and thereby affecting your minds? And now they come, and say, "Why, we have got this reform administration, and the postage is absolutely reduced from three to two cents." They say the people are now reaping the benefit of it by cheapening the postage from three cents to two. Will you please consider that for a moment? A letter has been carried from Portland in Maine, to Portland in Oregon, for three cents; now it is to be carried for two. If I were going to criticise anybody in respect of this thing, I should be disposed to criticise the gentlemen who make the laws, for having passed any such act as that when nobody was demanding it, when nobody had any right to complain that postage was a burden. I should be inclined to say that that was one of the appliances resorted to by politicians to make cheap capital, but it comes with an ill grace in this case to urge a thing of that kind when there are thousands upon thousands, and tens of thousands upon tens of thousands of localities getting mails infrequently and on long time which if the revenues derived from a three-cent postage had been maintained could have soon been supplied with mails frequently and speedily. And yet they are to be deprived of frequent and speedy mails for the purpose of reducing postage from three cents to two.

Now, you see, there is a question about which men might very honestly differ. I do not know what I might do or what you might do under such circumstances, but I do know that a man could be perfectly honest and yet stand up and face the Congress of the United States and say, "Gentlemen, you ought not to cut down this postage from three cents to two until you give the people of all sections of this country adequate mail facilities." I think a man could face the world and make an argument of that kind. I think a man could stand up and say, "It is not the wise policy to do it. You brought postage down; you used to carry the mail at so much a mile; if a letter went one hundred miles it was so much, if five hundred miles so much, and if it went another distance it was so much; but finally it was reduced to three cents for a letter to any part of the country." You can now send a letter that weighs half an ounce to any part of this country for three cents, and if it does not happen to get to its proper destination and contains something valuable, it is returned without additional cost to the man who sent it. I do not think anybody had a right to complain of that, but I do think that when there are vast regions of this country that have not yet had adequate mail facilities, it was not a wise policy to cut down the postage from three cents to two, and I think that I or any other man can insist upon that without any danger of being suspected of dishonesty.

The COURT. If three cents would produce more revenue than ten cents to the letter, why should not two cents produce more than three?

Mr. INGERSOLL. That does not follow.

The COURT. It is the theory of the law, I think.

Mr. WILSON. It may be the theory of the law.

Mr. INGERSOLL. It has to be tried.

Mr. WILSON. You would have to try that a good deal. We get a great deal more revenue now than we did when we paid twenty-five cents for a letter, but there is a very great difference between the condition of this country now and when letter-postage was twenty-five cents. There are several more millions of people to write letters and do business than there were then. All such comparisons as that, it seems to me, are utterly futile in a great question like this. I should not have alluded to this at all, gentlemen, but for the fact that it has been made use of here as an argument against my client, an argument coming after the fact; that is to say, when postage was three cents my client did this service, and now, because Congress since that time has made it two cents, it is brought here and paraded as an argument against my client and these other defendants. Do you not see that when you have thus reduced the revenues of that department you have reduced the means by which the Government could afford these great facilities to the people in remote localities, and you have thereby retarded the development of these remote regions, and thus have thrown an obstacle in the way of the growth of the country, because it is too plain for argument that frequent mails do aid in the development and civilization of the country?

How can I better illustrate this further than by bringing to your attention what you so well know, because it is a part and parcel of the history of this country, the fact that we have what is known as the free-delivery system in the cities; what is that system, and how utterly inconsistent it is with the theory of the prosecution of productiveness as the great element of success. Why, gentlemen, that idea of productiveness has long since, by a slow process of progress, ceased to be a controlling element in this business. Free delivery illustrates it. It first began in the larger cities, and gradually it has been extended to smaller and smaller ones. This system of free delivery, what is it? Why, men in uniform, with their satchels on their backs, going about from house to house daily and twice a day, carrying the mails from the post-offices to the residences and offices and places of business of the people in cities. Business letters, social letters, letters of friendship, letters of love, valentines, Easter cards, carried about and delivered at the doors of residences, in offices and counting-houses throughout the cities of the country, and that, too, at a cost of about two and a quarter millions of dollars a year without producing a solitary cent of revenue. When your correspondent away off in Oregon sends his letter to you in Washington, not only did you get it formerly for three cents, and you soon will for two, but, in addition to that, the Government uniforms the carrier and sends him around to deliver that letter to you at your breakfast-table in the morning, at your dinner-table in the evening, or at your counting-house, without a farthing derived from it. And yet these gentlemen tell you and tell me, that the farmers and the mechanics in the country-places shall not have their mails excepting the revenues derived from their carriage shall pay for the carrying. To my mind this theory of the prosecution in the light of the present age is an absurdity, to say the least, if not a monstrosity.

Mr. BLISS. Your honor, I beg to say that Mr. Wilson has now twice stated that it was the theory of the Government that there should not be any mail unless the route was productive of expenses. The Government in its opening and all through has disclaimed any such idea.

The COURT. So I have understood.

Mr. WILSON. Then I would like to know what all this parade has been about in this case, where there has been so much talk about routes that do not produce much and yet cost a great deal. We have spent four or five months on that subject. We have had table after table on that subject in this case; and I wish these gentlemen had made themselves better understood at the outset. Productiveness has been the watchword of this prosecution. With infinite emphasis the learned counsel has used that word "productiveness;" but his cooing was when he came to talk about the "other circumstances." They seem to be a little sensitive about that now, and as they are so very sensitive about it, I will pass over some things that I had intended to say, lest I might wound the tender feelings of these gentlemen who have been for five months talking to you about productiveness.

As gentle as any sucking dove

Now, let me bring your minds to another illustration. I must pass over some things, because

Life is short and time is fleeting.

Mr. DAVIDGE.—

Art is long and time is fleeting.

Mr. WILSON. I know art is long, but life is short. Let me direct your minds, gentlemen, to another illustration of this subject. You have it in evidence in this case that off in these far-off regions where these star routes are, or have been, for many of them have passed out of existence, and forever, in the march of affairs, and where these gentlemen say to you there were no people to be supplied—I suspect they will deny that directly, although they have said it in the arguments—and no necessity for this service, railroads have been built at enormous cost, covering very many of these very routes, since the contracts were made on these routes which are the subjects of this investigation, whereby these star routes have been entirely superseded. Look at that region of country, a map of which I took occasion to show to you during the progress of this trial, lying in Colorado, New Mexico, Arizona, and see how the railroads have been built through these—as this prosecution would have you believe—uninhabited regions of country. They were then comparatively uninhabited. Do you not know that just so soon as a railroad went over one of these star routes, although that star route may have had over it only a weekly mail, yet just as fast as the railroad was constructed there was placed upon it a daily mail. What would you think of sending a weekly mail over a railroad? What would you think of running a star route alongside a railroad, carrying the mail at four or five miles an hour, when here was a train sweeping through the country at thirty miles an hour every day? What would you think of carrying the mail once a week on a mule or buckboard or stage-coach at four or five miles an hour, when there was a train running right alongside the route daily at thirty to forty miles an hour?

And do you not know that it costs more to carry the mails on a railroad than it does by the star routes? And how absurd it is to say that if you have a railroad on which you can carry the mail at a high rate of speed and daily it is more needful to the people than it was to have their mails daily before that railroad was constructed! So far as the needs of the people are concerned, they are just as great in the one case as in the other—just as great when supplied by star routes as when supplied by railroad.

I come back, therefore, gentlemen, to what I before said, that these questions that you are called upon to consider are questions of the greatest moment to this country; questions as to which men may honestly differ in opinion, and when one man takes one view of it, it is entirely consistent with his integrity of purpose, and no imputation of want of integrity is to be entertained against him because another man may take the opposite view. I shall probably have occasion, before I get through, to recur to this subject incidentally, but I pass now to another consideration.

Let me state it as carefully as I am able. Suppose that you have the right in this case to sit in review of these acts that are charged against my client. Suppose that they may be considered as circumstances tending to prove that my client entered into a conspiracy. Suppose the court shall say to you—I do not know what the court will say to you, and, therefore, I must argue this case upon the various views that may possibly be taken in respect of these matters—suppose the court shall say to you that you have a right to look into each one of these acts to determine from each and all of them the main fact to be proven by the Government in this case, to wit, whether or not there was a conspiracy between my client and the other defendants as charged in this indictment. Now, supposing that the court will say that to you, which I can hardly believe, then I want you to go with me through this case, weary as I know you are and anxious as I know you are to get rid of it, while I examine the testimony touching each one of these acts of my client, and see whether or not what he did as to each and every of them is consistent with his innocence of this charge, or is inconsistent with any other hypothesis than that of his guilt as charged.

And in doing this I shall endeavor to present to you, with no more detail than is absolutely necessary, the evidence in the case. Some of it I shall simply state, and when I am doing so if any one of you discovers inaccuracy in anything I do state as having been proven in the case, I shall take it as a kindness if you will correct me at once, for I do not claim that my memory is infallible. I shall take up these various acts of my client in the precise order in which they have been presented to you in the opening argument of the case by Mr. Ker on behalf of the prosecution. Now, I beg you to remember, and please do not forget it—I wish to burn it in upon your minds, fix it indelibly there—that the charge in this case is conspiracy; that these parties combined, confederated, and agreed together to defraud the United States. Do not forget that that is the charge, and none other. Do not forget, I beg you, that that is the charge which these defendants have been called here to answer unto. Do not forget that they are being tried for that, and not for something else; and do not forget that that is the charge which the Government must prove. And while you are remembering that I want you to remember distinctly another prominent fact in this case, and that is that these parties had one hundred and thirty of these star routes among them. Do not forget that, please.

And when you remember that, please bear in mind that the charge in this case is not that they conspired as to the whole one hundred and thirty routes, but that they conspired as to nineteen out of the one hundred and thirty routes. Now, I know, gentlemen, that it will seem strange to you, and it will appear to you to be inconsistent and absurd to suppose that these parties, having one hundred and thirty routes, if they were going to conspire to defraud the United States would not have conspired as to the whole of them, the whole one hundred and thirty. Why should they pick out, if they were going to defraud the United States, nineteen and conspire as to them, and not conspire as to the one hundred and thirty? If their purpose was to defraud the United States, to get money out of the Treasury of the United States, having the one hundred and thirty routes, they could get a great deal more money out of one hundred and thirty routes than they could out of nineteen, and if their object was to get money and to defraud the United States, having all this material with which to work, is it not on its face absurd to say that they would pick out nineteen of these routes and conspire, that by and through the instrumentality of these nineteen routes they would defraud the United States and not embrace in their combination the whole one hundred and thirty? On its face it is an absurdity; and asking you now to keep that in mind as an element of this case, I will proceed to take up these routes in the order in which they have been presented to you by Mr. Ker, and show you just what has been developed in respect of each of them, especially so far as my client is concerned. I shall not deal with the details of them in respect of many things that have been disclosed by the evidence with which my client was not in any way connected, but will leave that for the counsel who represent the other defendants, because it is more peculiarly within their province to discuss them.

As I go through these routes I shall have opportunity, if necessary, to notice the orders other than those for increase and expedition of which complaint is made before alluded to.

Before I begin this in detail, gentlemen, let me call your attention to this: It is alleged in the indictment that false petitions were procured and filed in the department; that false affidavits were made and filed in the department; that affidavits were altered or forged and filed in the department. Now, without saying anything as to the mode of preparing these affidavits, as to their truth or falsity, as to whether any petition was altered or forged or not; without intimating, insinuating, or in any way committing anybody in respect of any of these things; without conceding that what the Government has said in respect of them is at all true, I want right here and now to ask you this question, as to each and every one of these petitions and affidavits as to which complaint has been made: Did General Brady know anything about who procured these petitions or the manner in which they were procured? Did he know, if a petition was altered, that it was altered, or who altered it, or anything about it? If an affidavit was made in blank and filled up by somebody, did he know anything at all about it? Had he anything whatever to do with it? I say no, gentlemen. All of you know that there is not a syllable of evidence to show that he did. On the contrary the evidence shows, if it shows anything in this case, that the first he ever knew or heard of any of these petitions was either when some Member of Congress or Senator brought it to him or when the corresponding clerk brought it to him in a jacket with his indorsement upon the jacket already prepared. Do I not state the testimony accurately as to that? Do not understand me as conceding anything against the other defendants in this case. I am not dealing with that feature of the case now. I am dealing with a distinct feature of the case. I am dealing with these affidavits, petitions, and so forth, in so far as my client is concerned with them and had to do with them. And I repeat that the first he knew of them was, when they were brought to him either by a Senator or Member or brought to him by the corresponding clerk whose business it was to put them in a jacket and make an indorsement upon that jacket of the contents of that jacket, and what those petitions stated! General Brady was interrogated upon that subject, and his testimony is to be found on page 3390:

Q. After these contracts were let, referred to in the indictment, there were increases of trips and expedition of service, I think. I wish you to state to the jury what you know, if anything, in regard to the manner in which affidavits were procured which were filed in the office?—A. I know nothing about that personally.

Q. What do you know, if anything, as to whom they were procured by?—A. I know nothing about that. I simply know what was the law on the subject and what was required by the department, that is all. How they were gotten up or who got them up, further than the names indicated, I know nothing.

Q. If there were any changes made in these affidavits after they were signed and sworn to, had you any knowledge of it?—A. I never heard of any changes being made; none were ever brought to my knowledge.

Q. If any were signed or sworn to in blank had you any knowledge or information on that subject?—A. None whatever.

Q. When did you first hear it?—A. During the first trial.

Q. What, if anything, do you know as to the manner in which petitions were gotten up and by whom they were gotten up?—A. I know nothing about that whatever. I regarded a petition as of value because of the indorsement given to it, as a rule, by the Member of Congress or Senator. If they indorsed them that was a guarantee to me. If they sent them up, that was a guarantee to me. The recommendation of a member of Congress was of more importance to me than the recommendation or hasty report of a special agent, or anything of that kind. I thought the member of Congress knew the needs of his people better than anybody else. At least, it was his duty to know them.

Q. If any of these petitions were in any way altered after they were signed by the parties who did sign them, had you any knowledge or information of that?—A. None whatever.

Q. If any of these petitions were signed by fictitious names attached to them, had you any knowledge or information about that?—A. I had none, and could have had none, unless somebody had come and told me.

Q. Did anybody ever come and tell you?—A. Nobody ever did come and tell me.

That is his statement in regard to the feature of the case upon which I am just about entering. Does anybody dispute that, gentlemen? Has any witness given you any testimony to the contrary of that? No. None whatever. You know in addition to his testimony the mode of doing this business in this office. You know that these things went to the corresponding clerk, or to the inspection division, as the case might be, and then were brought to him for the first time when they came to him with the order already written, or the facts indorsed upon the jacket which contained these papers. They say he should have known. Perhaps I might just as well here, as at any other time, say a word upon that subject. Did you notice, gentlemen of the jury, that in many of these cases where they say he should have known, it would have been very difficult for him to have known. The corresponding clerk brings him these papers in a jacket with the indorsement upon it. They say in the indictment that it was the duty of the corresponding clerk to indorse upon the jacket a brief statement of the contents of the jacket. Why is that, gentlemen? It is to facilitate business. How on earth is any man going to read every paper that comes to him. You have got to have somebody whom you can trust. Look at Mr. James. They said to him, "Was a certain order rescinded?" And he replied, "No. I ordered it rescinded in March, and I never found out it was not rescinded until September." "Why did you not?" Said he, "Why, gentlemen, it is utterly impossible for any man to know about all these things. You have got to trust somebody." Mr. Spangler and Mr. Brewer and other men who have been brought here from the department say that it would be an absolute impossibility for a man to read all the papers that he has to sign. Therefore they select trusted men who will go through these details. In respect of this particular business, they say in the indictment that Turner's duty was to make a brief statement of these things upon the jackets for the action of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General. Why? Simply so that the Second Assistant Postmaster-General would not have to read an armful of papers. He has the whole contents boiled down into the statement upon the jacket. They say he ought to have known. You recollect Brother Bliss and Mr. Merrick would hand you papers and say, "Gentlemen, look at that. Don't you see where it has been altered?" "No; I don't exactly see it." "Well, but turn around and hold it up to the light and you will see it." I recollect one particular instance that attracted my attention. My Brother Merrick was very much tickled because Brother Bliss had found an erasure on a paper. The jury could not exactly see it. Then Mr. Merrick got up and adjusted his spectacles with the greatest nicety, and got right out here on the floor and stood here and gazed at the paper for a long time, and finally said, "Gentlemen, I see it. Look right there. Don't you see it?" "No." "Hold it to the light and you will see it. All you have got to do is to hold it to the light." What they are saying to you is that when Brady took up one of these papers—and I will have occasion to look at them now in a very few minutes—when he took up a bundle of these petitions, sometimes twelve or fifteen of them in a single package, that instead of sitting at his desk with his head drawn down between his shoulders, he ought to have had his neck craned out and stood up and held each one of these papers to the light to see if some fellow had not erased a letter "s" somewhere and reduced a word from the plural to the singular number, for that is just what was done in one of these cases. They come here and say, "Suppose he did not know. He says he did not, and we have no evidence to prove that he did. There is a great deal of evidence here to sustain his assertion that he did not know, but he ought to have known." If he had spent two years on these nineteen routes as my Brother Bliss has spent two years on them, with several able major-generals, brigadier-generals, captains and corporals to help him, I suppose he would have found out just as much about those nineteen routes as Bliss has found out, and Merrick has found out with the aid of Bliss. My Brother Merrick never would have found any of these things. Bliss is the man that found out these things. Merrick never would have discovered one of these things in the world, never. But they think Brady ought to have known.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Bliss has the microscopic vision.

Mr. WILSON. Gentlemen, I was going to use a street phrase, but I will not do it. It would not do to say "You may bet your bottom dollar," and so I will say you may rest assured that there is not a thing in all this business that Colonel Bliss does not know. If any fellow wrote a communication to the department and spelled the word "do" with a "u" instead of an "o," Colonel Bliss knows exactly where to find it. If there is any "t" in all these twenty-seven hundred papers that the fellow did not cross, Colonel Bliss knows exactly where to go and pick out that "t." If there is an "i" that has not been dotted, or if that dot was made by a wandering fly, Colonel Bliss knows it. As sure as you live, you have got all there is in this case, gentlemen. The representatives of the Government have not left out anything that will help their case. You can rely upon that. Now they say General Brady ought to have known these things, and that he ought to have held them up to the light and put on a pair of "double million magnifying glasses." I believe Sam Weller said it required something like that to see through a deal door and up a pair of stairs. Because General Brady did not do this you are asked to come to the conclusion that he was purposely, maliciously, fraudulently, and corruptly, and with a view to robbing the Government, making these orders.

At this point (12 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m.) the court took its usual recess.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. WILSON. [Resuming.] Gentlemen of the jury, the field of the case into which I am now going makes it necessary, as it seems to me, or at least proper and I hope useful, that I should make one or two illustrations, one of which is in the line on which I was proceeding before recess, but it is a more restricted line; that is to say, it is a line of consideration bringing this case down to particular routes. If I understood the intimation that was made by Colonel Bliss before recess, when he interrupted me, it was that they were not expecting that you as jurors would take any different view of this great question from that which I was presenting to you, but that when you got down to the particular routes there was that in and about the particular routes which indicated, or should have indicated to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, that the service that he put upon those particular routes was not proper service to be put on. Why? Because there was not enough mail going over these special and particular routes to justify such an expenditure of money, and not being enough mail over a particular route, therefore from that you are to infer that he put the service upon these routes for some improper purpose, and was actuated in doing it by a corrupt motive. You will remember, gentlemen, that all through this case, they have asked mail carriers, the man who drove the horse that hauled the buckboard, the man who rode the horse or the man who drove the coach, or the postmaster, if you please, how much mail was being carried over these routes. You recollect that part of the testimony. What I now say I am going to say for the purpose of covering that particular subject generally so that I may not be detained in going into particulars in respect of it. They say there was not but a few pounds of mail running over the routes, and that is evidence that it was not necessary to have that mail carried as it was ordered to be carried. That is their theory of this case. Let me suppose a case, gentlemen, which will exactly illustrate what I am driving at. Suppose that right out here in Virginia a hundred miles from Washington—of course this is by way of illustration merely—and with no railroad near it, there is a community of people engaged in business, and the mail that goes to that community can only go over a star route from the city of Washington. Suppose that every day in the week a hundred letters come to the post-office in Washington to go into that place. You would say, gentlemen, that those letters ought to go forward. That is a business community. They are digging iron out of the Virginia soil and they are manufacturing it into pig. They are digging out the ore and manufacturing it into pig and perhaps making something out of the pig right there. There are a hundred letters every day for this point coming to the post-office here in Washington. Is there any man on this jury who would say those letters ought not to go forward daily? It is a hundred miles and there is not a post-office between here and there; not one, for the purpose of my illustration. Every one will say that that hundred letters ought to go and the Government ought to carry them, for it will not let anybody else carry them. You recollect only three or four days ago men were arrested in New York for—what? Why, for running a penny post. They could make money by carrying the letters around New York for one cent when the Government was charging them two cents. The Government carries letters now all over the country for three cents, and yet exacts two cents for carrying a letter from Capitol Hill down to Fifteenth street. Just a few days ago in New York they arrested men because they were carrying on a large business in the way of delivering mail cheaper than the Government could deliver it.

Mr. BLISS. If you will confine yourself to the record you will not be so likely to make a mistake. There have been no arrests in New York for that reason. It was a civil proceeding entirely.

Mr. WILSON. The Government has stopped the business. We will say it in that way.

Mr. BLISS. They have not even done that.

Mr. WILSON. At any rate, the Government has a monopoly of this business, and you, gentlemen of the jury, cannot engage in it. That is the point I make.

Mr. INGERSOLL. They seized the letters.

Mr. WILSON. They seized, I believe, twenty thousand letters. But that is neither here nor there. The Government has a monopoly. Here are a hundred letters to go to this point, a hundred miles away, and there is no intermediate post-office. Every gentleman on this jury will say those hundred letters ought to go forward every day to these people who are engaged in this business at this point out in Virginia. Gentlemen, just see how deceptive this testimony is. You could hear people laugh around in the audience when some carrier testified, "I didn't have more than three or four pounds of mail. There would not be over three or four pounds of it." How many pounds will one hundred letters make? Have you thought of that? A letter goes for two cents per half ounce. Nine hundred and ninety-nine out of every thousand letters that are carried will not require more than a three-cent stamp; so that when you have a hundred letters you have only got a fraction over three pounds. Every pound calls for thirty-two letters. Thirty-two letters make a pound, admitting that every letter comes up to the half-ounce standard. When you have a pound of letters you have thirty-two letters, and when you have a hundred letters you have a little over three pounds of mail matter. Now, because it is only three pounds, does it cease to be important to carry that mail out to those people? No, gentlemen. But, gentlemen, how much revenue would the Government get for carrying those one hundred letters? The Government would get just three cents a letter, and one hundred letters would amount to $3. For carrying the mail so important as that per day one way the Government would get the enormous sum of $3. These gentlemen say that because it is only $3 the mail is of no consequence and does not justify the expenditure, and you must hold that mail up for six days until you get six hundred letters, which will produce $18 for the trip, and then you may carry it through once a week instead of once a day. Is not the thing absurd? Does it not show, gentlemen of the jury, that what I am contending for in this case is the true theory upon which to administer the affairs of this department? That is all I am going to say to you on that subject. I only wanted to get your attention to it.

Another thing. They say: "But these contractors were getting up petitions to have the service increased. The contractors were doing it. They were drawing up petitions here in Washington." They showed you petitions in Miner's handwriting. Miner drew those petitions and sent them off to Oregon or somewhere else for people to sign. Then they said to you, "Stephen W. Dorsey was drawing up the forms of petitions." They paraded here before you a pencil memorandum, a draft of a petition. Because these contractors prepared petitions, circulated petitions, and had them signed and filed in the department, they ask you to say that that is an evidence of guilt. I say to you, gentlemen of the jury, that every man in this country has the right to petition. I say that these contractors had a perfect right to do that. They were engaged, as I said in the beginning, in their legitimate calling. They had their contracts, and they had a perfect right to have petitions circulated and signed setting forth the truth in regard to the condition of things in the country through which these routes passed. Gentlemen, I can give you very high authority on that subject. I can show to you that I am not alone in this statement which I have just presented to you. His honor on the bench, having once had occasion to pass upon this question, stated so much more clearly and forcibly than I can state it what I am just now urging upon you that I beg to read it to you as part of my remarks. I read from page 1578 of the old record:

The COURT. Well, never mind. John W. Dorsey was the contractor in this case. S. W. Dorsey was the subcontractor and his subcontract was on record. Then S. W. Dorsey, with a proper regard to his own interests, had a perfect right as a contractor and as a citizen to start petitions, have publications made in the newspapers, and to pay the men who did the work for him. There is no crime in that. Now, if he had hired a man to get up a fraud upon the Government, to present as true things that are not true, to get up petitions signed by false names and have them transmitted here and used by him with the department, that, of course, would be a different case. But so far as the offer in this case is concerned now, I see an offer on the part of the Government to prove facts which do not tend at all to make out the conspiracy or any overt act under the conspiracy. They tend merely to prove that S. W. Dorsey did what every contractor had a perfect right to do and what he ought not to be held criminally liable for trial for doing. Now, everybody knows who is connected with public affairs that there is not a public improvement projected that there are not parties interested in having the work done. These parties have a right to use the press in advocating the work, and they do not always confine themselves to the truth in doing so either, and they have a right to employ agents to attend to business of that sort.

So that, inasmuch as the offer in this case is an offer to prove nothing but the truth, and to prove that Dorsey did nothing but what he had a right to do, I do not see how it would tend, in the slightest degree, to make out the charge of conspiracy if it was allowed to come in; and, as time is valuable, the court does not think it right to spend the public time and its own time and tax counsel in an investigation which can lead to no result.

Then again, on page 1579:

When we come to that I will decide that. But for the present I merely hold that a publication made in a newspaper in Oregon in regard to the expedition on this route which states nothing but the truth in regard to this route is no evidence of fraud, even if Dorsey instigated it and paid for it. Here are petitions sent out from Washington by these defendants to that country and they are signed by numerous parties and they are indorsed by Senators and Representatives, they come here, are laid before the department, the department does not know who started them, but they are indorsed in this way, and if fair petitions—not forged petitions, but fair petitions—stating the truth and indorsed by Senators and Representatives are to be used as evidence of fraud on the part of the contractor merely because he suggested them or wrote out the forms of them, I do not think that is evidence of fraud.

That is just what I am contending for here, gentlemen. I say that Stephen W. Dorsey had a perfect right to do that thing.

Mr. BLISS. If you will refer to my opening you will find I used that precise language.

Mr. WILSON. After having had seven days of time will you not permit me to go on?

Mr. BLISS. I thought you would like to know that I agreed with you for once.

Mr. WILSON. Now he agrees with me. Now we are agreed, gentlemen, and I am glad to know it. He says that Stephen W. Dorsey had a perfect right to do this, and if the petitions are true petitions, and not false petitions, then you cannot draw any inference of guilt from the filing of those true petitions, nor can you draw any inference of guilt as against my client or any of these men because they got up these petitions. What I have said as to Stephen W. Dorsey is exactly true as a matter of course as to Miner. Now we agree that these men had a perfect right to do that thing. I think that whether he and I agree or not, you and I will agree that when a man does a thing that is fair and honest, and which he has a perfect right to do, you cannot draw an inference of guilt against him for having done that thing.

Now, gentlemen, with these two preliminary statements by way of illustration, I come to ROUTE No. 34149, FROM KEARNEY TO KENT.

The indictment, mark you, charges that Brady increased and expedited this route when it was not needed, and when he knew it was not needed. That is one thing. Then they say that that was brought about by means of a forged petition, and they take that petition, and they say that they have proved that Miner forged the petition. If the testimony of Rerdell, which is contradicted by the testimony of Miner, and which is contradicted by the handwriting which they say is forged, constitutes proof of the fact that Miner did it, then you have the proof. Otherwise you have not. But even if it were proved beyond peradventure, proved beyond a reasonable doubt, it is not proved anywhere by anybody that General Brady knew anything about it. These gentlemen have treated this case as though that expedition was made upon that petition alone. Mr. Ker so argued to you and Mr. Bliss so argued to you. If this case had stopped when these gentlemen got through with their argument it would have gone to you just as though that was the only paper in this case. They have claimed to you, and they brought a witness all the way here from Nebraska to prove that that paper was sent to John R. Miner and therefore prove that John R. Miner filed that paper in the department, and therefore to establish the fact that John R. Miner had written in there "Schedule thirteen hours." If this case had rested upon the proof exactly as they left it that would have been the impression remaining upon your minds. What is the history of that petition? The date of the order is June 26, 1879, Mr. Henkle says; I do not happen to be able to place my eye upon it. It was to take effect on the 10th of July, 1879. Recollect, June, 1879, and July, 1879. An order made in June to take effect in July. Let us see whether these gentlemen have given you all that you are entitled to have in this case. They gave you this letter, on page 571:

KEARNEY, NEBR., April 14, 1879.

Hon. ALVIN SAUNDERS, Washington, D. C.:

DEAR SIR: Has there been anything done in the matter of getting a tri-weekly mail between this place and Loup City? Our people are very desirous that the service should be increased, and if you can do anything in this matter to hurry it up and bring it to a final consummation, you will confer a favor on a large portion of the people of both this county and Sherman, and also confer a favor on

Yours, truly,

JOHN D. SEAMAN.

Now, I turn to page 3260, and I find a letter that we brought here from the files of the department when we began introducing testimony for the defense. It is addressed not to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, but to the Postmaster-General himself. Let me read it to you:

LAW OFFICE OF HALE & NIGHTINGALE,
Loup City, Nebr., May 12, 1879.

Hon. D. M. KEY,
Postmaster-General, Washington, D. C.:

DEAR SIR: Will you kindly inform us what, if anything, has been done toward increasing the mail service on mail route No. 34149.

A petition was submitted for the consideration of Congress, requesting the same, and as yet we have heard nothing from it. Immigration and business—

Mark this now, gentlemen, because, as I read to you a while ago, if these are fair petitions, true petitions, if they tell the truth, there is no harm in them—is greatly retarded on account of the defective mail service which exists at the present time.

The country is settling up rapidly, and small villages now dot a district of country which a short time ago was wild prairie land; homes are being established; societies are being formed; and as a consequence these intelligent communities need more extended means of civilized communication. In behalf of the inhabitants of Sherman, Valley, and Custer Counties, receiving their mail on said route, we earnestly ask your influence and assistance for increased service thereupon, if the same has not already been procured.

We are, yours, respectfully,

HALE & NIGHTINGALE.

That letter, gentlemen, although addressed to the Postmaster-General, found its way of course into the office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General. It is dated the 12th day of May, 1879, and is taken from the very jacket on which was written the order of which these gentlemen complain. But that is not all. Away back in January, 1879, this letter appears, which also comes from the same files, and was also before the Second Assistant when he made the order increasing and expediting the service:

KEARNEY, NEBR., Jan. 2, 1879.

Hon. PAUL VANDERVOORT, Omaha, Nebr.:

DEAR SIR: I inclose you petition of Loup City and vicinity—people asking for an increase of service on the route between Kearney and Loup City. This, I think, is needed very much, as that county and Valley, the co. above. is settled up wonderfully in the last year, and if our Democratic Congress will allow this further expenditure, they certainly ought to have it. Then again there seems to be competition between this place and Grand Island for this increase of service, and of course I would like to secure it for here. See John Fury and ask him how Armstrong's letter strikes him by this time. If you can and will do anything for me in the way of getting an increase of service on this route, do so, and if possible for me to throw a stone in your way, I will do it.

Respectfully,

JOHN D. SEAMAN.

Recollect that is addressed to Paul Vandervoort, in Omaha, Nebr., in January. It finds its way here into the files of the Post-Office Department in respect of this particular route. I will show you how in due time. Then what next, gentlemen?

RAILWAY MAIL SERVICE, OFFICE OF CHIEF HEAD CLERK, Omaha, Nebr., Jan. 5th, 1880.

DEAR VALENTINE:

You recollect Valentine was the Representative in Congress for that entire State.

Enclosed find a petition from people of Sherman Co., in regard to increased mail facilities, forwarded by Senator J. D. Seaman, of Kearney, Neb. I would advise you to do all you can to accomplish the end desired by these petitioners for your own welfare and that of the dear people. I shall advise Seaman that I sent the papers to you.

V'y truly,

PAUL VANDERVOORT.
Ch'f H'd Cl'k.

Now, gentlemen, comes another letter. I want your special attention to this, if you please:

LAW OFFICE OF HALE & NIGHTINGALE,
Loup City, Neb., April 26th, 1879.

Hon. ALVIN SAUNDERS,
Washington, D. C.:

DEAR SIR: On behalf of the people of Sherman Valley, and the northern part of Custer Counties receiving their mail on mail route No. 34149, we thank you for the earnest and persistent effort made by you in our behalf.

As we need additional service on said route, we earnestly request that you will exert every endeavor consistent with the high and responsible position in which you are placed to forward our interests in this matter.

Our daily stage line is constantly bringing in settlers, and we constantly feel the necessity for better mail facilities.

Because of the lack of frequent service on said route, immigration and the ordinary course of business is greatly retarded; in some instances parties desirous of locating in these counties wholly refuse to locate in a country where they have so much difficulty in hearing from their friends at a distance.

Again thanking you for your interest shown in this matter, so important to us, and again requesting you to help us in a matter of so much importance to us as settlers and indirectly to the whole State,

We are, very respectfully, yours,

HALE & NIGHTINGALE.

These communications, gentlemen, were sent to Mr. Valentine and to Mr. Saunders, the Representative and the Senator representing the demands, the interests, and the necessities of these people for the mail. This Representative evidently filed those letters in the department, or they would not have been there. General Brady, you remember, told you that he had matinees there nearly every day of Senators and Members coming there to insist upon having more mail. It is through these sources you can see that these letters came into that department and by the dates they bear you will see that every one of them was there at the time this order was made.

Mr. BLISS. Allow me to correct you. You distinctly read one letter dated in 1880.

Mr. WILSON. If I did, let me be corrected. Please point out the letter.

Mr. BLISS. I remember your reading one bearing that date. I think it was headed railway mail service.

Mr. WILSON. If I did it was an oversight in the order of reading.

Mr. BLISS. I think you will find that to be so.

Mr. WILSON. Oh, yes. The letter of Vandervoot to Valentine is dated January 5, 1880. I am thankful to Colonel Bliss for making that correction for me. That letter was not here. You remember, gentlemen, that these letters say a petition had been forwarded. These gentlemen have brought into this case but one petition, and I therefore may reasonably suppose this is the petition. You will recollect that one of these correspondents thanked Senator Saunders for the interest he had taken in this matter. It is very evident, gentlemen of the jury, that that gentleman who came here and said he sent the petition to lock-box 714 or 706, whichever it was, I don't remember, is mistaken about it. It is the easiest thing in the world for a man to be mistaken about a thing of that kind, and I attribute nothing to his discredit in saying he is mistaken about it, because it is just such a thing as a man would be mistaken about. Here is this petition which they say was all that Brady had to go upon. They cut it very fine there as I will show you in a moment. On that petition is an indorsement by Senator Saunders, and as it has had to be pasted over to preserve it I will have to go to the record to read the indorsement. It is on page 570:

SENATE CHAMBER, February 16, 1879.

You recollect now that these parties say they had sent on a petition.

The Loup Valley is a very large and fertile one, and is being settled up rapidly.

Mark that. It is indorsed right on the back of this petition:

I approve of the request made by the settlers for the increased service on the route between Kearney and Loup City, and shall be glad to learn that their petition has been granted.

A. SAUNDERS, U. S. S.

Mr. BLISS. I think the date is erroneously printed. The date should be the 6th, I think.

Mr. WILSON. It is immaterial. Whether it should be the 6th or the 16th, Senator Saunders received that petition; he made that indorsement upon the petition, signed his name to it as United States Senator, and put it in the department. Whether he filed it there or not is not very material in this case, because when General Brady had to act upon this case, when he had to act upon the question that was brought forward for his decision, to wit, the increase of service and the expedition of service, he had there the guarantee of Senator Saunders that that petition stated the case. He had before him at the same time these letters which I have read, saying to him, "This country is settling up rapidly. These people need more mail facilities. There are people who will not stop here, unless they can get more mail facilities. It is not merely to the interest of this particular locality, but the whole State is interested in having these immigrants locate themselves in the State. If they cannot get mail facilities here they will go where they can get them. Therefore this young State of Nebraska—not this particular valley nor this particular county, but this great State of Nebraska—is interested in having this thing done.” These are the papers and these were the representations that were made to him, and nobody has proven here that they were not true. On the contrary, Senator Saunders says they are true. He says, “I indorse what these people say, and I urge upon you to grant them this request.” It was granted. Having been granted under such circumstances, these gentlemen want you to say that the making of that order was an indication of fraud, and that it tends to prove a conspiracy. Ah, but, gentlemen, as I said, they draw a very fine line here. They say, “They did not ask for expedition in these letters; they only asked for increase of service. I will just appeal to any one of you gentlemen. Suppose that out in Nebraska you had been located along the line of that route, and somebody had come around there and you wanted to get your mail quickly and you wanted to get it more frequently. Do you suppose you would know all about these little niceties, these shades of distinction between increase of trips and expedition? You would say, “We want more mail facilities”—wouldn’t you?—mail facilities. That includes trips according to the ordinary mind and the ordinary acceptation, just as much as it does expedition, and expedition just as much as it does trips. But suppose it does not, for the purposes of the point I am making. Will you tell me where the evidence is that General Brady had any knowledge of the fact that that petition was changed after these people had signed it? Let any man sit down in that office to discharge its duties. If a petition comes in signed as this petition was signed, indorsed and vouched for as this petition was indorsed and vouched for, even though you should scrutinize it to see if anything was written in there thus vouched for, would you ever suspect it had been done after it had been signed, and not before? Upon things such as that they are asking you, gentlemen of the jury, to draw an inference against my client in this case.

Well, Fitzalon was put on this route. I will not get out the maps this afternoon as to Fitzalon, gentlemen; I will have to use them as to other matters hereafter. I spoke to you yesterday in regard to one feature of Fitzalon. They say that the mail-carrier in carrying the mail went to Fitzalon anyhow. How did they make that out? The department advertised this route to run by certain points from Kearney to Kent, and it mentions the points. There was a road that ran from one point across to the other. That was the road that was contemplated by the department. Of course, the officers of the department did not travel over these roads, and they do not know just what road a carrier may see fit to go by. It seems there was another road that ran by the way of Fitzalon, and these carriers ran by that road instead of going in the direction that was advertised. They took that upon themselves. Did anybody in the department know that? There is not a syllable of evidence that they did. Nobody ever dreamed of it, and nobody ever heard of it until these industrious gentlemen went around and hunted up these carriers and found out that the carriers had been traveling in one direction instead of the other. Then they say that one of these carriers, French, went through in twelve hours. He was actually going through in twelve hours. How did he do it? In the first place, the department knew nothing about it, and could not know anything about what the carrier was doing. There was nobody out there required to report it and nobody ever did report it.

How did he carry it in twelve hours? By simply not performing his contract. Instead of going to Cedarville, as he was required by his contract to go, he left Cedarville out of the route and went straight through. He got through in twelve hours and then he got up a little private enterprise of his own and supplied Cedarville by a side supply. In that way he was getting through in twelve hours by not carrying the mail as the contract required. Nobody knew anything about it, or could know anything about it. It was nobody's business to report about it. If anybody did report about it, it did not come to the knowledge of the department. They say that the subcontractor was carrying that mail for a good deal less than the contractor got and that should have showed General Brady that he was paying too much. That is the argument. He ought to have known it. He should have known he was paying too much for the service. I said yesterday, and I do not know as I need to repeat it, and shall only say a word or two on the subject, that the contractor agrees to carry the mail for four years, summer and winter. The contractor is bound to carry it for four years, or to be declared a failing contractor and suffer the consequences. The subcontractor, as you find in several of these cases, could throw the mail down at any minute and the contractor was bound to pick it up and carry it on.

Mr. BLISS. Do you say the subcontractor was not liable during the time of his contract?

Mr. WILSON. Not liable to the Government.

Mr. BLISS. No.

Mr. DAVIDGE. He is in no iron contract with the Government.

Mr. INGERSOLL. His subcontract was not on file either.

Mr. BLISS. On this route it was not filed.

Mr. WILSON. It was not filed. Gentlemen, if I expect ever to get through with this case I cannot pick up all these little things, and I am not going to try to do so.

I think I will make one remark in regard to another point here. They say, gentlemen of the jury, that the affidavit as to the men and horses was a false affidavit. That, of course, they have to prove. How do they prove it? They prove it by bringing a subcontractor or a carrier or somebody else here to prove how many horses he used in carrying the mail on the existing schedule and how many he used when he carried it on the expedited schedule. That is the way they did it. The law says that they are to make an affidavit showing how many are necessary to carry it on the one and how many are necessary to carry it on the other. Does it prove how many are necessary by bringing to you the testimony of a subcontractor who said he used so many when he did not perform the contract? This man did not perform this contract. He admitted when he testified that he did not perform the contract, and the fines and deductions imposed upon him show that he did not perform the contract. What was the matter? He did not use enough. It only proves that the subcontractor did not use enough. You must remember that these subcontractors were talking about what they used when they were at liberty to throw that mail down at any moment, whereas when the contractor makes his affidavit he has got to make it with reference to the whole contract term, as I have said once before.

The next is :

ROUTE 38135, FROM SAINT CHARLES TO GREENHORN.

I am going to run through these routes as rapidly as I can. My main purpose in going through them at all, gentlemen, is to show you what Brady acted upon when he made these orders. What about the Saint Charles and Greenhorn route? Recollect the advertisement was not prepared by Brady. It was prepared by Eaton. The route was advertised as from Saint Charles to Greenhorn, giving the distance, and the contract was let on that advertisement. There was undoubtedly an oversight in making that advertisement. There is no doubt about that. The route ought to have been from Pueblo to Greenhorn, but they advertised it as from Saint Charles to Greenhorn, and let the contract from Saint Charles to Greenhorn. Let me say right here that there is one letter written by a postmaster along in January, after these bids were in, saying that this mistake had been made, and that it had been advertised from Saint Charles to Greenhorn, and he supposed it was an oversight. It was one of those things that it was too late to correct. There is not a particle of evidence that Brady ever saw that letter or ever heard of it until it came out in this trial. Why should he? What particular reason was there for his seeing it? It went to the corresponding clerk, and Brady was not called upon to make any order about it. You could not expect him to be mousing around with the industry of Colonel Bliss, and rumaging among all the papers in that vast department. There is not a scintilla of evidence to show that he ever heard of it. But even suppose he had. It was too late to correct it, for the bids were all in. The contract was let from Saint Charles to Greenhorn. You recollect they found that that wouldn't do. The postmaster's letter on the subject is on page 772. I will read it:

SAINT CHARLES POST-OFFICE,
Pueblo County, Colorado, August 15, 1878.

SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C.:

DEAR SIR: This is to inform you that it is impossible for me to act as postmaster here, and have the head of the route here. I have no time to attend to the business, and will not pay any more attention to it as being the head of route No. 38135. Pueblo is the place for the head of the route. Route 38135 should be extended from Saint Charles to Pueblo, and Pueblo made the head of the route, and service paid pro rata, and messenger service done away with.

Prior to this time they had had, in consequence of this mistake that occurred in the department, a messenger service from Pueblo down to the head of this route.

He says to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General:

Route 38135 should be extended from Saint Charles to Pueblo, and Pueblo made the head of the route, and service paid pro rata, and messenger service done away with. By having messenger service between Saint Charles and Pueblo the mails are delayed at Saint Charles post-office three days each trip. By extending the route to Pueblo the mails will go through Pueblo to Greenhorn in one day.

You will please attend to this, as I shall not pay any more attention to the business as this being the head of the route.

Yours, &c.,

JAMES FAIRHURST,
Postmaster.

On the 15th of August, 1878, this letter was written:

SAINT CHARLES POST-OFFICE, PUEBLO, COLO.,
August 15, 1878.

SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C.:

DEAR SIR: Mr. Jacob S. Taylor commenced messenger service between Saint Charles and Pueblo to supply route No. 38135 with mail August 15, 1878, at the rate of $250 per annum.

Yours, &c.,

JAMES FAIRHURST,
Postmaster.

There they had had to employ messenger service from Pueblo to Saint Charles at $250 per annum.

Please give me instruction in regard to settling for temporary service between this post-office and Pueblo from July 8, 1878, to August 12, 1878, being eleven trips at the rate of $275 per annum, that being the best rate that I could secure for carrying it at that time. Please advise at once.

Yours, respectfully,

J. FAIRHURST.

On the 30th of August, 1878, is this jacket:

Date, August 30, 1878; State, Colorado; number of route, 38135; contract, Saint Charles to Greenhorn; length of route, thirty miles; number of trips per week, two; contractor, John R. Miner; pay, $548 per annum.

Postmaster at Saint Charles reports that there is no station out on the Denver and Rio Grande Railroad at his office, and recommends that service on this route be changed so as to embrace and begin at Pueblo, increasing distance twelve miles. Extension will cost at pro rata $328.80 per annum.

Please mark that.

Extension will cost at pro rata $328.80 per annum.

They were paying for temporary service that delayed the mails three days, $275 per annum; and here, for regular service, where the mails would not be delayed, but would go through in one day, covering this same ground, it cost $328.80 apparently. That state of affairs was found in connection with this business on this route. I hope that you will not come to the conclusion that all of this immense business can be done in all its details and nobody ever make a mistake. I hope that you will not come to the conclusion that a little irregularity in any of this business is to be regarded as a criminal irregularity. But now what happened? An order was made, dated August 30, 1878, which reads as follows:

Embrace and change service so as to begin at Pueblo, increasing the distance twelve miles, and allow the contractor $328.80 per annum additional pay, being pro rata, from September 10, 1878.

That order was made by Mr. French. They say that is evidence against Brady, however, I suppose.

Mr. DAVIDGE. What was the slight irregularity you spoke about.

Mr. WILSON. The mistake was in the original advertisement. They did make a mistake there; there is no doubt about that. But it was one that was very easy to be made, and I will show you why. Because this great Denver and Rio Grande Railroad, as you have seen in the testimony in this case, was marching southward. It was on its way to the far South. It had gone beyond Pueblo, and naturally the corresponding clerk would say, "I am not going to advertise this star route from Pueblo to Greenhorn, but I will advertise it from Saint Charles to Greenhorn, so that the railroad will carry it down to Saint Charles." But it turned out that the Saint Charles that was on the railroad was only a water-tank some two or three miles away from the Saint Charles that was on the star route. Now, it was a very natural mistake to make. In his zeal to save all he could for the Government, not to make a star route run where a railroad would carry the mail, the corresponding clerk advertised the route to commence at Saint Charles. It turned out to be utterly impracticable. It was a mistake, and a mistake the correction of which cost the Government about $40 for temporary service in excess of what it ought to have cost.

Now, let us see how this service happened to be increased and expedited. There were placed on file quite a large number of petitions asking for increase and expedition, among them 7 B, which you have heard a great deal about, and which reads as follows :

GREENHORN P. O., PUEBLO COUNTY, STATE OF COLORADO.

Hon. D. M. KEY,

Postmaster-General, Washington, D. C. :

DEAR SIR: The undersigned, citizens of the State of Colorado, county aforesaid, residing and getting their mail on route 38135, from Pueblo to Greenhorn, respectfully represent that it is necessary that the service of said route should be increased from two trips a week to three trips per week and faster time. The country is being very rapidly settled by people of intelligence, and we ask the increased mail facilities for the benefit of those who have already made their homes in this section, and as an inducement to others to settle, frequent mails being one of the strongest inducements to intending settlers.

That is signed by a great number of people, as you will see, and then on the back it is indorsed as follows :

I respectfully request that the prayer of the petitioners be granted.

JAMES B. BELFORD.

1879, April 18th, Colorado. I respectfully recommend the increase of service herein prayed for.

H. M. TELLER.

N. P. HILL.

Now, you have the guarantee of Mr. Teller and Mr. Hill, the two Senators, and Mr. Belford, the Representative, that that petition told the truth ; and not only that, but, as I read to you this morning, Mr. Teller told you that he got from his State numbers of letters, and he was continually calling upon the Second Assistant in regard to it ; and Belford told you the same thing, so far as he was concerned.

Now, what is there, gentlemen of the jury, to complain of about this petition ? They say this petition does not count because it is a forged petition. What is there forged in it ? Imagine either of you to be Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and look at those words "and faster time ;" they have asked you so many times to look at that petition, that I invite your attention to it again. Would you, in passing upon a petition of that kind and reading it over, ever suspect that those words "and faster time" had been written in there after it was signed ? Why, gentlemen, only the assiduity of these learned gentlemen who are representing the Government could discover anything of that kind. I will show you presently that there is a great deal more in this case than that. Somebody says that those words "and faster time" were written in there after they were signed. They have found that out, and they say Brady ought to have known it, and if he had put on his magnifying glasses he would have found it out, and because he did not find it out it is an indication of fraud on his part.

Now, where is 11 B ?

Mr. BLISS. I have it.

Mr. WILSON. I am glad you came back.

Mr. BLISS. I knew you were hankering after me.

Mr. WILSON. Here, gentlemen, is another one of the same kind. They have shown you that letter, I think, about forty or fifty times. This poor, little, short-legged petition with about twenty or thirty names on it, has not cost this Government less than $500 in its travels along the line of this jury. They say those words "and faster schedule" were written in after it was signed, and Brady ought to have seen it, and as he did not see it, why, as a matter of course, he must have been engaged in some devilment in connection with that.

Mr. DAVIDGE. He ought to have had Bliss.

Mr. WILSON. He ought to have had Colonel Bliss along side of him all the time.

Mr. BLISS. It would have been rough on Bliss.

Mr. WILSON. It would have been mighty hard on Bliss, but it would have been a great deal harder on Brady.

Mr. BLISS. He would have had to divide the profits.

Mr. WILSON. Now that you have mentioned that, I would mildly suggest that if Bliss had been there and anything of that sort had been going on, the profits would have been a great deal larger than they were.

Mr. BLISS. That is why you regret he was not there.

Mr. WILSON. Oh, no; I think you would have handled the paper with such facility that if anybody came around there with papers not just right, Brady would not have had much trouble in finding it out. I cannot find that "quicker time." Show me where it is.

Mr. BLISS. You cannot find it? I think you can find it if you want to.

Mr. WILSON. I give it up; it is here, gentlemen. They say Brady ought to have seen that in looking over these petitions, and inasmuch as he did not he must have been a terrible rascal. [Paper handed to jury.] Mr. Evans, you could not find it in a week unless it was pointed out.

Now, what else was there, gentlemen? Mr. Chaffee writes a letter. Mr. Ker don't think much of Chaffee.

Mr. DAVIDGE. He thinks he is all chaff.

Mr. WILSON. He sends several petitions in this case, and Mr. Ker is rather inclined to sneer at ex Senator Chaffee. Well, the people of Colorado thought well enough of him to keep him in Congress a long time and to send him to the Senate :

NEW YORK, April 23, 1879.

Hon. D. M. KEY,
Postmaster-General, Washington, D. C. :

SIR: I have the honor to recommend daily mail service between Pueblo and Greenhorn. The interests of the people of that section require these additional mail facilities.

Yours, truly,

J. B. CHAFFEE.

And then follows one of those petitions which I have just shown to you. And then we have this :

Hon. D. M. KEY,
Postmaster-General, Washington, D. C.

Remember these people were deceiving Key. He was not to know anything about this thing. They were going to deceive him, and to deceive him they sent this communication directly to him.

Hon. D. M. KEY,
Postmaster-General, Washington, D. C. :

DEAR SIR: The undersigned, your petitioners, most respectfully ask you to grant us the following petition :

That you increase the service on route 38135 from two trips per week to a daily mail. In asking this, we do it with the conscientious feeling that we are requesting something of you that did you know the circumstances and condition of the country personally, that you would have no hesitance in acceding to our wishes. Our people are a reading community, and many of us wish to keep posted in the doings of the world through the medium of a daily paper. This can only be accomplished by having a daily mail again. Our population is increasing faster than any one can imagine with seeing the number of emigrants, and while a year since a semi-weekly mail supplied our wants, with our present population it does not meet with the necessities of the people. Hence your petitioners will ever pray, &c.

Then, on page 787 :

[Office of treasurer of Pueblo County, George Morgan, treasurer.]

PUEBLO, COLO., May 6, 1879.

Hon. H. M. TELLER:

DEAR SIR: A petition signed by most of the citizens living in the southern part of our county, and signed by a great many citizens of Pueblo, to establish a daily mail between this point and Greenhorn, has been sent forward and presented to the Postmaster-General, or, I suppose, rather to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General. I wrote you to state that at least one-third of the citizens of Pueblo County outside of the city of Pueblo got their mail at Greenhorn post-office, and that until the building of the Denver and Rio Grande Railway south of Pueblo they had a daily mail, when it was cut down to twice a week.

See what the effect of the railroad was :

The expense of a daily mail will be but small, it being but thirty miles, and the people ought to have it. I will take it as a personal favor if you will see the proper authorities and urge the immediate establishing of this line, or rather of this change, from a biweekly to a daily mail.

Yours, truly,

J. G. CHILCOTT.

My attention is called here to some testimony, at page 830, in respect of one of these petitions :

Q. Can you say whether it is in the same condition now as when it was signed by you or not?—A. I think it is.

Then he says as to 12 B that he thinks it is in the same condition as it was.

Now, let us take 10 B :

Hon. D. M. KEY, Postmaster-General :

The undersigned, citizens of the State of Colorado, residing and getting their mail on route 38135, from Pueblo to Greenhorn, respectfully represent that it is necessary that the service on said route should be increased from two trips per week to six trips per week. The country is being very rapidly settled by people of intelligence, and we ask the increased mail facilities for the benefit of those who have already made their homes in this section, and as an inducement to others to settle, frequent mails being one of the strongest inducements to intended settlers. We also respectfully request and urge that the running time be reduced so as to run from Pueblo to Greenhorn in eight hours, so that the citizens of Greenhorn may get their mails at a seasonable hour.

Gentlemen, is that interlined anywhere? Have these gentlemen ever complained that that was interlined or changed in any way? No. There was a petition which was not tampered with by anybody, asking for eight hours. That is expedition. There were these other petitions which they say were tampered with, asking for faster time and all that. Now, all of these were before the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and they are finally driven to this, gentlemen of the jury. That he made an order for seven hours instead of eight as petitioned for. These petitions that he had before him, and upon which any one of you would have acted without suspicion, all ask for faster time, faster schedule, or something of that kind. And here was one which mentions specifically eight hours as the schedule, and they say he actually made it seven hours, just as though when he came to act upon these things he was bound to adopt the precise time that happened to be named in the petition, whether it suited the balance of the service or not.

What was the Second Assistant Postmaster-General required to do? Why, he had to decide whether he would increase the trips; he had to decide whether he would expedite the service; he had to get the best information that he could. Teller and Hill and Belford and all these petitioners said, "We need this service, we must have this service." One set of petitioners say, "Give us eight hours;" others say "Give us more trips;" others say "Give us faster time." And so it goes. Now what was the Second Assistant to do? Why, to take these evidences of the necessity for the service, and then make such an order as would give the people the service they needed, and make it in such a way as to conform to the other service in that locality. Have we not come to a pretty pass in this case, gentlemen, when they stand here and argue to you that because one or two said seven instead of eight, as asked in one petition, that is an evidence of fraud, and all this, too, in respect of a little route only thirty-two miles long? It is not a mote in this vast system of mail service.

Well, now, there is another trouble in this case, gentlemen. Agate was put on this route. It was a post-office made by the First Assistant Postmaster General. I suppose he was in conspiracy with somebody to get a post-office out there. Probably he and Piper were in the conspiracy. Piper wanted to be postmaster, and I suppose that he and the First Assistant entered into the conspiracy to get up the post-office in order that Piper should be appointed postmaster, and defraud the Government out of his salary. But the First Assistant made Agate a post-office. He then sends word to Brady and says, "Brady, Agate is a post-office, and Piper has been appointed postmaster at Agate." Now, what happens? An order is made to put Agate on this route. That was the only way for it to get the mail. It was only two or three miles off of this route, and that was about the only way it could get the mail. Gentlemen, whatever else you do in this case, and for whatever else you may hold Brady responsible, do not hold him responsible for making Agate a post-office. But Agate got to be a post-office, and then the next thing was to get service upon it. An order putting that service on will be found at page 789 of this record. I see that this order was made by Brady. My recollection was that it was made by French.

Mr. DAVIDGE. A heavy gun.

Mr. WILSON. On the 10th of November, 1880, the corresponding clerk went in to Brady and carried to him a jacket having this indorsement upon it:

The office at Agate, Pueblo County, Colorado, is at present receiving special supply. It can be embraced in this route by increasing the distance three miles, and the contractor's pay $369.90 per annum.

That is what the corresponding clerk said to Brady. Now comes Brady's order:

From December 1, 1880, embrace Agate in this route next after Saint Charles, increasing the distance three miles, and allowing the contractor and subcontractor $369.90 per annum additional pay, being pro rata.

BRADY.

That is the way Agate got on this route. Then Mr. Piper, who was the postmaster at Agate, writes this letter, found at page 789:

AGATE, COLO., September 30, 1880.

Hon. THOMAS J. BRADY,

Second Assistant Postmaster-General:

DEAR SIR: Under date of April 20, I received orders from your office to supply this place with the mail as often as practicable for the pay allowed, the expense of so supplying not to exceed two-thirds of my compensation per annum. Allow me to say that it could not be done for that sum, and consequently I have not put on service.

Very respectfully, yours,

J. S. PIPER, P. M.

I am going to tell my Brother Ker something that he never before observed in this case, I will venture to say, and that is how careful Piper was not to tell the Second Assistant Postmaster-General what his salary was.

Mr. KER. He had the evidence in the mail-bills.

Mr. WILSON. Hold on, Brother Ker. That is the joke of it, if it is a joke. There are two ways, as I told you, of supplying these new offices. One is by a special supply; that is to say, the postmaster hires a man to carry the mail from his post-office to the route without having the regular contractor come by the new post-office. When the postmaster makes a contract of that kind, he is limited in the amount he can pay to two-thirds of his annual salary. For instance, if he hires you to carry the mail from Agate down to Greenhorn, where it would connect with this route, he can only pay you two-thirds of his salary. That is one way of doing it. The other way was to embrace it on the route. Piper had been instructed by Brady to put the mail on this route by special supply. He writes back to Brady most solemnly, saying "I can't get anybody to carry it for the amount that I would be entitled to under the law." Now, I do not know whether Brady thought that that was because the mail was so heavy that a man could not afford to carry it for the salary, or that he thought that Piper was not getting any salary at all. It might be either way. But Piper did not say anything about his salary. The truth was Piper was not getting any salary. There was no mail coming in there. These people had gotten up this post-office, when probably there was no necessity for it. My client is not responsible for that, however. But at any rate, he was getting no salary. Piper wrote that letter to Brady, and then comes this:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECOND ASSISTANT-POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, October 7, 1880.

This is addressed by French, Acting Second Assistant Postmaster-General, to the postmaster at Agate.

SIR: By direction of the Postmaster-General, you are desired to give answer to the underwritten inquiry by writing it opposite thereto, or on the next page, and returning this sheet, containing such answer, signed and dated, without delay.

Respectfully,

J. L. FRENCH,
Acting Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

To POSTMASTER AGATE,
Pueblo County, Colorado.

Then follows this:

Inquiry of Second Assistant Postmaster-General.	Answer of postmaster, Agate.
Would it be practicable to embrace your office on route No. 38135, from Pueblo to Greenhorn? How much would it increase the distance one way by the usually traveled road to change the service as noted above?	Dated October 13, 1880. It would. Answer, three miles.

That is the circular that was sent out to him by French, Acting Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and he writes back that it would be practicable to put it on that route, and it would increase the distance three miles. At the bottom of this Piper says :

If we could have service on this route at this office once a week each way, say from the Saint Charles office on Saturdays to this office, and thence to the Greenhorn, returning on Monday, via this office and the Saint Charles, it would be satisfactory.

Very respectfully, yours,

J. S. PIPER, Postmaster.

Then comes this indorsement :

An order issued November 10, 1880, to embrace Agate on this route, increasing the distance three miles and the contractor's pay $369.90 per annum. It now appears that the distance should have been increased eight miles. The importance of the office will not justify the expenditure. Agate should be made special.

That is the indorsement that the clerk made on the back of the jacket. Then this is the order :

From January 1, 1881, omit Agate from this route, decreasing the distance three miles and deduct from contractor's and subcontractor's pay $369.90, being pro rata.

Allow contractor and subcontractor one month's extra pay on service dispensed with.

Now, there you have the history of Agate. Agate was put on that route. After the distance circular was sent out to the postmaster who had been appointed, not by my client, they found that the increase was three miles, and that $369.90 was the pay for that addition, and Brady ordered it put on that route. They subsequently found out that it made a difference of eight miles, and Brady said, "Well, that office won't justify that, and therefore you will take Agate off of this route," and he cut it off. Now, they say he ought not to have allowed the one month's extra pay. Why not? There was the contract, which said he was entitled to it. This petty, trivial thing is paraded before you by the Government. You can see, gentlemen of the jury, that that is just one of these things that must be happening all over this country. Do you expect that a great, complicated net-work of routes running in all directions can be handled by hundreds and thousands of men in the way of contractors, subcontractors, postmasters, deputy postmasters, and all that, new post-offices being created, and all these things necessary to be done, and something of this kind not creep into such a system? Do you believe, gentlemen of the jury, that Brady, for his share of that pitiful sum of $30, one month's extra pay provided for by the contract, would have made that order? I say it is contemptible. I say it is preposterous to suppose that that would be done. You see this thing just running along in the regular channel—a post-office made by the First Assistant, then that office being put on a route, then a distance circular sent out, disclosing that three miles was the distance, then an order made giving the contractor the additional pay for that distance, then afterwards ascertaining that the distance was eight miles really, then refusing to have it on the route because it would cost too much, and cutting it off. And they say that his action running through a course like that is indicative of fraud, to the enormous amount of one-twelfth part of $369.90; Brady's percentage of which $20 or $30, or whatever it may be, on their theory, would be somewhere about $6 or $8.

That is all, gentlemen, I am going to say about that route. I am going to try to get through with another one before we adjourn.

No. 38134, PUEBLO TO ROSITA, COLORADO.

These gentlemen have not met with any petitions on that route that had been changed. If they have one lurking around that they say has been changed or tampered with by anybody anywhere at any time, I would like to see it just now. None have traveled up and down the line of this jury in this case of which I have any sort of recollection, and I am very sure none has been found. Now, gentlemen, that Pueblo and Rosita route has cut a pretty large figure in this case. The beginning of this will be found at page 870. It is a letter from W. H. Hyde, mayor of Pueblo, to the Postmaster-General himself. If it were not so late, gentlemen, I would get out a map with which to refresh your recollection about this route, but as I will have occasion to use a map in another connection, and as it is getting late in the afternoon and I know you must be weary, for I am very sure I am, I shall not take up your time in that way now.

PUEBLO, COLO., 4-28, '79.

Hon. D. M. KEY,
Postmaster-General, Washington:

SIR: A petition of the citizens of this vicinity has been forwarded to you urging that a daily mail line be put on between Pueblo and Rosita.

The petition represents the facts, and I hope you will be able to agree with us in respect to the urgency and importance of the service.

We in this section will highly appreciate your favorable action.

Very truly,

W. H. HYDE,
Mayor of Pueblo.

I want to bring your attention, gentlemen, to some petitions, in addition to what I have already referred to, that were before the Second Assistant Postmaster-General when he made the orders that were made in this case. The first is:

COLORADO SPRINGS, COLO., April 26, 1879.

Hon. THOMAS BRADY,
Assistant Postmaster-General, Washington, D. C.:

DEAR SIR: It is very important to the people of this part of Colorado that the mail service from Pueblo to Rosita be at once increased to seven times a week and that it be run at a quicker speed.

Rosita and Silver Cliff are filling up very rapidly with people from all sections, and the mail ought to be increased immediately to meet their wants, and I hope it will be done.

Very truly, yours,

THOMAS M. BOWEN,
Judge Fourth District.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Senator Bowen?

Mr. WILSON. He is now a Senator. He was on the stand, and I may have something to say of his testimony after a while. The next is:

PUEBLO, COLORADO.

To the Hon. THOMAS BRADY,
Second Assistant P. M. General:

SIR: The undersigned have the honor to state that, in their judgment, the mail service on the mail route between this city and Rosita, now being run three times a week, should be increased to a daily line with fast schedule time. It is now very slow.

The public interests of this section will be greatly subserved by this increase of service, and we believe, in view of the large population now supplied by this route, and the fact of the immense immigration now flowing in upon us by every train, that there should be no delay in having this done, and we shall hope to hear the order is made soon as we ask.

That is signed by sixteen people, and it is indorsed as follows:

Respectfully referred to Postmaster-General. The request of petitioners is reasonable and necessary, and hope the service will be increased immediately.

J. B. BELFORD, M. C.

I concur in the above.

H. M. TELLER.

Then follows another :

To the POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C. :

The undersigned, citizens of Pueblo, Colorado, beg to represent that the new mining towns of Silver Cliff and Rosita are more accessible to this place than to any other railroad point, and that you have ordered seven times a week mail service from Cañon City to Silver Cliff, while we have only a weekly line.

We urge that you place us on the same footing as Cañon City. This is the natural and proper outlet for all trade and travel to the places indicated, and with a fast schedule of, say ten or eleven hours, and seven times a week mail to Rosita, it would prove of vast importance to the people of both places.

We trust you will put this service on immediately.

That is signed by a large number of people, and is indorsed as follows :

Respectfully referred to the Post-Office Department. This service as asked for is absolutely necessary, and I hope it will be ordered at once.

J. B. BELFORD.

I concur in the above.

H. M. TELLER.

Now, here is another :

GENERAL BRADY,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General :

SIR : The undersigned, citizens of Pueblo, Colorado, have the honor to respectfully but earnestly recommend to you the necessity of increasing the mail service on the route between here and Rosita to a daily line.

The extraordinary mining interest developing in this portion of Colorado, and the enormous increase of our population, and consequent increase and demand for proper and expeditious communication by mail, renders it necessary not only to increase this to a daily line, but to increase the speed also. It should be carried in half the time now occupied.

We hope this petition will receive speedy and favorable attention.

That is largely signed, and is indorsed :

Respectfully referred to the P. O. Department within petition of citizens and business men of Pueblo, Col., with request that this service be put on.

JAMES B. BELFORD.

I concur in the above.

H. M. TELLER.

And then follows a long slip that was cut from a newspaper, in which, you will remember, that the extension of the mail is spoken of:

It should be added—

It says—

to the above that the surplus money over and above the amount paid out on money orders remitted weekly from this office amounts to from $1,500 to $2,000, and there are thirty to sixty-five registered packages daily in transit. When complained to, the Post-Office Department replies that "owing to the limited appropriations allowed by Congress no changes looking to the enlargement of the mail facilities of Cañon City and other places similarly situated can be made." Congress should make a tour in a body to Colorado this summer and learn something.

They would learn a great deal by going out there. Then comes another:

Hon. D. M. KEY,
Postmaster-General:

SIR: We have the honor to call your attention to the mail route between this place and Rosita, and to request that the service thereon be increased so as to make it a daily line and fast time.

This increase should have been made long ago, and now in view of the great influx of population (every train arriving here is loaded) and the vastly greater necessity now than ever before for these additional facilities—

Your petitioners hope you will order the increase asked for.

Signed by twenty people and indorsed:

Respectfully referred to the P. O. Department. I hope this service will be increased as asked for, as the development of this part of the State is very rapid.

J. B. BELFORD.

I concur in the above.

H. M. TELLER.

I am not going to read any more of these, gentlemen. I have read you these petitions and indorsements upon this route for the purpose of showing to you how these Senators and Representatives were insisting upon this service being put on there, saying that it was needed by the people of that section. There are thirteen of these communications, and every one of these thirteen was on file when this order was made; every one of them representing that this service was needed, and Teller and Belford, whose attention was called to these very indorsements, tell you here upon the stand that it was needed; that they made those recommendations in good faith, and for the purpose, as they supposed and believed, of subserving the real interests of the people of that section. They have testified in regard to that here. Mr. Teller urged it in person; Belford urged it in person. These letters were dated as far back as April, 1879.

Now, gentlemen, I want to call your attention to one or two things that have been put into this case for the purpose, as I suppose, of inducing you to believe that this service was not needed. They brought a witness here by the name of Walters, and they have introduced a letter from a Mr. Monroe, who was postmaster. That letter is dated March 17, 1879, and is found at page 869:

GREENWOOD, COLO., March 17, 1879.

Mr. JAMES H. TYNER,
First Assistant Postmaster-General:

My duty to the department requires that I should suggest the discontinuance of the present mail service (weekly) from Pueblo to Rosita, as we now have a tri-weekly from Florence to Greenhorn, by which we receive all our mail at present, and while we should much prefer the route from Pueblo to Rosita, yet so long as we have the mail promptly by the other route, the service from Pueblo to Rosita is superfluous and a needless expense to the Government. I do not make this suggestion at the instance of any interested parties, but simply as a saving to the department.

I am, dear sir, yours, very respectfully,

A. Q. MONROE, Postmaster.

Indorsed:

P. M., Greenwood, suggests discontinuance of service.

That was dated on the 17th of March, 1879. There you have that one letter from Monroe suggesting that, while they would prefer the Pueblo and Rosita route, yet at his particular post-office they got their supply—this was the post-office at Greenwood—from another route, and therefore he thought that Pueblo and Rosita ought to be discontinued. He says we would prefer Pueblo and Rosita as a route, but “as we at Greenwood get our mail by another route you might just as well discontinue Pueblo and Rosita.” In opposition, however, to all that come these thirteen or fourteen petitions to which I have called your attention, with all the indorsements upon them that I have read, asking not only that it be continued, but that it be made a daily service and on a fast schedule.

They have got another letter in here, and this letter, mark you, is dated May 8, 1880—this letter coming after the fact. It is a very interesting letter, on account of the man who wrote it. It is found at page 869:

GREENWOOD, COLO., May 8, 1880.

To the FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C.:

DEAR SIR: We have received no daily mail by route 38134 since April 30, 1880, it having been carried to the former location of the office. While this office is located on the route on which the contract was let, they have persistently refused to deliver here. Both myself and postmaster at Rosita, Custer County, Colorado, also P. M. Ingersoll, at Pueblo, consider it a useless and expensive route to the Government, as this office is the principal one on route 38134, can be, and is now supplied by route 38169, which is ample to supply the demands of this office. We suggest that route 38134 be discontinued, and that Silver Park office (a precinct containing about fifty persons all told) can be supplied by a tri-weekly mail from Rosita at a trifling expense to the Government compared with the present.

Hoping the above will receive your earnest attention, I remain, yours respectfully,

J. W. WALTERS,

Postmaster, Greenwood. Custer County, Colo.

Now, gentlemen, you will remember something about that Mr. Walters. Recollect that Mr. Walters, after this order has been made, after these things have been done, and done, too, upon the faith of what I have already called your attention to, writes that letter. Why did he write it, gentlemen? Because he was the postmaster at the place known as Greenwood, which was on the line of this route. Mr. Walters, I believe, was a doctor or a druggist, and he had a farm about a mile and a half off of the route, and he undertook to carry the post-office at Greenwood down to his farm, so that the Greenwood post-office was circulating all over the country like a sort of ignis fatuus; Greenwood was not particularly located anywhere. But he says they got no mail at the post-office; that since a certain time the contractor had persistently refused to bring the mail to his office. Why? Because he had carried his office a mile and a half off the route—a thing he had no right to do. He had no more right to move that post-office than I have to go down here to-day and move the city post office over into Georgetown—not a bit. The law does not allow him to do it. Yet he had assumed to himself the right to do it, and had gone off down there, and because the mail did not come around to his post office, gotten up on his private account, he writes this letter asking that the whole service be discontinued. The complaint is that he did not discontinue it on the letter of this postmaster. Here General Brady had all the petitions and recommendations upon which he had a right to rely, as I shall show you after a while, and here comes along a letter from this postmaster, under the circumstances that I have stated. And they say to you that because Brady did not abolish that route, cut off that service, he must have been a rascal, and that he did not do it because he was carrying out a conspiracy to defraud the Government.

Mr. DAVIDGE. A conspiracy against the drug business.

Mr. WILSON. Yes; it was a conspiracy against this fellow's drug-store.

I have one other point on this, as to the question of arrivals and departures. I promise your honor, and I promise you, gentlemen, that I will finish in five minutes, and not return to this route on Monday.

They say that the adjustment and arrangement of arrivals and departures was such that the mails had to lie over, and practically nothing was gained. If that is so, gentlemen of the jury, whose fault is it? I am ready to meet any question these gentlemen can present in any case. Was it General Brady's fault? Did you expect him to be down there seeing that those mails started at a particular time and arrived at a particular time? You will not require anything of that kind of him. Nor does the law, nor do the regulations, because the regulations have fixed it in another way. And how is that?

Just so soon as expedition is ordered on any route the very first thing that is done is for the corresponding clerk to send out one of these schedules for the postmasters and the contractor to arrange for the time of arrivals and departures. If I had the time I would read you one of these schedules. In another connection I may take occasion to do so. But that is the first thing they do. The postmaster at Pueblo knows just when the trains arrive at Pueblo. The postmaster at Rosita knows just the time of the arrival of mails and the departure of mails at Rosita. Therefore they send this circular out to those two postmasters and say to them, "Now, you and the contractor arrange the arrivals and departures on this route." And in those circulars they say to them, "Pay particular attention to making these arrivals and departures conform to the other service at your office, so that the mails will not be lying in your office, and so that when a man's letter comes to your office to go over this route it shall be picked up and taken on." Their attention is particularly called to that. Now they send out, and the postmasters and contractor say that it must start here and arrive there; start here at this hour, and arrive there at that hour; start from there at a certain hour, and get back here at a certain hour. And they put that down in writing on this circular and they send it back to the Post-Office Department. Now, what in the world has the corresponding clerk to guide him except this? What better evidence could he get? What better device could you make, gentlemen, to keep this system harmonious, than just that? When this comes back then the corresponding clerk puts that schedule on a jacket; he writes on the back of that jacket what it is that has been recommended by those two postmasters and the contractor, and he writes such an order fixing the schedule of arrivals and departures, and that is carried into the chief clerk. He checks it and carries it in to the Second Assistant, and he signs his name to it, the check mark being his guarantee that that thing is all right. And thus they fix the schedule of arrivals and departures.

And now, gentlemen of the jury, where that very thing was done, they bring a postmaster or an assistant postmaster here, who did not want to get up early enough in the morning, or who wanted to go to bed too early at night—that does not very often happen; they are more likely to want to sit up at night; it would be better for them to go to bed early—but for some reason or other of convenience to him or them they fixed up a schedule of arrivals and departures, as it is said here on this trial, which delayed the mail. That is what they say.

Do any of you suppose Turner knew anything about that when he made up his jacket? Is there any man here that will be uncharitable enough to suppose that William H. Turner, when he made up that jacket, knew that that schedule that had been made up by those two postmasters and the contractor was going to delay those mails? Why, nobody would believe that.

Does anybody here suppose that Thomas J. Brady, when, pro forma, he signed his name to that order that had been written on that jacket, pursuant to what these postmasters and the contractor had done, ever supposed for a moment that it would delay the mails? What interest had he in delaying the mails? Did it add anything to the pay to delay the mails? Oh, no, gentlemen. It is one of those little things that has been picked up by the industry of these most industrious Government prosecutors to throw into this scale, hoping that by the aggregation of contemptible things like this they might be able to prejudice the minds of this jury.

That is all I have to say, gentlemen, as to that particular route. I expected to have been through by this time, and would have been very nearly through but for the interruption of yesterday. For, while there is a good deal of paper here in my notes, there is not much that I am going to travel through. Now, your honor, I am through to-day.

The COURT. Before adjourning I wish to mention one subject. It is manifest that there is going to be more argument in this case than I supposed we were likely to have. Judge Wilson is now fairly into his case, has got warmed up, and I suppose will give us a day or two more.

Mr. WILSON. Not more than one, I think, your honor.

The COURT. I hardly think it would be right for the court to hear more than one argument for each defendant. Judge Wilson is now speaking on behalf of his special client, General Brady, and there are other gentlemen who represent other defendants. I do not see how, with propriety and conformably to the rules and practice of the court, we can have more than one argument for each of the other defendants.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Your honor, I ought to make a remark in relation to this. We have acted upon the information of the court, and it would produce a great deal of inconvenience if you change that ruling already made. I do not think we shall occupy a great deal more time. Take this case of General Brady. Mr. Chandler will, I am very sure, not traverse the field occupied by Mr. Wilson; and so it is rather a division of labor than two arguments in relation to the same subject-matter; and that is so with regard to the Dorseys. We do not intend to inflict double arguments on the same subject-matter. I myself am watching the course of the argument with a view to economize time, as far as I can. Mr. Carpenter, I have no doubt, has familiarized himself with these routes, so far as the Dorseys are concerned, and I confess that I have not; I have been looking to him for that.

The COURT. I think, Mr. Davidge, no one knows better than yourself the practice of the court.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Well, but you told us we might adopt the other plan, and we have acted upon it, and now you take us by surprise.

The COURT. I said the defendants would follow, as many of them as——

Mr. INGERSOLL. [Interposing.] As many as chose.

The COURT. As many as chose.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is what you told us and we have acted upon that.

The COURT. But that was intended, of course, to be within the ordinary rule. I did not suppose that probably all the defendants would care to be heard by separate counsel.

Mr. WILSON. Without interrupting your honor, I suppose it is not necessary to detain the jury.

The COURT. No. Gentlemen of the jury, you are discharged until Monday morning.

Mr. WILSON. [To the jury.] You cannot say I have never done you a good turn.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I certainly shall not cover the same field occupied by another.

The COURT. If you understood me as saying anything on that occasion varying from the ordinary practice, it was perhaps my fault in not making myself clearer.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Would it be proper for the court to give us as much time to reply as has been occupied by the counsel for the prosecution, whether used by one person, or by two or more?

The COURT. That is a kind of practice that would be entirely new.

Mr. INGERSOLL. We have acted, or at least I have acted, on what your honor said before.

Mr. DAVIDGE. We have all done so.

The COURT. I have embraced this opportunity, Friday evening, at the end of the week, prior to the adjournment over till Monday, for the purpose of making this suggestion, as it occurred to me that possibly there might be a misapprehension upon the subject.

Mr. INGERSOLL. There certainly was a misapprehension if what the court says now is intended to be different from what was conveyed to us before, because we agreed among ourselves as to what part should be taken by the various counsel in the case.

The COURT. Oh, yes, I know; but all of the counsel are certainly familiar with the case after all this time.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Not with a record of this sort, your honor.

The COURT. This matter was talked over——

Mr. INGERSOLL. [Interposing.] I do not think there would be any time gained.

Mr. DAVIDGE. There would not be a minute gained.

The COURT. When it was suggested that the Government should have two speeches in reply, it was stated on the part of the Government that probably no time would be saved by confining the reply to one; but although I felt the pressure of the claim of the Attorney-General of what seemed to me to be an intimation of his wish, as representing the Department of Justice, to make a last speech in the case, and notwithstanding I was very anxious to accommodate him, and would have been glad to do so, in consequence of his reputation in the country and his eminent position at the head of the very department that is conducting this prosecution, yet I felt bound to say that there could be but one reply.

Mr. INGERSOLL. We did not object to his replying.

The COURT. That is the rule of practice, and I think I must apply it to your side now, as I did to the prosecution, and must say that you can have only one speech for each defendant.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Your honor deviated from that rule in regard to the opening.

The COURT. No.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I never in my life have heard of two opening arguments.

The COURT. I have.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Never in this court, and I have been here for a third of a century. There is no such precedent in the court.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I understood the court to say before that the attorneys for the defense, as many as thought proper, could answer, and it was upon that we acted.

The COURT. I did not reflect that some of the defendants were represented by double counsel, and the remark was made by me when I was thinking that some of the defendants might not care to have counsel address the jury at all, so that my remark was intended simply to mean that such counsel for defendants as might choose to address the jury should have the opportunity to do so, not thinking that that would give two or more counsel the opportunity of speaking for the same defendant.

Mr. INGERSOLL. If the court insists upon a different rule from what we supposed, I presume that the defendants will have the right to select counsel to present their case to the jury.

The COURT. Of course. I do not care what counsel do it, but I think that only one counsel should be heard for one defendant.

Mr. INGERSOLL. For instance, Mr. Miner might want to employ me to present his case, and Mr. Dorsey might want to have it understood that Mr. Davidge should present his case.

The COURT. Those are private arrangements.

Mr. INGERSOLL. We have the right to make those arrangements, I take it.

The COURT. Of course, the court would not——

Mr. INGERSOLL. [Interposing.] The court would certainly allow as many speeches as there are defendants.

The COURT. I will allow each defendant to be represented by one counsel.

Mr. INGERSOLL. And you will allow that defendant to select his counsel.

The COURT. Of course; he has a right to do that.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Had not your honor better leave it as it is? We have acted upon your ruling.

The COURT. No; you have not acted yet.

Mr. DAVIDGE. We have. I have, your honor. I am speaking of what I know. I have paid no attention whatever to these routes, and at this late day am I to take up an intricate and complicated subject of this sort when I say I have not gone over these routes particularly?

The COURT. I think these routes are so much common ground that there will be nothing left undone amongst you in regard to them. The real defense of one is so much the defense of the others, and of all, in a case of this kind, that I do not see any propriety in changing the rule. There is some difference in the case of General Brady; his case is more distinguishable from the others, perhaps, than any one of the others from the rest. But still they all have their separate and independent grounds to some extent.

Mr. DAVIDGE. We will not take any more time, sir. We will guarantee that.

The COURT. Your guarantee is very good in some things. I do not know how much time you would actually take if there were two of you allowed to speak, and I do not know how much time might be saved if the rule is followed.

Mr. DAVIDGE. We will divide the field.

The COURT. I think I had better stand by the rule. I give you this notice, at any rate, and will consider of it until Monday morning. But I wished to give you this timely intimation.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The court may not feel so tired Monday morning as on Friday evening.

The COURT. It may feel more reluctant to start into a new week.

Mr. INGERSOLL. After you have heard me speak ten days I have no doubt you would like me to go on further.

The COURT. When I was a boy my old minister always preached sixty minutes, and always maintained that he never knew a soul to be converted after the hour [laughter]; and I think if you cannot carry this jury, amongst you, with one speech for each defendant, they must be hard to convert.

Mr. INGERSOLL. It took fourteen days to open for the Government.

Mr. CARPENTER. I understand your honor to give this information now, and to say that you will not decide it entirely until Monday morning. I would be glad to make this suggestion in the case. Understanding that all of us were to argue the case, we have divided the labor, and we do not expect to travel over each other's ground at all. Nothing would be gained by wearying the jury in that way. We have prepared ourselves with that understanding, and we will get through it sooner in that way than if the new ruling is enforced against us.

The COURT. I know when this question was up as to the Attorney-General the other day, I remarked that I did not see much difference between one man speaking four hours and two men speaking for two hours each; that it would be the same time in either case; but you insisted upon the rule.

Mr. CARPENTER. We are not insisting upon anything, but we are saying that in good faith we have acted upon the suggestion of the court and divided this work among ourselves. And now there is this difficulty, for instance, none of the counsel representing the Dorseys are prepared to go over the whole case; we have divided our work, and each has taken his part.

The COURT. I shall not do so much injustice to your preparation or to your intellectual powers as to credit that story. I am sure there is not one among you who is not able to go over this whole case upon an hour's notice.

Mr. CARPENTER. Your honor thinks it is a very easy case.

Thereupon (at 4 o'clock and 27 minutes p. m.) the further hearing of this case was adjourned until Monday morning, May 14, 1883, at 11 o'clock.

MONDAY, MAY 14, 1883.

The court met at 11 o'clock.

Present, counsel for the Government and for the defendants.

The COURT. In regard to the question that was suggested before the adjournment of the court on Friday, whether the court will allow more than one argument on behalf of any of these defendants, I think it best that that matter should be disposed of now, so that counsel may have an opportunity to make their arrangements before the argument proceeds further. A few days ago, when something was said on this subject, the court, after assigning the place of the Government in the argument, remarked that the defense could be heard by as many counsel as chose to speak. That remark has been understood as meaning that any one of the defendants might speak through as many counsel as he chose to select. I do not think the remark ought to be understood in that way; at least the court ought to have explained it more fully. The meaning intended to be conveyed was that if any of the defendants chose to waive counsel they might speak, of course; that as many as chose to address the jury should have the privilege and the right to do so; that the court would listen to as many as should choose to address the jury; not that the court would depart from the usual rule, if the practice was such as to deny any of these defendants the right of being heard by more than one counsel. The simple suggestion was that as many defendants as chose to be heard by counsel could have the opportunity. The question is whether in a case like this each defendant can be heard by two counsel. I do not see myself upon what ground that privilege could be accorded. If it were a case of burglary or a case of murder in which there were several defendants, such a claim could not be set up and maintained. Although the pleas might have been entered by each of the defendants severally yet, if the charge were one and the pleas, although severally entered, were the same, and the defense substantially the same, the practice is not, where three or four, for example, are indicted for murder or burglary or other crime, to allow each of the defendants to be heard by two counsel. If there were three, in such a case there would be six counsel, and if four, eight counsel. That has never been the practice in this court, and has never been the practice anywhere. In this case the crime charged is that of conspiracy, which in its nature is joint. Everything else belonging to the indictment is accessory to the main charge, and, although one may be acquitted, or two may be acquitted, there must be two in a case of conspiracy to justify the jury in finding a verdict of guilty. In that respect the indictment is not substantially different from an indictment in other cases which charges a joint offense. The fact that the defendants have each pleaded severally cannot make any difference, because each has pleaded the same plea and the issue is upon the indictment. It is a joint indictment. In the second volume of Tidd's Practice, marginal page 860, is the following passage upon this question:

When several defendants appear by separate attorneys and have separate counsel, if they are in the same interest only one counsel can be heard to address the jury, and the witnesses are to be examined by one counsel on the part of all the defendants in the same manner as if the defense were joint.

And he refers to a case in 4 Campbell, 174, which I have examined, and which fully sustains the doctrine that I have read, and to some other authorities which I have also looked at. In England, therefore, but one counsel would be heard, although the government would have the opening and the closing, too. But it has been claimed in this case, and the right has been conceded, that each defendant shall have the privilege of presenting his defense through his own chosen counsel. That is proper. If the case were to be tried upon the theory suggested by counsel in consequence of the pleas being several, as a several case against each of them, then the Government would be entitled to an opening speech and a closing speech as to each defendant. That theory, of course, leads to an absurdity, and is inadmissible. Such a thing would be unexampled, and would be very inconvenient. You could not try a case that way, and have an opening and a closing on the part of the Government as to each one of the defendants. They are all here, therefore, as joint defendants under indictment, and according to the liberality of our practice in this country—a liberality which is much larger than that of the English practice, which allows but one argument for the whole—we admit one argument for each defendant. I see that there may be some disappointment produced by this ruling; but where there are at least five arguments to be heard by able counsel, it appears to me that no injustice can result to any one of the defendants under this ruling. Of course there may be some interchange of counsel in consequence of the determination to which I have come. That I will leave to them. I shall not interfere with any arrangement within this rule that counsel may make among themselves as to who shall appear. That I do not deem proper.

Mr. HENKLE. If the court please, inasmuch as I represent two of the defendants I suppose there will be no objection to my dividing the labor of representing those two with somebody else.

The COURT. The less said on that subject the better.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I will only state, your honor, that we all understood that in view of the character of the case you deemed it proper to depart—

The COURT. [Interposing.] I just stated that that was a misconception or it was an inadvertence probably in some degree on the part of the court in not explaining itself more fully. But if you will look at the remarks made by Colonel Ingersoll on that occasion you will find that he expressly declared over and over again as his understanding of the ruling that there should be one counsel for each of the defendants.

Mr. DAVIDGE. He said that, your honor, in connection with the proposition of one counsel for the Government.

The COURT. One counsel in conclusion for the Government.

Mr. DAVIDGE. We were talking also about the opening. You ruled contrary to the usual practice that the Government might have, in view of the character of the case, as many openings as it wanted, and thus it seemed to me only reasonable that a similar indulgence should be granted to the defense, and we acted accordingly. I now understand that the Government has had their advantage of the departure from the practice. They have had what I have never known to be permitted to the Government before—two opening speeches—and they have availed themselves of that permission, each speech covering the space of seven mortal days.

The COURT. Yes.

Mr. DAVIDGE. It is not for me to enter into any argument upon this subject. The fact is that there is so much of discretion in respect of a subject of this sort that I hardly regard it as within the purview of argument. I have seen, somewhere, contrary to what your honor read from that book, that the fact of bunching defendants does not interfere with their right to be represented by counsel under the practice of the court, and hence that even two counsel might be allowed. I now understand differently. I wish your honor had announced your decision earlier, because it appears to me that an adherence to the practice of this court would have confined the Government to one counsel. If we had known it earlier, too, we might have done this: We might have had a certain amount of time allotted to us and divided that time according to our discretion. Time appears to me to be more important than persons, although other gentlemen do not appear to concur with me in that opinion. I have had a notion from the beginning that there was something in this article of time, although I am very fast losing any respect for time and fixing my hopes upon eternity. Now, therefore, all I have to say is that we have heard the views of your honor, and in our own way we will, as it is our duty, endeavor to conform to the last outgiving of the court, and that is that each defendant shall have the privilege of being heard by one counsel.

The COURT. I presume it was not your intention to intimate that your hopes of eternity rested upon the eternity of this case.

Mr. DAVIDGE. There is something in the nature of this case to inoculate a man with a profound disregard of that article, time. I have never known anything like it. However, I do not think we will be found obnoxious to any criticism in respect of time. We will endeavor, whether many or few argue this case, to bear in mind the fact that everybody is or ought to be interested in bringing the case to a speedy termination so far as practicable. If this case had been opened in an ordinary manner and an ordinary amount of time consumed, I do not think we would have had a single word to say in reply.

The COURT. From the respect I entertain for your learning and experience——

Mr. DAVIDGE. [Interposing.] You can find anything in these books, your honor. There are so many courts and so many different practices that I can go out and fetch in a book that will contradict what you have read.

The COURT. I don't think you can.

Mr. DAVIDGE. It is entirely a matter of practice. There is no more uniformity than there is in the regulation of one's household. Each man regulates his household for himself. I have my fashion and you have yours.

The COURT. That being the case, this household will be regulated as I have said.

Mr. DAVIDGE. We have to conform to your honor, of course. You regulate this household.

The COURT. In regard to the general practice, I will read from this book for the purpose of setting you right. You have spoken of what you have called an extraordinary privilege granted to the Government in opening the case with two counsel. The practice in England, to be sure, is somewhat different from ours. With regard to that practice this author, who is the highest authority on questions of practice——

Mr. DAVIDGE. [Interposing.] Who is it, your honor?

The COURT. Tidd.

Mr. DAVIDGE. There is nothing in that about criminal practice.

The COURT. Oh, yes, there is. It is full of criminal practice as well as civil.

Mr. DAVIDGE. The court of King's Bench, I think, in England.

The COURT. [Reading:]

When the jury are sworn the junior counsel for the plaintiff opens the pleadings; after which, if the proof of the issue rest on the plaintiff, as where the general issue is pleaded, the senior or leading counsel states his case to the jury, and after calling and examining witnesses in support of it the counsel for the defendant are heard, and if they call any witnesses, the plaintiff's counsel have the general reply.

You see according to the English practice the junior counsel opens the pleadings in the case to the jury, and he is followed then by a statement of the case and its facts by the senior counsel, so that two counsel for the Government open, and then the defendants follow, after which comes the reply by the Government. I think that an allowance of two counsel in this case to the Government was strictly proper. Proceed now, Mr. Wilson.

Mr. WILSON. [Resuming.] May it please your honor and gentlemen of the jury, I congratulate you this morning that you still live and give such evidences of physical and mental endurance. Notwithstanding the fact that when I began my address in this case I expected that my immediate associate as counsel for General Brady, Mr. Chandler, would follow me and present for your consideration matters which I had not intended to detain you with, I shall still endeavor not to disappoint the hope that I led you to entertain when I began, that my argument would be, comparatively and relatively speaking, not a very protracted one. I shall not very much, if at all, enlarge upon the views that I had intended to present at the outset, or the field over which at the outset

I proposed to travel. I find, however, gentlemen of the jury, in traveling over a case like this that I omit to say many things that perhaps others would think and do think I ought to more elaborately discuss. I met a gentleman on the street on Saturday, and the first thing he did was to criticise a portion of my argument, as perhaps you have criticised it, or as perhaps my associate counsel may have criticised it. He said to me, after looking over my argument in this case, "I find you have been discussing the question as to the number of letters that went through the mail. What has that to do with the case? Suppose there was only one letter in a mail-bag. It might be of infinite importance to have that letter go through," and he gave me an illustration. I mention it because I am about entering upon a field of this case and a part of the territory covered by this case which serves to make what was said to me important. I give it to you as a part of my argument, and by way of illustration: A registered letter is addressed to a certain point. It has a draft in it for $250,000 to buy a mine. If it is a weekly mail the transaction fails. If it is a daily mail it goes to its destination, and the transaction is accomplished. There is a great business transaction, the importance of which can scarcely be overestimated, and yet it is all comprised in one little letter, the postage on which is a three-cent stamp. He said to me, "I do not think you elaborated that matter sufficiently." But I am not going to take up your time by alluding to it further this morning, gentlemen.

ROUTE 38145, FROM GARLAND TO PARROTT CITY, AND ROUTE 38156, FROM SILVERTON TO PARROTT CITY.

When I closed on Friday afternoon, I had reached in the order in which Mr. Ker discussed this case, route No. 38145, from Fort Garland to Parrott City, and the next one in order that he referred to was the route from Silverton to Parrott City. I am going to consider these two routes in connection with each other in part, because these two serve to illustrate two or three important questions which I have been attempting to bring to your attention. When these gentlemen came before you to discuss this case they produced a little piece of paper about so long [illustrating], with a red line or a yellow line, or a black line, running across it indicating that particular route. They showed that to you as though that was the particular thing, and that alone which you had to consider in connection with it, and then after a while they passed from that and showed you another little piece of paper with another red or yellow or blue or black line drawn upon it indicating another route, and they dealt with these things as separate and independent things, whereas I say they are factors in a great problem, each one of them having a relation to the other. This serves to illustrate just what I have been contending for heretofore. It is valuable for another reason, gentlemen, that it shows to you how the department has dealt with all these routes, not as separate and independent things, but as parts and parcel of a vast system. And it shows another thing: it shows how, in the progress of affairs, railroads have obliterated star routes, and how the department has conducted itself with reference to this advance in the affairs of men—these great improvements that are going on all over the country, and how it is continually adjusting and readjusting, changing and rechanging the star-route system to make it conform to the great railroad system of the country. Now, let us look at the map for a moment, gentlemen. This is a route that ran from Fort Garland to Parrott City. Here is a map which was introduced in evidence. See how the route went originally.

Here is Fort Garland. You will remember the witnesses testified that when those routes were let the railroads were not in here [indicating]. Here is Pueblo [indicating]. Here is Fort Garland [indicating]. Now, this route ran down by way of Ojo Caliente, which is right here [indicating], and then around to Durango and Animas City. Remember that Animas City is only a mile from Durango. Then it came around down here [indicating], and through here to Animas City and across to Parrott City, which is right over here [indicating]. That was the condition of things when these contracts were let. Then the railroad from Denver down by way of Pueblo, which is here [indicating], was constructed down to Barrancas, which is right there [indicating], and Barrancas came to be the end of that railroad as constructed. It ran through Fort Garland, so that this railroad passed right over this route for a very long distance. On this map, also, is the route from Silverton to Parrott City. Here is Silverton [indicating] and here is Parrott City [indicating]. Now, here was a route from Fort Garland running around to Parrott City, and here was another route running from Silverton across to Parrott City. There were different roads through that country over which these mail carriers traveled, just as there were in the case of the route from Kearney to Kent.

I am not going to take up your time and consume my own with regard to that matter. By the way, gentlemen, you must not charge me with the half hour that was consumed this morning and with the hour and a half that went by a day or two ago. Do not charge that to me whatever you do. You will see, gentlemen, these two routes on the map. One started from this point [indicating], ran around here [indicating], and came out at Parrott City; and the other went from Silverton also to Parrott City. Over both of these routes these parties had the contracts, and since the contracts were let the railroads have been built just as indicated on the map and as shown by the testimony. Now, take the large map. This is the post-office map. Here we have Pueblo on this map [indicating] and here is Fort Garland. They have got the railroad marked on this post-office map. The route came on down here [indicating] to Conejos and Ojo Caliente. There was a little of it cut off because it went into Mexico. Then it comes around up here [indicating] and over to Parrott City. There were those two star routes that were running in the way that you see upon this map. Now, gentlemen, this route from Garland to Parrott City was two hundred and eighty-eight miles in length. Remember that. The first thing that you find happening in this record with reference to that route is that they cut it off at Ojo Caliente. The difference between Garland and Ojo Caliente was cut off this route, which is one hundred and sixteen miles. Why? Simply because they built a railroad there and it was no longer necessary. I want you to observe that the department is adjusting the service all the time in accordance with the changed condition of the affairs of the country—and I want to impress it upon your mind, for this record proves, gentlemen, beyond all sort of question, that all of the dealing with these routes by the department has been regular and straightforward—to conform the service to these changed conditions of affairs. On page 1074 we find the order introduced in evidence. The jacket is dated June 26, 1878:

That portion of this route from Garland to Ojo Caliente will be superseded by service on route 38163, saving one hundred and sixteen miles.

So far in red, now in black ink:

Curtail service so as to commence at Ojo Caliente, omitting Garland and Conejos, decreasing distance one hundred and sixteen miles, and deduct from contractor's pay $1,105.66 per annum, being pro rata. Allow contractor one month's extra pay on service dispensed with.

BRADY.

Could anybody complain of that? This railroad had been built down there, and so they curtailed the service on the star route one hundred and sixteen miles, and deducted from the contractor's pay the pro rata amount of money, but gave them a month's extra pay for the service dispensed with. Could anybody complain of that? I showed you, gentlemen, the other day, that the contract stipulated for it. It is exactly, therefore, in conformity with the needs of the country and precisely in conformity with the contract between the Government and the contractors. That was done by Brady. The next thing we find is this, on the 23d of January, 1879:

Curtail service so as to end at Animas City, omitting Parrott City, decreasing the distance eighteen miles, and deduct from contractor's pay $171.56 per annum, being pro rata, and allow one month's extra pay on service dispensed with from February 16, 1879.

FRENCH.

That order was made by French. Now recollect, gentlemen, the last order that I read to you, which was cutting off the service at Animas City, taking off the distance between Animas City and Parrott City, was made on the 23d of January, 1879. Recollect that. On this Ojo Caliente route, as we commonly call it, on the 23d of January, 1879, they curtailed the route so as to make it stop at Animas City. That order was made by French. I have pointed out to you on the map the Silverton and Parrott City route. We find that on precisely the same day, the 23d of January, 1879, this order was made, as appears on the jacket:

Service on route 38145 has been curtailed so as to end at Animas City—

They stopped it right there—decreasing the distance eighteen miles. Animas City can be embraced on this route—

That is, the route from Silverton to Parrott City—by increasing the distance ten miles, which change would give the office at Animas City twice instead of once a week supply as at present.

That is the indorsement that was made on that jacket by the corresponding clerk. That indorsement went in to the Second Assistant's office, and then came the order in these words:

1st. Embrace Animas City next after Hermosa, increasing the distance ten miles, and allow contractor $215.65 per annum additional pay, being pro rata, from February 16, 1879.

2d. Allow subcontractor $330.43 per annum additional pay, being pro rata.

FRENCH.

Those orders were made by French. Gentlemen, just see how that worked. Here they found that by cutting off this Ojo Caliente route and making it terminate at Animas City, they would save eighteen miles of distance, and then by putting Animas City on the Silverton and Parrott City route, they would increase the distance on that route ten miles, so that in the aggregate there was a saving of eight miles, and these two orders were made on exactly the same day, cutting it off of one and putting it on the other. But now these gentlemen say that they had to go through Animas City any way on one or the other of these routes, and therefore there should not have been any increase of distance on account of Animas City. But according to the distance schedules and the records, right upon what these gentlemen have shown you, it is apparent that while eighteen miles was cut off in one direction and ten miles was added in the other direction, the aggregate was a saving of eight miles, and the result was to improve the service, because it gave to Animas City by that operation twice a week mail, whereas before it only had a mail once a week. It saved money and gave additional mail facilities. Now, see how these things worked together. My client did not make these orders. They were made by French. But even suppose he did. Suppose French acted under Brady's direction. The record does not show any "Do this.—Brady." But suppose Brady had directed it or does it himself. What is there in it, gentlemen of the jury, from which you can extract anything against the management of this business on the part of my client?

You see it is impossible. They said, "Oh, but this service was not needed; they increased and they expedited on this Ojo Caliente route when it was not needed, and they increased and expedited on this Silverton and Parrott City route when that was not needed;" and they say Brady knew it was not needed. That is what they charge in the indictment. I want to show upon what we acted, and I want you to see whether there is anything in this record to indicate to you that this was not needed. I say that the evidence is overwhelming that it was needed; not merely the evidence that we had when those orders were made increasing and expediting the service, but the evidence that has been brought before you since that time shows that it was needed.

Although it seems to me, gentlemen of the jury, in justice to my client, that I ought to read all of these petitions, yet I am not going to trouble you in that way. I do, however, want to read enough of them to show you the necessity for that service. These routes went into what is known as the San Juan country; there were Silverton and Parrott City, and various other places in that country where these discoveries of precious minerals were made, and the people were going in there in droves. Business men were going there to invest their money in that kind of property, and men were going there with their herds of cattle; and business had become exceedingly lively in that region of country, so much so that the officials of the United States appealed to my client, appealed to the Postmaster-General, appealed to their Senators and Members of Congress and to their Delegates in Congress to aid them in getting needed mail facilities. Now, here is what Mr. Webster says:

SANTA FÉ, N. MEX., April 18, 1879.

Hon. T. J. BRADY,

Second Assistant Postmaster-General, Washington, D. C.:

SIR: I signed a petition to-day asking an increase of service on the mail route from Ojo Caliente, N. Mex., to Parrott City, Colo.

In addition to the reasons given in said petition, I desire to call your attention to the following facts and causes why the service should be increased to daily:

An appropriation has been made of $30,000 for the purpose of building a military post at Pagosa Springs, Colo.—

That is the place where they put a post-office on this route, you remember—

Fort Lewis, and is now even a post of considerable consequence; its importance will be increased in the near future. This post of Fort Lewis is a part of this military district, with headquarters at Santa Fé. At present it takes two weeks, usually three, to communicate and receive answer, when with a daily mail, with speed increased, it should take but four days. The commanding general, Edward Hatch, and chief quartermaster, Major Dana, signed the petition very cheerfully, having been annoyed so long by the vexatious delays of slow mails in important communications.

One result of the establishing of a permanent post at Fort Lewis has been to cause a large increase of population in its vicinity, and the necessity for rapid communication has increased with equal rapidity.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ED. WEBSTER.

There is one specimen. Now look at that. Here is the Government of the United States appropriating $30,000 to establish one military post on the line of this route; here are the headquarters of that military division at Santa Fé; here is the necessity of the Government being able to communicate freely and promptly between this important post and headquarters; and here is an official of the United States appealing to the Post-Office Department to give them reasonable mail facilities, not merely on account of the great interest which the Government has in communicating with its military posts, but because of the additional fact that many people are in there needing and demanding these mail facilities. He was not simply asking, gentlemen, for a daily mail. Oh, these gentlemen come here and say by the hour, "Why, somebody petitioned for daily mail, and he gave them daily mail and then increased the speed." Why, there are cases here where the mail was being carried along at the rate of two miles an hour, and these gentlemen would have you say that if you make it daily, that will do; that if you send out a mail every day and get one back, it does not make any difference whether it takes two weeks or four weeks to get through, not a bit; that it would be cheaper to have it go slow than to have it go through expeditiously; and therefore, because he put it at a reasonably fast time it must be an indication of fraud. But, gentlemen, this United States official who is making this appeal to the department does not say he wants it to go through at a snail's pace he says, "We want a daily mail, and we want it to be put through in order that the Government can communicate with its military post, and in order also that the people may have facilities for transacting their business."

Here is another:

SECRETARY'S OFFICE, TERRITORY OF NEW MEXICO,
Santa Fé, N. Mex., April 15, 1879.

The honorable the POSTMASTER-GENERAL:

SIR: In view of the rapid and increasing settlement of Northwestern New Mexico and Southwestern Colorado, with important mineral and agricultural interests developed and developing, I heartily concur in the efforts being made to establish daily mail service between Ojo Caliente, N. Mex., via Pagosa Springs, to Parrott City, Colo.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

W. G. RITCH.

Then follows a letter from Senator Chaffee, and then follow a large number of petitions. I am not going to take your time to read them, because what I have read is sufficient to indicate what these petitions contain, and they are substantially the same all the way through. There are fifteen of these petitions and letters. On the backs of these petitions as they were filed in the department, you find:

We respectfully recommend the increase of service herein prayed for.

H. M. TELLER.
N. P. HILL.

And the same thing is repeated on these various petitions. As the petitions came to them, they took them to the department and indorsed upon them the fact that this service was needed, and asked that it be granted as prayed for by the petitioners. Several of these are addressed to the Postmaster-General in person. Here is one, at page 1094 :

To the Hon. D. M. KEY,
Postmaster-General :

SIR : We, the undersigned, citizens of El Rito and vicinity, supplied by mail route No. 38145, from Ojo Caliente to Parrott City, Colo., would respectfully represent that the service as now carried, viz, one time a week, is entirely inadequate to our wants in that behalf; that the country through which this route now runs is already thickly settled; besides an increasing immigration is steadily pouring into the country, and that the mail now is nearly always delayed, particularly third-class matter, in consequence of its great bulk and weight.

We would, therefore, very respectfully but most urgently request and petition you to have service on this route increased to at least three trips a week and on a shorter schedule; and we would ever pray.

Respectfully.

That is signed by Jaramillo, a witness whose testimony I may call your attention to in a little while, and some thirty or forty other people. Here is one, at page 1095, from Henry M. Atkinson, surveyor-general of New Mexico:

UNITED STATES SURVEYOR-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Santa Fé, N. Mex., April 14, 1879.

Hon. D. M. KEY,
Postmaster-General :

SIR: The citizens of this Territory and Southwestern Colorado are very anxious for daily service on the route from Ojo Caliente, this Territory, via Pagosa Springs, to Parrott City, Colo.

This route supplies all Northwestern New Mexico and Southwestern Colorado, and the large population now in those sections fully justifies a daily service on that route, and if the same can be ordered by you it will gratify our citizens here, as well as confer a great benefit upon the citizens reached by said route.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

HENRY M. ATKINSON.

I am not going to read any more of these, gentlemen, because it would needlessly consume your time. I have simply selected these for the purpose of indicating to you two things: First, that there was a region of country into which a great many people had gone and which was rapidly settling up. It was a grazing country; it was a mining country; and it was of sufficient importance for these officers of the United States—leaving out of view entirely the citizens—to make these appeals to the department to increase that to a daily service and to put it through on faster time. And it was done.

Now let me go a little further in this case. One of the objections to this is that the schedule that was made was an impossible schedule; that they could not carry the mail upon the schedule time that was fixed. Well, gentlemen, in order to extract anything out of that, if it were true, it would be very important for them, I submit to you, to show that the Second Assistant Postmaster-General knew that it could not be done in that time. How do they seek to prove it? They have not proved it, but how do they seek to prove it? How do they seek to induce you to draw that kind of inference? Why, from the testimony of such men as Anthony Joseph.

Who was Anthony Joseph? He was a man who took a subcontract to carry that mail on that route. He took his subcontract knowing what that schedule time was. Anthony Joseph took his subcontract very low, too low, and he undertook to perform the service with a force of men and horses, the expense of which would come within the prices that he had agreed to carry it for. That is just where the trouble was. Anthony Joseph did not put on men and horses enough. If he had put on what was necessary he would have carried it ; but he did not do so ; and therefore there were fines and deductions assessed against him. That is the way they tried to prove it, and that is the way they have tried to prove these things all the way through this case, gentlemen of the jury. But Anthony Joseph's letters themselves, which were put in evidence by the defendants, show that this service was needed just as it was put on that route. They say that the mails were of a character that required that it should be made daily and that it should go through speedily. The letters may be found at pages 1119, 1120, 1121, 1122, 1123, and 1138.

Here is the letter of January 6, 1879 :

JOHN W. DORSEY,
Washington, D. C. :

DEAR SIR: Your favor of the 22d of last month came to hand this day, and its contents have been duly noted. As regards your request to put stock on route No. 38145, from Ojo Caliente to Parrott City, and carry the United States mail once a week upon the same, commencing January 1, 1879, permit me to inform you that I cannot possibly comply with your request at present, as I have disposed of all my stock and have none on hand. If the service is increased to six times a week on said route I might contract with you to carry it ; but even then could not commence service before the 1st of March next, as it requires time to prepare for a proper service on the said route. I will undertake to carry the United States mail on said route six times a week for the sum of $14,160, and commence the service on the 1st day of March, 1879. If the terms are acceptable to you, please inform me in due time. Awaiting an early reply, I remain, yours, &c.,

ANTHONY JOSEPH.

Next comes his letter of January 15, in which he says :

The distance from Ojo Caliente to Parrott City is two hundred and seventy-six miles, and the mails are large and heavy, so that I have to use two horses, one to pack the mail and the other for the mail rider ; and as soon as the military post at Pagosa Springs is established it will require a buckboard or coach to carry the mails on said route.

I read that, gentlemen of the jury, for the purpose of showing to you the character of this mail. Now, General Brady did not have that. I do not want you to understand that I am saying that he acted upon that letter, because he did not have it before him. But that is a private letter that Mr. Joseph wrote to Mr. John W. Dorsey. I read it for the purpose of showing that although these gentlemen brought Mr. Joseph here to try to show that there was something wrong about this route, yet, on his cross-examination, we were able to produce to him his own letters showing that the mails were large and heavy. In other words, we want to sustain our theory of this case, and do sustain it by their own witnesses, and by the letters that Joseph wrote showing that this was a large and heavy mail. It was an important mail route, and when Secretary Teller, then a Senator, and Senator Hill and these other gentlemen said to the Department, "It is an important mail route here are large and heavy mails going over this route, and these people are entitled to have these mails go through," it was not mere idle talk, but it was a truthful representation of the actual condition of affairs down there. And you will remember, gentlemen, I read to you the other day what his honor said on a former occasion, that even if you should say that these contractors induced these petitions—which they did not do in this case—yet they were fair petitions and they were true petitions, and they fairly and truthfully represented the condition of things. And now, because by client, as Second Assistant Postmaster-General, charged, as they say in this indictment, with the duty of looking after this mail service, curtailed where he could curtail, saved where he could save, and gave the people the mails they needed, you are to extract from that an indication that when he did it he was engaged in a conspiracy against this Government.

There is one other matter that I must mention in that connection. You have heard a great deal about Chama. They say to you, "Why, he made an order increasing the service over this entire route, whereas the party only carried the mail from Chama through, and there is a bold promontory sticking out into this ocean of fraud." Is there any truth in that, gentlemen of the jury? I want to show you just how these gentlemen are distorting the facts of this case. Now, what is the fact about that? General Brady telegraphed—to whom? To any of these conspirators? To anybody having any relations to this case? No, gentlemen. Mr. Sanderson had become the subcontractor on that route, I believe, for full pay. Mr. Sanderson is not in this indictment. Mr. Sanderson figures in a couple of these routes that I will call your attention to in a moment. But he was performing the service on this Ojo Caliente route. Mr. Joseph and Mr. Jaramillo threw it down and left it on the hands of this contractor to get along with as best he could. He found that he had made a subcontract that did not pay him, and no matter what the consequences were to the contractor, though it might cause that contractor to be declared a failing contractor, Mr. Jaramillo threw it down, and the contractor had to pick it up and go on with it, or be declared a failing contractor. And then Mr. Joseph comes in, and from whom does he get his subcontract? From my client? No. From Miner? No. Vaile? No. Dorsey? No. Any of these defendants? No. But he gets it from Sanderson.

Mr. KER. Joseph.

Mr. WILSON. Jaramillo, I am talking about.

Mr. KER. No; that will not do; neither one. Mr. Joseph was the first contractor, and he said he lost all he had, and had to give it up, and Mr. Dorsey subsequently paid him something. Then Jaramillo came in and took the contract, and Jaramillo paid $500 to be released. Then came Sanderson with his subcontract, first for $8,000, and then for $18,000—not for full pay.

Mr. WILSON. Well, I do not care whether it was full pay or not.

Mr. KER. I do; I want it stated straight.

Mr. WILSON. You have got it stated straight now, and I accept your statement of it as being straight. Jaramillo gave $500, was it, to be released from the contract?

Mr. KER. Yes.

Mr. WILSON. Jaramillo, living right there, knowing the schedule time, knowing the roads, knowing the mountains, the mountain passes, and streams, made a subcontract with the contractor to carry that mail. Well, he made it too low.

Gentlemen, I am not going to deny that those contractors were making the best trades with the subcontractors that they could, and if you think that I am here claiming that they possessed attributes different from ordinary business men you are very much mistaken, for I make no such claim. They were engaged, as I said to you, in a legitimate business, and they made subcontracts on the very best terms that they could, and they made them with a view to profits on them, as they had a right to do. Now, Mr. Jaramillo, with all these things staring him right in the face, took a subcontract out of which he could not make any money, and they say he paid Dorsey $500 to get rid of his subcontract. And yet, because he did that, Brady is in a conspiracy; and because he did that, Dorsey is in a conspiracy. Here is what Mr. Jaramillo says, at page 1176:

Q. You are not able to state to the jury whether or not the proofs with reference to this matter were ever sent to the department until after your release was filed?—

A. I am not sure.

Q. You are not able to state about that?—A. No.

Q. Do you know Mr. Sanderson?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Who is he and what is he?—A. He is J. L. Sanderson & Co.

Q. What is his business?—A. Well, I have contracted with Mr. Sanderson to carry the mail.

Q. Who carried the mail after you threw it down?—A. I carried it for Mr. Sanderson.

This man threw down the mail. Then, when Sanderson became subcontractor, he made a new contract to carry it again.

Now, gentlemen, Brady telegraphed to Sanderson, at page 4346:

To J. L. SANDERSON,

936 Chouteau avenue, Saint Louis, Missouri:

You are hereby authorized to begin daily service from Chama to the nearest point on the Ojo Caliente route, 25 miles, and increase service to daily on Ojo Caliente route from the junction made to Animas City, from the 15th instant.

THOMAS J. BRADY,

Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

He was to carry from Chama to this point on the Ojo Caliente route, and then he was to increase the service from that point on to Animas City, and carry it daily. This was the telegraphic order pursuant to which Sanderson went on to perform the service. They say now that when the formal order was made, it was an order over the whole route, and thereby not these other defendants, but Sanderson was getting pay for a daily mail over a part of the route where he did not carry a daily mail, and that it was antedated. That is their point. It went back, you recollect, to the telegraphic order. He ordered him by telegraph to perform this service, and he did so. But when they came, gentlemen of the jury, to put the formal, regular order upon the record, then it was extended over too much of the line.

Now, what happened? At page 3056, gentlemen, are the deductions for that quarter. There you find that $3,422.19 was deducted on account of that very thing, correcting the mistake about which these gentlemen have been making so much noise in this case.

Now, I pass on, gentlemen, to this Silverton and Parrott City route. They say the service was not needed there. I have shown you the circumstances of taking Animas City off of one and putting it on the other. They say that the service on the Parrott City route was not needed; that that was a fraud; and they say that Brady knew it was not needed. To show that the increase and expedition were justifiable under the facts in this case, on page 1856, I find this:

APRIL 24, 1879.

This is dated from the office of the Leadville Mining Company, 57 Broadway, New York. I guess most of you, gentlemen, know that there are a great many men in New York who are very much interested in mining property in Colorado and New Mexico. These people in New York are quite as much interested to get their letters to where their property is located and where their money is invested, as the people down there are in having their mails go from that point to New York or wherever their correspondents may be.

Hon. T. J. BRADY,

Second Assistant Postmaster-General:

DEAR SIR: Being one who with his friends have largely interested themselves in the mining interests of Colorado, I most respectfully urge upon you the importance of increased mail facilities from Silverton to Parrott City, and that the same be increased by making a daily and fast line between these two points. The population around and between these two points is rapidly increasing, and will continue to do so for the coming year.

By increasing the mail service as suggested you will confer a great favor on the people now there, as it will upon the many thousands yet to be there the present season.

Very respectfully, yours,

A. McDONALD.

That is addressed to General Brady. Here is a letter to Judge Key:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., May 5, 1879.

Hon. D. M. KEY,
Postmaster-General:

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith letter from the State officers of Colorado, asking that the service on mail route from Silverton to Parrott City be increased to a daily, and on faster time.

This request is reasonable, and the order should be at once made to that effect, and I hope you will grant the request.

Very respectfully,

JAMES B. BELFORD.

The letter which is referred to, from the State officers, is as follows:

DENVER, COLO., April 28, 1879.

Hon. D. M. KEY:
Postmaster-General:

SIR: The undersigned, the State officers of Colorado, respectfully represent that the mining and agricultural interests of Southwestern Colorado are developing with extraordinary rapidity, and with this increasing immigration the necessity for better mail facilities is seriously felt.

We therefore have the honor to ask that the mail service from Silverton to Parrott City be increased to a daily line, and the route from Parrott City to Ojo Caliente, via Pagosa Springs, be increased to three trips a week, and we also ask that the time be made faster than it now is.

Hoping this will receive your early consideration, we have the honor to be,

FREDERICK W. PITKIN,
Governor of Colorado.

M. H. MELDRUM,
Secretary of State.

JOSEPH C. SHATTUCK,
Superintendent Public Instruction.

ROBERT G. HOWELL,
Secretary State Board of Land Commissioners.

HENRY C. THATCHER,
Chief Justice of Colorado.

WILLIAM F. STONE,
Associate Justice Supreme Court.

I am not going to take up your time, gentlemen, in reading more of these than simply enough to indicate, as I said a while ago, the character of the applications that were being made. You heard Senator Teller's testimony in regard to that, and Mr. Belford's also. Senator Teller told you how persistently he appealed to General Brady to do these things. So that you have here petitions upon petitions—many that I have not read—urging upon the department the placing upon this route the character of service that was placed upon it. Here were these large mails going in there; here were those vast business interests concentrated at those points, and I want to know if you are willing to say that in the light of these facts the action of General Brady is only consistent with guilt? Will you not, on the contrary of that, say that his action is entirely consistent with absolute innocence of the charge that they have made against him?

Now, coming back for a moment to the Ojo Caliente route, and this matter of what they call overpayment, the antedating of an order from Chama, &c., to which I alluded a moment ago, you see, gentlemen of the jury, that no one of these defendants was interested in that. It went to this man Sanderson, and he was the man that the department was dealing with in respect to that matter.

Before I pass from this case I want to call your attention to another point that has been made here—and a great deal has been said about it—based upon the letter of the postmasters asking for increase of time, and that will be found at page 1858. That letter, gentlemen, I have no doubt—and I think the evidence warrants me in saying so—was written in the interest of Mr. Fred. Steineger, who was the subcontractor. But whether it was or not is not very material upon the point to which I wish to attract your attention. I will read that letter so that there may be no suspicion that I may be trying to avoid any point that is made by the prosecution in this case:

SILVERTON, COLO., September 24, 1880.

To the Hon. HORACE MAYNARD,
Postmaster-General United States:

The undersigned, Fred. Steineger, mail contractor from Silverton to Parrott City, in the State of Colorado, being mail route No. 38156, and citizens residing upon said mail route, respectfully request—

Notice the phraseology of this, will you—and citizens residing upon said mail route, respectfully request you to issue an order changing the schedule time from Silverton to Parrott City from fifteen to twenty-four hours, from the 15th day of November until the 15th day of April of each year, until further orders, and that you fix the time of departure of the mail from Silverton at the hour of 10 a. m., and from Parrott City at the hour of 1 p. m.

Now, observe, and I think this bears out what I said a moment ago, that this was all done in the interest of Steineger. “And citizens residing upon said mail route,” &c.:

In support of this petition we have the honor to respectfully represent that during the period above stated, owing to the rigor of our winters here, heavy snow storms, snow slides, snow drifts, and the mountainous character of the country, all experience shows that it is physically impossible for any contractor to carry the mails over said route on the present schedule time, or in less time than twenty-four hours. Much of the time carriers on the route can proceed only upon snow-shoes. Hoping you will see the importance of these suggestions, we most earnestly and respectfully submit them to your consideration.

That is signed by the assistant postmaster at Parrott City, the postmaster at Animas City, and the assistant postmaster; also by the postmaster and assistant postmaster at Hermosa, and by the postmaster at Silverton, and by the late postmaster and county clerk at Silverton, and also by a large number of people. It is not very probable, gentlemen, that those people specially interested themselves to have the time of carrying this mail lengthened. It was of no importance to them. On the contrary, the quicker they could get their mail the better. But obviously Steineger got this up and sent it to the department for the purpose of having that time increased so as to lessen his expense and help him out of a bad promise that he had made to the contractor. That is evidently the fact. But will you bear in mind, gentlemen of the jury, when it was that the order was made increasing and expediting this service? That was made on the 12th of June, 1879, and it was made upon representations that I have already called your attention to. Now, when did these postmasters send in this letter that I have just read? Did General Brady have any such information as that before him when he made that order? No, gentlemen; that came in on the 24th of September, 1880. There was the interval from June, 1879, to September, 1880, that Mr. Steineger and these postmasters were allowing this order to go forward and be executed without one word. But after the experience of these many months, Mr. Steineger, finding that he had a losing contract, sends in that document to the department. But no such information to the department is to be found in this record until many, many, many months after this order had been made pursuant to the recommendation of such men as Senators Hill and Teller and Mr. Belford, all these other parties whom I have named.

But they say that subsequently Senator Hill wrote a letter supporting Steineger's application. These gentlemen were very particular to bring all these things to your attention and put them in such a way as that you would be led to believe that Brady had these things at the time he made these orders. There is not a word of truth in it. But they say that Senator Hill wrote him a letter asking to extend this time to twenty-four hours. When did Senator Hill write that letter? Why, he wrote it on the 8th of November, 1880, whereas this order had been made in June, 1879, more than a year before. And what did Senator Hill want him to do? If he had done, gentlemen, what Senator Hill wanted him to do, these gentlemen would be here singing a different song. They would have said to you, "Here is evidence of fraud." What did Hill want him to do? He wanted him to increase that time to twenty-four hours without change of pay. If he had increased it to twenty-four hours without change of pay, then these gentlemen would have come here and said that the speed has something to do with the compensation. The speed has a great deal to do with that, and if they could have come in here and pointed out a case where he had enlarged the time, as Senator Hill wanted him to do, and made no change in the pay, these gentlemen would have held that up before you as a glaring, open, bold, palpable evidence of fraud.

Gentlemen, here as well as anywhere else in this case, I want to call your attention to another thing that I think must have attracted your notice during the progress of this argument and presentation of this case on the part of the Government. These gentlemen have stood here and said to you I do not know how many times, "Just look at the original contract price of this service and see what they have run it up to." That is their argument and that is their pet phrase. "See how they have run it up." They have figured to you the original contract price and the amount which was paid after increase and expedition and they have called the latter amount a plain steal at least fifty times during the progress of the fourteen days of argument in the opening of this case. In other words, gentlemen, they utterly ignore the fact that the mails were carried faster and that they were carried more frequently. Take the very Silverton and Parrott City route which we have been considering. If you remember, Joseph said, "You could not carry that mail once a week. The bulk of the mail was so great you could not get through with it once a week. You must make it a daily mail to get that mail through." They say that everything between the original contract price when it was a weekly mail and when it was six times a week is a clean steal and all the additional service that was rendered by these contractors and subcontractors goes for absolutely nothing in the minds of these learned gentlemen. Take any one of these routes where the trips were multiplied and the speed increased and they say that everything between the one point and the other is nothing but a clean steal. Gentlemen, you have got to draw this line somewhere. The Second Assistant had to decide whether he was going to have more trips or not. If he did order more trips and they were performed, that was not a steal, because the people got more mail. If the mail went through on faster time, it was not a steal, because the people got their mail quicker.

I am going to go through these routes as rapidly as I can, and now come to—

ROUTE 41119, FROM TOQUERVILLE TO ADAIRVILLE.

This is a route one hundred and thirty-two miles in length. On the 8th of July, 1879, there was increase and expedition on that route. What justification was there for the Second Assistant Postmaster-General to make that increase and expedition? I will give you a specimen of it:

Hon. D. M. KEY,

Postmaster-General, U. S. A., Washington, D. C.:

DEAR SIR: We, your petitioners, citizens of Kane County, Utah, would most respectfully represent that while neighboring counties are enjoying the benefits of a daily mail, the majority of the citizens of aforesaid county receiving their mail on route 41119 have only tri-weekly service, which is entirely insufficient to meet the wants of the people. This is also the main thoroughfare through Southern Utah, via Lee's Ferry, to Sunset, Ariz. Many rich mines are being found and developed, and the country is fast filling up and demands more mail facilities and a change of schedule from tri-weekly to daily service, seven times a week, and a running time of forty-eight hours. Your prompt and favorable consideration on this matter will greatly promote the growth and prosperity of this part of the country, and we, your petitioners, will ever pray.

That was signed by the chief clerk of the legislative assembly, by the county surveyor, and by a great many citizens. It was indorsed:

The increase asked for in this petition is greatly needed. The country between the points mentioned is rapidly filling up, and I understand valuable mines are being developed. I therefore heartily indorse the petition.

GEORGE Q. CANNON.

Here is another one:

SIR: We have the honor to submit for your favorable consideration the fact that the mail service on route 41119, from Toquerville to Adairville, Utah, is entirely insufficient for the wants of those now receiving their mail by this route, and to earnestly request that the service be increased to daily, seven times a week, and on a less schedule than now carried, that is to say, in about forty-eight hours.

You will see a point they make in a moment, gentlemen. The first petition asked for a running time of forty-eight hours, and this petition says in about forty-eight hours:

This service is absolutely necessary to accommodate the great number of persons supplied, and to dispose of the large amount of mail matter now carried over this route. The country is already thickly settled along this route, besides a large and intelligent immigration constantly pouring into this country.

JOHNSON, KANE COUNTY, UTAH, May 24, 1879.

That is signed by a great many people, and indorsed:

The indorsement which I have made on the accompanying petition I make on this and hope it will be in the power of the department to grant the request.

GEORGE Q. CANNON.

Who was the Delegate, as you know, from Utah.

Mr. Nephi Johnson, you will recollect, was the subcontractor who figured on this route. He, like Steineger, subsequently tried to get this time increased. He had made a bad contract. The point I am at is whether or not this service was needed, or whether Brady had a right to believe it was needed at the time he made this order. When

Mr. Nephi Johnson was on the stand these letters came out which he had addressed to Miner, Peck & Co.:

Since I sent you my bid, on the 19th, I have concluded that I will carry the mail, as per advertisement of the Postmaster-General of November 1, 1877, on route 41119, from Toquerville to Adairville, Utah, for the sum of ($1,600) sixteen hundred dollars per annum.

I think that an increase of service could be got. For the last six quarters I have collected considerable more on the route than the present service costs, and the people are anxious for more service, and would willingly sign a petition for that purpose. Please to let me hear from you whether you award me the contract or not.

That is what Mr- Nephi Johnson was saying with reference to the needs of the people at that time. Here is another:

Your letter of May 6 is at hand, and in reply I will say that I will carry the mail on route No. 41119 for the sum of $1,125 per annum, and route No. 41120 for the sum of $140 per annum, which is my lowest terms. I have plenty of stock, and have a ranch near the center of route No. 41119, and can carry the mail for less than any other man in the country. The offer I make is $400 less than what I had ought to carry it for and do myself justice.

Now, if you don't like my offer say so at once and it is all right.

He had made his bid too low. These contractors were seeking subcontractors, and they had come into correspondence with Mr. Nephi Johnson, and he made an offer which turned out to be too low. Here is another on the 6th of June:

Inclosed find contracts duly executed.

He had come to terms with them.

I shall send you a petition soon asking for some changes on the route, which I hope you will present to the Post-Office Department. The people have petitioned once for semi-weekly service on this route, but failed to get it. If you will present a petition for that purpose I will take the trouble to go over the route and get the signatures. The people should have more service, for the route has long paid for the present service.

Please send me order on the postmaster at Toquerville for the delivery of the mail. I think I should prefer to have my pay direct from the Post-Office Department, as it probably would save trouble and delay.

Yours, very truly,

NEPHI JOHNSON.

Gentlemen, I have read you those letters of Nephi Johnson, not because I am claiming that they were before General Brady at the time he made the order. I do not claim that. They were not before him. He knew nothing of them. But they confirm what had been represented to him by Mr. Cannon, the Delegate in Congress, and by these numerous citizens that were living along this Toquerville and Adairville route. They confirm the fact that that was an important mail route; that that country was settling up with people; that miners and graziers were going in there to ply their occupations, and needed and demanded their mails. That is the reason I present you these letters. That was the condition of things, that was the state of affairs, and that was the cause of the action of my client. It was an important route between Southern Utah and Sunset, Arizona. Anybody can see by taking the map that it was an important route. Here were daily mails connecting it with the daily mail running down to one end of it, and daily mails connecting with it here [indicating on map]. Anybody by taking the map can see that it was an important route. Having these post-office maps hanging right before his eyes, and then being appealed to by these petitions, is anybody going to say that it was not a proper thing and a thing he ought not to do? But they say these people only asked for forty-eight hours and he put that mail through in thirty-three hours, as I said a day or two ago. (I guess it was only a day or two ago, as I have not been running quite a week.) Gentlemen, you see how utterly impossible it would be for the Post-Office Department to regulate the time according to the hours that might happen to be stated in a petition. One of these petitions says forty-eight hours, and the other says about forty-eight hours. But no matter if every petition had asked for forty-eight hours. The Post-Office Department has got to adjust the time, as I said, according to its system, and if they are going to expedite—just as in the Rawlins and White river route, to which I shall have occasion to refer after a while—if they are going to increase the speed on a route, should they increase it from two miles an hour to two miles and a quarter an hour? That would be ridiculous. It should be made three, or, as General Brady has said to you, a reasonably fast service is about four miles an hour. In all these cases he tried to get it to about four miles an hour. And yet, because he made it thirty-three instead of forty-eight hours, as named in the petition, they say that that is a badge of fraud. Mr. Nephi Johnson being on the stand was asked to explain the situation there. A portion of the petition was read to him, and then this question was asked:

This is a petition you addressed to the Postmaster-General, I believe?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What were these adjoining counties that were enjoying the benefits of a daily mail that you referred to in this petition?—A. Iron County and Washington County.

Q. Will you take this diagram that you were shown yesterday, and tell the jury where, with reference to Toquerville and Adairville, Washington and Iron Counties are situated?—A. Washington County is west of Toquerville. Iron County lies north of Kane County. Iron and Garfield Counties join onto Kane. Kane County runs from Toquerville across to the Territorial line, and Washington County is west of Kane and Iron and Garfield Counties.

Mr. WILSON. Please step over and explain to the foreman of the jury, so that all the jurors can see.

The COURT. The jurors have maps and can understand from them.

Q. Washington County lies west of Toquerville?—A. Yes, sir. The county line is near by. Iron County lies north of Kane County, and north of the settlements represented on this map. Iron and Garfield Counties lie north, right adjoining.

Q. Those counties were getting daily mail while yours was only getting the limited service?—A. Washington and Iron Counties had daily mail.

Q. Where did those daily mails come from?—A. They came down from Salt Lake from the north.

Q. To where?—A. To Silver Reef, six miles from Toquerville.

Q. Six miles west of Toquerville?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. There was a daily mail coming down there?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Where did the counties on the north get their daily mail from?—A. This same line that came down to Silver Reef came down through Iron County, and into Washington County coming from Salt Lake.

Q. Did it come into Toquerville, too?—A. Not at that time. It came to Silver Reef at that time.

Q. That was only six miles off from Toquerville?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was there any other daily mail farther to the east of any of these counties north of Kane?—A. No, sir.

Q. There were these two daily mails coming in and supplying these counties?

Mr. BLISS. Only one.

A. One general line of daily mail running through Iron County down into Washington County.

Q. It was one line that supplied two counties?—A. Yes, sir; at that time.

Q. This paragraph, that I have read from this petition which you say you circulated, you regarded as true when you circulated it and had it signed, did you?—A. Yes, sir.

That is one that was read a while ago.

Q. And it was sent on here in good faith for the purpose of securing this additional service?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. I find this paragraph also succeeding:

"This is also the main thoroughfare through Southern Utah via Lee's Ferry to Sunset, Ariz."

Will you explain on this map where Sunset, Ariz., is?—A. It is away to the southeast. I don't know. I never have been there, but the travel from Utah, going into Arizona, goes down by Johnson and across at Lee's Ferry, eighty-five miles from Johnson.

Q. Describe on the map—and so forth. Then he describes it:

Q. So that this route was over this main thoroughfare, running through the southern part of the Territory of Utah from Toquerville towards the east as far as Kanab?—

A. Yes, sir.

Q. So that the statement of this petition is an accurate statement?—A. Yes, sir; that is the way I understand it.

Q. The petition then proceeds:

"This is also the main thoroughfare through Southern Utah to Sunset, Ariz. Many rich mines are being found and developed, and the country is fast filling up and demands more mail facilities and a change of schedule from tri-weekly to daily service seven times a week, and a running time of forty-eight hours."

Is it true that rich mines were being found there?—A. When that petition was sent in it was in the height of a mining excitement. We had more than a thousand miners in the country then. They came in in April. They had discovered some mines near there and supposed they were good.

By the COURT:

Q. Near where?—A. Near Pahreah and some near Kanab.

By Mr. WILSON:

Q. Over towards the east end of this route?—A. Over towards the east end of this route. They came until April and staid until some time in June or the 1st of July, and gradually went away. Some were in there about three months.

Q. Are there any stock ranches through there?—A. Yes, sir; there are some stock ranches.

Q. How extensive are they?—A. There are two stock ranches between Rockville and Kanab, where they keep a great deal of stock.

Q. Cattle ranches?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. About how many did they keep on those ranches, so far as you know?—A. Well, there was three or four thousand head of stock in there.

Then, further along:

That is a stock-growing country in there. It is not a country that can be used much for farming. It is a stock-grazing country, and there are a good many ranches through it in different places.

Q. Along in the vicinity of this route?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Were there a good many cattle kept in these other ranches that you have not thus far specifically spoken of?—A. Yes, sir; there was considerable many stock through the country.

Q. State whether the number runs up into hundreds or thousands of head of stock kept there?—A. It runs into thousands, or did at that time. There has been a great deal of stock taken out since then.

Now, gentlemen, that is the condition of that route, and those were the circumstances under which these orders were made. It was a route running over a great thoroughfare between Southern Utah and Arizona. It had these stock ranches upon it. It had all these interests to supply. These people sent in their petitions in the manner that I have indicated and asking what I have read, and their request was granted. I want to know if you are willing to say that the order in this case was made pursuant to a conspiracy or is evidence of conspiracy, or whether you will not on the other hand take that other idea which I say is overwhelmingly preponderant in this case, that it was done in the real interests of the people, not merely of that section of the country, but of all other sections of the country that might desire to communicate with that particular section. I am at the end of a route, your honor, and it is 1 o'clock.

The COURT. We will take our recess now.

At this point (1 o'clock p. m.) the court took its usual recess.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. GREENE. (a juror). If it is agreeable to the court I would be glad if we could meet for two or three days during the time of the meeting of the Grand Army of the Republic at 10 o'clock in the morning and sit until 2 and then have an opportunity to be moving about. I believe it is agreeable to most of the jurors. I have spoken to them. There are two matters going on and I hold a very humble position on a committee of each one.

The COURT. The proposition is to meet at 10 o'clock and have no recess and adjourn at 2.

Mr. GREENE. That is it. Or as near to 2 as possible, if that would be agreeable to the counsel.

Mr. HORRIGAN (a juror.) I should like to know for how many days that will continue.

Mr. GREENE. For the next four days.

Mr. HORRIGAN. I consent to four days, but otherwise I will not consent to it. I would not like to make any objection to it, and I seem to be the only one in opposition to it. That is before banking hours and after banking hours. My busiest hours are in the morning and it is a matter of three or four or five dollars every morning to me. But I will consent to lose those three or four or five dollars to accommodate my friend Mr. Greene.

Mr. GREENE. I am very glad to know my fellow-juror's time is so valuable, and I am very much obliged to him for granting it. The racing meeting and the Army of the Potomac——

The COURT. [Interposing.] Put it on the ground of the Army of the Potomac.

Mr. HORRIGAN. That is a national holiday. We are going to have that anyway, according to Congress.

The COURT. If you were a lawyer I would ask you for the statute. How will it operate with counsel?

Mr. WILSON. I am perfectly willing to come at any hour and go at any hour so far as I am concerned, because I am pretty nearly through.

The COURT. I should like to know whether there is an able-bodied man to succeed you?

Mr. WILSON. I will say to your honor, that if it would be any accommodation to the jury I will make that arrangement for one day. I would just as soon come here at 10 in the morning and sit right on until night.

The COURT. When does the Army of the Potomac meet?

Mr. GREENE. Wednesday.

The COURT. When is the other occasion?

Mr. GREENE. To-morrow morning.

Mr. WILSON. Let me commence to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock, and speak until 2, if I do not conclude, although I think I shall finish before then.

The COURT. We will meet to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock.

Mr. WILSON. [Resuming.] Gentlemen, there are two routes that have been mentioned in this, route No. 38150, from Saguache to Lake City, and 38152, from Ouray to Los Pinos, as to which I am not going to occupy your time at all. The reason I will not occupy your time in regard to them is that this record shows that these parties had nothing to do with these routes so far as the practical working in respect of carrying the mails upon them is concerned, or with the increase or expedition. That was a matter that Mr. Sanderson was concerned in, and although of course my client made whatever orders were made upon those routes, it must be apparent to you, gentlemen of the jury, that there was no such concert in respect of them as is charged in this indictment. Sanderson carried the mail, Sanderson furnished the affidavits, Sanderson got the money that arose from the carrying of the mail on these routes, and I cannot see how it can possibly be of any profit to you or to this case for me to occupy your attention in respect of these two routes. I shall, therefore, pass them over without comment.

Now, we come to a series of routes up in Oregon, to which I desire to call your attention. What I was saying this morning with reference to the Silverton and Parrott City and Ojo Caliente routes as being parts of a system and necessary to be considered in connection with each other, is quite as applicable to this portion of territory into which we are about to enter. I come especially, however, to ROUTE No. 44155, FROM THE DALLES TO BAKER CITY.

I want you to look upon this map, which is the same one that we had when we were taking the testimony. Here you find The Dalles up on the Columbia River [indicating], and down here [indicating] is Portland. This river is frozen up five or six weeks in the year. The route ran around by way of Canyon City and out to Baker City. It connected with the system of mail service running on the Columbia River. When it got to Baker City it connected with the routes running up to Walla Walla and all those other points which have been so often mentioned in this testimony that it is unnecessary I should repeat them. When you get down to Canyon City you strike another route, which goes to Camp Harney, which you recollect is a military post, and then on down to Camp McDermitt, another military post. You will remember that just in this region of country is where a series of Indian difficulties occurred. One witness described how those Indians traveled. They started in here [indicating] and came around in here [indicating] and got into this country [indicating], and the troops pursued them. Here is Camp McDermitt [indicating] and away down below—I have no map to show it to you exactly, but I know you remember it—is Winnemucca. Winnemucca is a station on the Central Pacific Railroad. Mail originating anywhere in this section of country would either go around by way of San Francisco and then out over the Central Pacific Railroad and back up into this country, or it would go down in here [indicating] and down through this way. Going one way, as you will see, is a comparatively short route, while in the other direction it is a long distance. The mail from Camp Harney or from Camp McDermitt either had to come out this way [indicating] to the Central Pacific Railroad and then have speedy communication with all the outside world, or else it had to travel around to San Francisco, reaching, the Central Pacific, and come out. As to the mail at Camp McDermitt, you will recollect how one of the witnesses testified they sent it. I am simply giving you this little narrative because I do not want to take your time in going into detail, but when I mention it I am sure you will remember it. The postmaster said they had to send the mail from Camp McDermitt, away out here [indicating] and then it came down to the Pacific Railroad, and went over to San Francisco or went east, as the case might be. You recollect there was a good deal said in the testimony in respect of the mail still going in these indirect ways after that route had been established. It is one of the complaints in this case that there was not mail enough upon that route. The difficulty was that the postmasters or the superintendent out there, who had charge of directing the course of the mail, did not properly attend to their business. There was no fault in establishing the route. I will come to that again. The difficulty was that the postmasters continued to follow in the beaten paths which they had been following. Here [indicating] is the route from Eugene City to Bridge Creek. Here is The Dalles and Baker City route, one in controversy, and here is the Canyon City and Camp McDermitt route, which is another that is under investigation. The Eugene City and Bridge Creek route runs from Eugene City out there [indicating] connecting with The Dalles and Baker City route. You see you have those three routes intimately connected with each other, so that the mail starting from here [indicating] would go directly over on to this route [indicating] and into this country [indicating]. If it originated here [indicating] it would go directly down into this country [indicating], or if it originated here [indicating] it would go away over into this country [indicating]. You see what a system this is and how important to have these various routes running in harmony with each other. You will see how important it was in another respect. Here is a rich region of country lying out here [indicating] and the mail came down here every day. Unless you had a daily mail running out here [indicating] that mail must lie for a week before it could go forward. Now one of the ways, as I have been trying to show you, to make this system harmonious and to give people their mail, instead of running a mail down to a particular point and then stopping it for a week, is to let it go forward. I think I have shown you the character of the country and the situation of these routes in respect of the country. This is a route which illustrates another thing: Here was a failure to put on service arising out of the relation between contractor and subcontractor. On this Dalles and Baker City route the contractor went on promptly and made his subcontract to put the service on that route on the 1st of July, 1878, as the contract called for. There is nothing improper in that. That was a thing that he had a perfect right to do, and he availed himself of that right to sublet the route and make his subcontract. He expected, as a matter of course, and as the evidence shows you, that the subcontractor would put the service on. He had made subcontracts with this same man as to several other routes, and expected the service to be put on, but the subcontractor failed, and when the 1st of July came, and he should have put the service on, he was not there to put it on. The consequence was that the contractor, as a matter of course, was taken by surprise, and his arrangements were all knocked awry by that operation, and he had therefore to commence anew to get that service on. He either had to go and stock it himself or had to get some other subcontractor to take that subcontract. That is one of the routes which was the occasion of Mr. Vaile's ultimately coming into this case, as you will remember. Here was the contractor who had done just what any business man would have done. He had made his contract with a man that was supposed to be perfectly responsible and reliable, and here he found himself confronted with the prospect of being declared a failing contractor just because of a failure of that subcontractor to comply with his subcontract. But I probably have said enough on this subject heretofore, and therefore I will not take up your time in regard to it. Now what does the indictment charge with reference to this route, gentlemen. It says, first, that he increased the service to four trips from the 14th of July, 1879, and then it says, secondly, that he fraudulently reduced it one trip, and gave a month's extra pay, that he fraudulently reduced it one trip. In the first place they say that he put on four trips when they were not needed, and then they turn around in the next breath and say he took off a trip fraudulently. That is a queer state of affairs. If they were not needed he ought to have taken them off. They say he fraudulently took off a trip and thereby reduced the expense. Oh, but he gave a month's extra pay when he took off the trip. Gentlemen, the contract calls for it. I do not see how these gentlemen can urge upon you that it was a fraud to take off a trip when it was a fraud to put it on. It seems to me that I need not discuss that. Now as to giving a month's extra pay when the trip was dispensed with there is no escape from that, because, as I have shown you heretofore, the contract stipulates for that state of affairs exactly. But I will show you in a moment, I think, that there was no fraud in putting it on, and that he was justified in putting on these trips. On the 1st of August, 1880, it was increased to seven trips a week. A singular fact in connection with this indictment is that as to this particular route they have not complained of the expedition. It is the trips they complain about. The part of the indictment from which I read is found on page 1663 :

And afterwards, to wit, on the said twenty-seventh day of June, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine, at the county and District aforesaid, and within the jurisdiction of the said court, the said Thomas J. Brady did fraudulently make, sign, and file in the said office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General a certain order in writing for increased and additional service in carrying the said mails, * * * the said increased service then and there not being lawfully needed and required, as he, the said Thomas J. Brady, then and there well knew, as aforesaid, and with intent thereby to defraud the said United States of America, which said fraudulent order in writing is as follows, to wit:

"Increase service four (4) trips per week, from July 14, 1879, and allow contractor $41,440 per annum additional pay, being pro rata.

"BRADY."

Now you see there they say that he increased the service four trips. This was not for expedition, but simply multiplication of trips.

And afterwards, to wit, on the seventeenth day of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighty, at the county and District aforesaid, and within the jurisdiction of the said court, the said Thomas J. Brady did fraudulently make and file, and cause to be made and filed in the said office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, a certain order in writing for the reduction of the service of carrying the said mails on and over the said post route numbered 44155, and for the allowance of one month's extra pay, * * * the said reduction of service and allowance of extra pay not being for the benefit and advantage of the said United States of America, as he, the said Thomas J. Brady, then and there well knew as aforesaid, which said fraudulent order in writing is as follows, to wit:

"From May 1, 1880, reduce service one trip per week, decreasing contractor's and subcontractor's pay $10,360 per annum, being pro rata, and allow contractor and subcontractor one month's extra pay on service dispensed with."

There they say he fraudulently reduced the service. First he fraudulently put it up and then he fraudulently reduced it, cutting down the cost over $10,000, and that is complained of.

And afterwards, to wit, on the sixteenth day of July, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighty, at the county and District aforesaid, and within the jurisdiction of the said court, the said Thomas J. Brady did fraudulently make, sign, and file in the said office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General a certain order in writing for increased and additional service in carrying the said mails on and over the said post route numbered 44155, and for the allowance of additional pay and compensation, * * * the said increase of service then and there not being lawfully needed and required, as he, the said Thomas J. Brady, then and there well knew, as aforesaid, and with intent thereby to defraud the said United States of America, which said fraudulent order in writing is as follows, to wit:

"From August 1, 1880, increase service to seven (7) trips per week, and allow contractor and subcontractor $10,360 per annum additional pay, being pro rata."

That is what they complain of, gentlemen. That is what they complain of in this indictment. First they say that the increase of trips was fraudulent, and then they say that the reduction of trips was fraudulent, and then that the increase of trips again was fraudulent. Those gentlemen have not a word in this indictment so far as the allegation of any overt act is concerned as to the expedition; not a word that there was anything wrong with the expedition.

The FOREMAN (Mr. Crane). Is it claimed that there was fraud in reducing the number of trips?

Mr. WILSON. That is what they say.

Mr. KER. The expedition was made more than three years before the finding of the bill, and consequently cannot be alleged as an overt act, although it is part of the proof offered here.

Mr. WILSON. Certainly I have not misstated it at all. [To the foreman.] What was the question you asked me? I beg your pardon for not answering it.

The FOREMAN. I understood you to say that they claimed that reducing the number of trips was a fraud.

Mr. WILSON. They aver it expressly.

The FOREMAN. Reducing the expenditure some $10,000.

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir. When he reduced it $10,000 they argue that it was a fraud, and when he put it up again, that was fraud. Now my friend Ker comes here and says, "Oh, this expedition was made more than three years before the finding of the indictment, and therefore we could not put it in the indictment." That is what he says. In other words, if they had put that in the indictment they would have killed their case by the statute of limitations, and they are trying to cheat the law and cheat this jury by dodging the statute of limitations. In other words, they are not presenting this case to you as it is, but they are presenting it as they can patch it up, to avoid what they know is an insurmountable barrier in their way if they present it to you properly. Of course I am not going to misstate their case; I intend to meet their case. They claim that they have a right to go back of this period of the statute of limitations with regard to this expedition for the purpose of proving the expedition as a circumstance tending to show that there was a conspiracy between these parties. I think I state it accurately. They say that although they have said nothing about it in the indictment, they can go back to that period and show the expedition, and that that expedition is a badge of fraud. That is their point. Let us see if I can meet that, gentlemen of the jury. That expedition was from one hundred and twenty hours to seventy-two hours. Upon what did General Brady make the order? Let me present to you two or three petitions as set out in the record:

We, the citizens of The Dalles and Wasco County, State of Oregon, most respectfully petition and ask that the mail service on route No. 44155, from The Dalles to Baker City, Oreg., be increased to six times a week, and the running time on said route be expedited to seventy-two (72) hours. The above-named route is a very important route to the people of the State of Oregon, and the country through which it runs is rapidly filling up, and we, the undersigned, are satisfied that our request will not only be beneficial to this country, but also profitable to the United States, for the experience of the last Indian war has proven the same, as no communication could be had except by private carriers under heavy expenses. We therefore pray for the granting of the above petition.

That is very numerously signed, and it is indorsed as follows:

The prayer of petitioners should be granted. This service should be increased without delay. I earnestly recommend it for the reasons stated in the petition.

October 20, 1878.

JOHN H. MITCHELL.

Here is another :

We, the undersigned petitioners, do most respectfully ask that the mail service on route No. ———, from The Dalles to Baker City, may be increased to six trips per week, and the running time be expedited to seventy-two hours. This is a very important road to the people of Eastern Oregon, as it connects us with other counties and towns. It is also the most direct route to The Dalles and Columbia River, and the counties through which it passes are fast settling up with stockmen, farmers, and others. The last summer's Indian war has proved to us that a daily mail on this route would not only be a great benefit to the country at large, but would also be of great benefit to the Government.

There are a number of other petitions of like character.

In view of one thing connected with this case I must beg your indulgence while I go a little more into detail about the situation as it existed at the time this service was increased :

We, the undersigned representatives, residing in the counties through which mail route No. 44155, from The Dalles to Baker City., Oreg., passes, would respectfully recommend that the service be increased on said route to a daily service. The recent Indian raids through that section and the large immigration during the past year render this increase absolutely necessary. We also ask that the schedule of time be reduced to seventy-two hours.

That is signed by a number of the members of the legislature of the State of Oregon, and indorsed :

I earnestly recommend this service to be increased to daily.
November 12, 1878.

JOHN H. MITCHELL.

Now, on page 1676, there is a petition to which I wish to invite your attention. It is addressed to the Postmaster-General :

SIR: The residents of this part of Grant County, State of Oregon, who have their mail facilities at this, the above-mentioned place, and which vicinity for the last few years has been fast filling up with a permanent population, and are anxious, and, owing to the business and population, as compared with other places, are entitled to a daily mail each way on route No. 44155 (between Baker City and The Dalles via Canyon City and this place), which will also facilitate communication with the military post of Camp Harney, which is a permanent military point in East Oregon (in fact the only one), owing to the recent and expected Indian troubles, to say nothing of the numerous small mining camps in this vicinity.

Therefore we, the undersigned, humbly pray that you will take this petition into your earliest consideration, and grant the prayer of the undersigned petitioners.

That is signed by the postmaster and eighty-six others, and it is indorsed :

We, I hereby recommend the granting of the prayer of the within petition.

JOHN H. SLATER.

JOHN WHITEAKER.

Slater was the Senator and Whiteaker the Representative. Those are specimens, gentlemen, of the applications that were made to the Post-Office Department for increase of service, which was specially granted. They brought a witness here to testify, and I will read you a portion of his testimony with regard to the circulation of petitions, from page 1691 :

Q. Did you circulate any petitions around there for the purpose of getting signatures to them?—A. Yes, sir; I circulated one.

Q. Where did you circulate it?—A. I circulated one at Baker City.

Q. Did you get signatures to it?—A. I did.

Q. Did you circulate any anywhere else?—A. No, sir.

Q. Do you know of any being circulated any place else?—A. I believe I do.

Q. Where?—A. At Prairie City and Canyon City.

Q. Are you well acquainted about Prairie City?—A. I am.

Q. Do you know Mr. Jules Lebreton, the postmaster at Prairie City?—A. I do.

Q. Did you ever see him write?—A. Frequently.

Q. Would you know his signature?—A. I do not know that I would.

Q. You write yourself, I suppose?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And read writing?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. [Submitting 26 L to witness.] Now, look at that and tell me if you know any of these people whose names you see there?—A. Yes, sir; I know nearly all those.

Q. They are good, reputable, respectable citizens, are they not?—A. They are, sir.

Q. Did you sign any of these petitions yourself?—A. Well, I could not say; but I rather think I did.

Q. Did you not sign this one?—A. I do not think I did. I might have. I would not be positive about it.

Q. Which one of them was it you did sign?—A. I could not say. I think I signed one petition, and probably more. I would sign anything to get a daily mail.

Q. You needed it out there, did you not?—A. Well, we thought we did.

Q. And you were honest about it, were you not?—A. Yes, sir.

* * * * *

Q. Who was the postmaster at Canyon City?—A. Edwin Hall.

Q. You knew of the petition being circulated at Canyon City, did you not?—A. I think I saw one circulated there. I think that is the petition I signed, if I signed any.

Q. Do you recollect whether Mr. Hall had signed the petition that you signed?—A. I do not.

Q. [Submitting 24 L.] See if that is the petition you saw out there?—A. Yes, sir; I think that is the petition.

Q. Do you think that is the petition that was circulated there?—A. I think so; to the best of my knowledge.

Q. You know the people who signed this?—A. The majority of them.

Q. They are good, respectable people, are they?—A. They are.

Q. And reliable?—A. As far as I know.

Q. What county do you live in?—A. Grant County.

Q. [Submitting 23 L to witness.] Now, see if this is the petition that you circulated?—A. I do not think it is.

Q. Do you know these people?—A. I know a portion of them.

Q. Where did they live?—A. Baker City.

Q. So far as you know, they are reputable citizens at Baker City, are they?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You think this is not the particular petition that you circulated?—A. That is not the petition I circulated.

Q. What was done with the one you did circulate?—A. I do not know.

Q. After you got done circulating it, what did you do with it; who did you give it to?—A. When I got done circulating it, I gave it to L. P. Williamson.

Q. You presented it to such persons as you knew?—A. I presented it to everybody.

Q. And the persons who signed it were residents of Baker City and reputable people, were they?—A. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLISS. I object. That is questioning about a petition which is not here, and does not appear to have been here at all. If he will identify the petition I shall not object.

Mr. WILSON. All right.

Q. [Submitting 17 L to witness.] Now, look at that, and see whether that is the one you circulated?—A. Yes, sir; that is the petition.

Q. Do you know the people who signed that petition?—A. A portion of them.

Q. What proportion of them do you know?—A. I suppose I know probably one-third of them.

Q. This was signed at Baker City?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. As far as you know, are they reputable gentlemen?—A. They are.

Q. Did you sign this petition?—A. I could not say whether I did or not. Likely I did.

Q. You read this petition before you circulated it, or at the time you were circulating it, did you?—A. I think I did.

Q. What it stated was true, was it?—A. I considered it so.

Q. And you do now, do you not?—A. I have not read the petition. If it reads the same now as it then did, I do.

Q. Well, I will read it to you.

Then the petition was read.

That is correct, is it?—A. That is about the way the petitions generally read.

Q. Is that about the way the people felt out there; is that about true?—A. Yes; it is about true.

I have read that much, gentlemen of the jury, for the purpose of showing to you that these petitions to which I have been calling your attention are not bogus petitions, but petitions signed by the people who profess to have signed them, by whom they purport to have been signed. Upon these petitions this service was increased and the speed expedited, as has been stated. Now, gentlemen, right in connection with that I want to call your attention to the Canyon City and Camp McDermitt route. As I have shown you on the map, the two unite at Canyon City. They had a witness on the stand here, a Mr. McBean, who carried the mail on the Camp McDermitt route beyond Camp Harney. They say this service was not needed! That is their point. They say Brady knew they did not need this service and therefore this was a fraudulent order. Don't you remember that McBean told you that when the mail only ran once a week over the Canyon City and Camp McDermitt route he was employed by the quartermaster of the Army to carry three additional trips for the benefit of the camp? Why was that? If this mail once a week was all that was needed, if it was ample, will you tell me why on earth these military men at Camp Harney were employing a man at $270 a month to carry additional trips? If it was not needed do you not know that these military officers would not have done a thing like that? Leaving the people out of consideration, if the needs of the Government itself for the mail matter of this military post required that they should employ a special courier to make three additional trips, does it not prove beyond all sort of question that there were not enough mail facilities there? I say it does. Now, when we have proved that more were needed, how much more, gentlemen? We have got the number of trips up to four by the manner in which they were carrying that mail; not paying for it through the Post-Office Department, but paying for it out of another pocket of the Government at the rate of $270 a month, and that was only supplying the immediate wants of the military. The general public had no advantage from it. The general public and the military were in want of mail and the military were having to supply themselves with extra trips for the purpose of meeting the absolute needs of the Government itself independent of the people. Now way down below Camp Harney was this other military post, Camp McDermitt, lying right in the same Indian country. It was these Indian troubles that made it necessary for the Government to have this extra service. Right down there below Camp Harney was Camp McDermitt and below that was Winnemucca on the Central Pacific Railroad. These gentlemen say "Oh, it would have been amply sufficient to have sent the mails out by these circuitous routes," and yet by running a line right straight down to the railroad they had free access, easy access, speedy access to all the world, especially to the city of Washington with which these military posts were in so much need of speedy communication. I think I have demonstrated that there was more service needed on this route. If I have done so, I want to know if you are going to stop to inquire whether it ought to have been three trips or whether Brady ought to have added two. If he made a mistake and put on one more than you think was needed are you going to infer that he was guilty of fraud and was engaged in a conspiracy when he did it? I say that thing is too absurd.

The COURT. How much of this route did the military service cover?

Mr. WILSON. From Canyon City to Camp McDermitt was seventy-five miles, I believe. That is my recollection about it.

The COURT. The whole length of the route was two hundred and forty-three miles.

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir; and they paid $270 a month for carrying seventy-five miles of that route, and it was paid out of the quartermaster's department. Here is a most extraordinary proposition put forward, gentlemen. I believe that I will not stop to read to you the petitions that were presented on the Canyon City and Camp McDermitt route, because it is a weariness I know to you to listen to me as to the dry details of this case, and I feel that I ought to apologize to you for having already taken so much time. But there are two things that I must allude to in connection with The Dalles and Baker City route and this route, because you see I am grouping them together. They have found what they call a soldier's petition. They have found a petition that they say was signed by a lot of soldiers who were not on the route, and they say it is a fraudulent petition and that somebody filed that petition. You notice with what great particularity they called your attention to the indications that that is a manufactured petition. Gentlemen, let me grant for the purposes of this argument all that they claim about that petition and let us see where we are. Then we have a peck of petitions that cannot be complained of. We have petition after petition, recommendation after recommendation in this case, a great number of them, the integrity of which has never been assailed by mortal man, and which we have proven by their own witnesses are genuine petitions signed by people living along the route. Because they find one petition of this description they ask you to ignore the multitude which represent the truth in regard to the matter, and ask you to condemn everybody in this case because that petition is on file. I do not know whether the soldiers signed that petition or not. I know nothing about that. I know it is here in this case. They say there were no soldiers there. If I were going to discuss the matter I would argue to you from the testimony that there were soldiers there; but whether these particular ones were there or not, I do not care. I do not know. I do know that there are plenty of petitions, numerous signed by actual residents, representing the truth about that thing, and that upon those petitions my client acted.

Mr. KER. Of which route are you speaking?

Mr. WILSON. I am speaking of The Dalles and Baker City route. Is there any other petition you can attack except this?

Mr. KER. The one Miner wrote?

Mr. WILSON. I am talking about the soldier's petition. Is there any other on that route? If there is another, mention it. Now is the best time in the world. [After a pause.] Not another, gentlemen. Now take the route from Eugene City to Bridge Creek. My Brother Ker thought he had found something very startling in that case, and he argued to you with great earnestness that there was an indication of fraud in the fact that the distance between Mitchell and Bridge Creek had been cut off, which left Eugene City and Mitchell standing in the air, without any connection whatever with the outside world. That did look like a very singular sort of performance, and if it had been true it would have certainly shown a remarkable oversight on the part of somebody in doing a thing of that kind. But, gentlemen, it does not happen to be true, because Mitchell happened to be on The Dalles and Baker City route. It was also on the Eugene City and Bridge Creek route and the distance between Mitchell and Bridge Creek was covered by both routes, and that was an oversight by Mr. Brewer, who, I believe, was the corresponding clerk in charge of the section in preparing the advertisement. Just as soon as they got the distance circular out they found out the mistake. They found out that Mitchell was on both of those routes, and the result was to pay for the distance between Mitchell and Bridge Creek twice. Now, what did they do? Did these conspirators go on and get that pay twice? Did my client allow them to get that pay twice? No, gentlemen. The first thing that you see done in the case is to cut off the distance between Mitchell and Bridge Creek, which makes the two routes come together, and there is no duplication of service or duplication of pay. Shall I annoy you by going into the petitions on the Eugene City and Bridge Creek route? I might refer you briefly to two or three of them just simply by way of illustration, but they are not attacked by anybody. Nobody says they are fraudulent petitions. Nobody says any fictitious names are signed to them. Nobody pretends that they are otherwise than signed by men who lived there and who desired that service. These gentlemen say we were bringing this about by means of fraudulent petitions—petitions signed by fictitious names, and all that sort of thing, and yet there has not been introduced here a syllable of testimony attacking any single petition, letter, or recommendation upon that route. The papers are indorsed by Senator Mitchell, and I believe also by the Representative, but I am not sure about that. Now, that was the situation, gentlemen. That was the condition of things when my client made these orders. You had testimony as to the amount of mail that went over these routes. These gentlemen think if it is ten pounds of letters that that is too trivial and inconsequential to merit the consideration of anybody. I do not think they ever stopped to consider that a pound of mail is thirty-two letters. They never stopped to consider those things, but they thought by proving that there was only ten, twenty, or fifty pounds of mail going over a route at a particular time, and it cost a good deal to carry it, that that would be enough to prejudice you against these defendants.

I will allude for a moment to another point that has been frequently made during this case. Don't you remember, gentlemen, that they made a nice calculation as to this very route, and said that if Brady had simply multiplied the trips and put on six trips he could have got this service for $24,000, whereas by expediting and giving a smaller number of trips it cost $30,000. My Brother Ker says to put on six trips would be better and cheaper than the other, and because he comes to the conclusion that six trips would cost a little less money, he thinks that is the course that General Brady ought to have taken. You heard what General Brady had to say about that. He told you that in his judgment to make a good service expedition was often more important than mere multiplication of trips. But I am not going to spend any time on that.

Now, in the case of the Canyon City and Camp McDermitt route, here is a petition which contains two pages of names of parties down in Utah. They do not live anywhere near this route. There is no question about that, gentlemen. I am not going to controvert it. I want to see whether you think that if every one of you or all of you were put together and boiled down into a Second Assistant Postmaster-General you would have ever suspected anything of that kind in connection with this petition? I will show you just why you would not. The petition is signed very numerously by people who do live on the route, and I can not conceive why they should have gotten in the other names purposely. I can conceive how it might have been done by accident, but there is no reason in the world why anybody should purposely have done it [exhibiting petition]. Here it is, containing a large number of names of persons who actually lived on the route. Down at the bottom is another very large number of names of persons who actually lived on the route and whose signatures are undoubted. There is no question about that. I will suppose that petition goes to you just as it is, and you are considering it along with a whole lot of other petitions setting out the same thing in substance and as to the genuineness of which there is no dispute. Here is the body of the petition [indicating] and the genuine names are right on the back of the page itself. Then follow these other genuine names pasted on, and then follow the names of persons off the route. Now, here is this indorsement:

Having examined the foregoing petition and list of names, I find it correct in its statements, except that it affects the middle and southeastern section of the State; the north and northeastern section being supplied from Kelton by way of Boise City to The Dalles. The section, however, supplied by route 44160 is not less important to the section through which it passes than the Kelton route was to the section through which it passes, only a few years since. Therefore I recommend the granting of the prayer of this petition.

J. H. SLATER.

He was the Senator from Oregon, and he wrote that upon the very identical petition about which these gentlemen have had so much to say:

I concur in the foregoing.

L. F. GROVER.

I concur in the above request.

JOHN WHITEAKER.

Another Senator from Oregon and the Representative from Oregon. Just imagine yourselves boiled down into one Second Assistant Postmaster-General and that paper coming to you indorsed in that way, and what would you say to a Mr. Lawyer that would stand up afterwards and say, "Oh, you ought to have known that some of these names were the names of parties who lived in Utah instead of up here in Oregon?" Is not that too absurd, gentlemen? Here were numbers, as I have said, of other petitions asking the same thing, and then there is this petition, indorsed in that way by two Senators and a Representative, and sent in to the Post-Office Department. And yet these gentlemen, because they find some Utah names in there—how they got there I do not know—want you to condemn the whole thing.

Now, gentlemen, I want you to remember that this is one of the cases where there were mail bills. I want you to remember that the order they complain of was made in June, 1879. They say that these mail bills ought to have advised him that the service was not needed; that these mail bills showed that there was not much mail passing over this route. In the first place, gentlemen, you know very well that those mail bills came to the inspection division. They never came to Brady's attention until the chief of the inspection brought his attention to them because of some delinquency on the part of the contractor. When did those mail bills that they talk so much about come into the department? Here are a series of letters that they have put in evidence touching this subject. When are they dated, gentlemen? In November, 1880. Recollect that the order was made in June, 1879, if I have stated it correctly.

Mr. KER. What route?

Mr. WILSON. Eugene City and Bridge Creek. The order was made in June, 1879?

Mr. WILLIAMS. June 26, 1879.

Mr. WILSON. June 26, 1879. They brought in some mail bills on that route. When? The order, as I have said, was made in June, 1879. These mail bills commence in December, 1879, and they run on up for some time during December, 1879, and possibly longer; I am not going to say just how long. But what I call your attention to is this: that the order was made when all these petitions were there, and when there was nothing to show the extent of the mail that went over that route; nothing whatever. And when they bring these mail bills in here they bring them in long after the order was made, and then for the first time, so far as we know anything about it, there was anything in the department which tended to show the extent of the mail which passed over that route, and that Brady saw those mail bills. Have they shown anything of that kind as to this particular route? Not a bit of it. And have they shown to you that after that period there were not many, many sacks of mail going over this route? Not a bit of it. But they find here at a particular period, long after the order is made, that some mail bills come into the inspection division, and they say that Brady ought to have known that those mail bills were in there, and because he did not know that they were in there it is an indication of fraud, and because he did not know that those mail bills that were subsequently put on this route would develop this thing that is an indication of fraud.

The COURT. How do you know the distance between Camp Harney and Canyon City?

Mr. WILSON. That is in the testimony of Mr. McBean, as I recollect it.

Here is the jacket (85 I) made up for the deductions when these parties were failing in their trips, and all that sort of thing. Look at both sides of it. There is not a word said in there about any mail bills, and this is what would be brought to Brady. The chief of the inspection division brings him that written in red ink, and tells him what there is there, and you see there is nothing about mail bills. Those mail bills were in his inspection division two or three months after this order was made, but his attention was never called to them in the world. They say he ought to have known about that. I ought to say that that jacket is for the quarter ending March 31, 1880. It had run nearly a year before even the jacket is brought to him. There is not a syllable in the records or file to show that his attention was ever called to it.

So it simply comes to this: looking at this map as he would look at it, of course; looking at these petitions; listening to these solicitations, personal and otherwise, he made this order, and the simple question is whether you will come to the conclusion that he did it for corrupt purposes, or did it for purposes that were contemplated by these petitions and asked for by these petitioners.

In connection with this Canyon City and Camp McDermitt route, gentlemen, you will remember that that is one of the routes on which they say that there was no separation of trips from expedition in the order. I have said all in respect of that that I desire.

But I want to say right here in this connection, gentlemen, one word further in regard to these routes we have just been talking about, and it is applicable to all of them—that these contractors never got any pay for service that they did not perform. Remember that. Relentlessly, invariably, as the reports were made to Brady by the inspection division of failure to perform service, their pay to that extent was cut off; and where temporary service was put on in consequence of the delay occasioned by failure of the contractor on The Dalles and Baker City route, you will remember that that temporary service was not paid for by the Government, but was paid for by the contractor.

In speaking of this Canyon City and Camp McDermitt route, you will remember that Mr. McBean said that the mail that he was carrying down there, when he was running this courier line, probably weighed twenty or thirty pounds; twenty to forty pounds is the way he finally stated it.

I come, now, to ROUTE No. 40104, MINERAL PARK TO PIOCHE.

I wish to give you an exact history of this route.

On the 23d of July, 1879, Brady made an order to take effect from the 1st of August, 1879, increasing the trips four per week.

On the 10th of April, 1880, having reduced the number of trips, he made an order allowing one month's extra pay.

The route is two hundred and thirty-two miles long, and was originally let at one trip a week. [Map shown to jury.] Here is Ehrenberg, away off down here [indicating]. Here is Yuma, on the Southern Pacific road; here is Mineral Park down here, and here is Pioche up here; there is the Union Pacific Railroad, and here is the Utah Railroad, running up to the Union Pacific. Prescott, Arizona, lies off here. This is the situation. The mail went down here until it got to Yuma, and then it found its way by the various mail routes around through this country about Prescott, and came over here to Mineral Park. From Ehrenberg on down there were frequent and speedy mails down to this point, but here was a stretch of country down in here where mails were only one trip a week and on slow schedule. That is the general situation.

The route was advertised and contracted for at one trip a week. On the 24th of December, 1878, it was increased two trips and reduced from eighty-four to sixty hours, that being less than pro rata. Here is the jacket, on page 1634:

Date, December, 1878. Territory, Arizona.

Number of route, 40104.

Termini of route, Mineral Park and Pioche.

Length of route, two hundred and thirty-two miles.

Number of trips, one.

Contractor, J. W. Dorsey.

Pay, $2,982 per annum.

Citizens of Arizona receiving mail on this route petition for increase of service to three trips per week and reduction of running time from eighty-four to sixty hours. Hon. H. S. Stevens earnestly recommends the increase of service, together with expedition petitioned for. General John C. Frémont, governor of Arizona Territory, in a letter referring to the same matter, says: "The increased facilities asked for would be very beneficial to our people in that section and are very much needed by them, and I earnestly recommend this change," &c.

The increase recommended would not only prove beneficial to the offices on this route, but would be an advantage to several other offices located in Northeastern Arizona.

On the 21st of October, 1878, Mr. Stevens, the Delegate, wrote this letter (page 1635):

PRESCOTT, ARIZ., October 21, 1878.

Hon. THOS. BRADY,

Second Assistant Postmaster-General, Washington, D. C.:

SIR: I would respectfully recommend that the service on the United States mail route No. 40104, from Mineral Park, Arizona Territory, to Pioche, Nevada, be increased from one time a week to twice a week, so as to give increased mail facilities to the citizens supplied with mail on this route, and I hereby indorse any application of the citizens for increased mail service on this route.

I am, very respectfully, yours, &c.,

H. S. STEVENS,
Delegate.

And then another, on the same page:

Hon. THOS. BRADY,

Second Assistant Postmaster-General, Washington, D. C. :

SIR: I would respectfully recommend that the service on route 40104, from Mineral Park, Arizona Territory, to Pioche, Nevada, be expedited, so as the running time shall be sixty hours in lieu of eighty-four hours, the present running time; and would hereby indorse any petition of the citizens on said route for expediting the service on said route.

I am, very respectfully, yours, &c.,

H. S. STEVENS,
Delegate.

Then another, on page 1636:

TERRITORY OF ARIZONA, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Prescott, Ariz., October 21, 1878.

Notice the dates, gentlemen.

Hon. General KEY,

Postmaster-General:

SIR: I learn that an application is about being made to increase the service on the mail route between Mineral Park, in this Territory, and Pioche, Nev., from once to twice a week, and that it is considered also very desirable to reduce the present running time from eighty-five to sixty hours.

The increased facilities asked for would be very beneficial to our people in that section, and are very much needed by them, and I earnestly recommend this change to the favorable consideration of the department.

I use this occasion to thank you for the advantages conferred on this place by the recent improvement on the route to Santa Fé.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. C. FRÉMONT,
Governor, &c.

And here is a petition, on page 1638:

Hon. THOMAS BRADY,

Second Assistant Postmaster-General, Washington, D. C. :

We, the undersigned citizens, furnished mail by the United States mail on route No. 40105, from Ehrenberg to Mineral Park, in Arizona Territory, would recommend and request that said service be expedited so as to have the running time from Ehrenberg to Mineral Park only forty-eight hours in lieu of sixty hours, the present running time.

Recollect, we have got down to another route, Ehrenberg to Mineral Park, which is below. That petition is very largely signed. There are two petitions, but I have only read one. They are substantially in the same language, and they are signed by the same people.

The gentlemen of the prosecution argue to you that that is an indication that there is fraud in this case. Recollect that these two routes, the Ehrenberg and the Mineral Park, come together in just that way, and form a continuous line, running down to Yuma. How ridiculous it would be to increase the service down to this point of junction between the two lines and not increase it on the other. That would be an absurdity on its face; and most naturally the people who were seeking to get up that service, to get these increased mail facilities, would see at once that the department was not going to increase and expedite one of these routes without applying it to both, because it would be just going half way in doing that which was needed to be done. The great purpose was to get a through line connecting that railroad that ran down from the Union Pacific to the southern part of Utah, with Yuma on the Southern Pacific, and those two routes just lay end to end in that line. What was more natural than that the people who wanted this thing done would see that they must increase and expedite both of them the same way. That would be the thing that would be necessary to be done. Hence they sent two petitions which were signed by the same people, and they are asking for the same thing.

Ah, but, gentlemen, they have discovered something here in connection with these petitions. I always have to hunt a good while before I can find it. They have discovered something here. They say that the word "Ehrenberg," in this petition was written over an erasure, and that Brady ought to have seen that. Look at those two "Ehrenbergs," and look at that writing, gentlemen. [The foreman of the jury held the petition up to the light.] I knew you would have to go to the light to find it, and you will have mighty hard work to find it then. Imagine yourself Second Assistant Postmaster-General for half a minute. Do not continue in that business more than half a minute, or Ker will be after you with a sharp stick. Imagine now that you are looking at that to detect an erasure.

Mr. KER. Show the jury both petitions.

Mr. WILSON. Well, I will do it. [Another paper was handed to the jury.]

Mr. KER. Rerdell wrote one and Miner the other.

Mr. WILSON. You are responsible for Rerdell; you may take care of him.

Mr. CRANE (foreman of the jury). There are a number of erasures.

Mr. WILSON. Do not forget to hold it up to the light, gentlemen, you won't see it unless you do, and I want you to see it.

Mr. CRANE. What else has been put there in the place of "Ehrenberg?"

Mr. WILSON. I do not know; I would like to know myself.

Now, gentlemen, recollect that one of these routes is not in this indictment; the other is. But the reason for petitioning for the mail between Ehrenberg and Mineral Park is just, it seems to me, necessarily the reason I have stated to you. These gentlemen said that there were mail bills went over that route for nineteen days, and they produced them in evidence, showing that there was no mail went over the route in that time.

By the way, I may say to you that with reference to mail bills General Brady suggested to Mr. Lake to get up something or other by which they could know whether these contractors were performing the service within the time they were required to perform it or not, and Mr. Lake got up this scheme of mail bills whereby a postmaster was required to put a mail bill in a sack when it started from the end of the route, and then a record was kept by the other postmasters until it came to the other end of the route. That enabled the department to know whether the mail had started on time and had gone continuously through. That was done for the purpose of protecting the department against any imposition on the part of the contractors. These mail bills were sent out on that route. General Brady tells you that the design was to make a through route there north and south between those two railroad systems, connecting at Pioche with the system of mails going out into Arizona. These mail bills went over that route for nineteen days, and here is a case where his attention was brought to the mail bills, because, when the reports came in from the postmasters, these mail bills showed how much mail was going over that route, and they found that for nineteen days that the route was in operation scarcely any mail had gone over it. Now what happened? On page 1643 is the entry on the jacket made by the inspection division in red ink, under date of January 22, 1880:

The mail bills received by the inspection division showing little mail matter passing over this route, as per files of said division, and that the service is most irregularly and inefficiently performed: Ordered, That service on said route be reduced from the 1st day of February next to what it was at original letting, both as to trips and speed, without one month's extra pay.

That is the order that was written in red ink by the inspection division. Now comes the order in black ink, signed by Brady:

From February 1, 1880, reduce service from seven trips per week to one trip per week, and increase running time from sixty hours to eighty-four hours, decreasing contractor's pay $49,051.33 per annum, being amount allowed by orders bearing date December 31, 1878 (No. 11446), and July 23, 1879 (No. 6834), for increase of trips and expedition of running time, without one month's extra pay on service dispensed with.
BRADY.

Those reports for nineteen days showed that there was very little mail going over that route, and that the service was being very irregularly performed, and he took it off. They say he put it back again. But recollect, gentlemen, that his purpose was, and that is what these people had been petitioning for, to get up this through mail and speedy mail, but the contractor was not doing the service properly and no mail was going over it.

Now, what happened? That thing having been done, then Mr. Dillon, president of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, wrote this letter to General Brady:

Hon. THOMAS J. BRADY,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General:

SIR: The Utah Southern Railroad will in a short time be completed to Frisco.

That does not mean San Francisco, but a place down in that country called Frisco.

From that point to Pioche, Nev., there is already established daily mail service which will be rapidly taken up by our advancing railroad. From Pioche to Prescott, there is running a tri-weekly mail service on slow schedule. It is important that emigrants and capital from the East should have a more direct line of intercourse with the richly developing Territory of Arizona than the present circuitous route by California and Southern Pacific Railroad.

I therefore respectfully ask that the service between Pioche and Prescott be increased to a daily, thus giving us a continuous daily service from the Union Pacific Railroad to Southern Pacific Railroad at Maricopa Wells.

It is superfluous to add that the States and Territories yielding the precious metals would to-day be half a wilderness except for the intercommunication established by the Post-Office Department.

Respectfully,

SIDNEY DILLON,
President Union Pacific.

That is a better argument than I can make, although it is one I have feebly been trying to present to your mind. He says that this country out there would be a half wilderness but for the intercommunication that is afforded by the mails. There was a daily mail down to a certain point, and then off at another point there was a tri-weekly mail running beyond, and here was an intervening stretch where there was one trip a week on a slow schedule. He says, "We do not want that condition of things." Well, the people before he wrote that letter had said they wanted this additional mail; they had pressed it upon the department, as I have already said. Then Mr. Dillon wrote this letter. Now, General Brady declined to put it back to where it was before, but he did put it up to three trips, and that is what these gentlemen complain of.

Mr. KER. We do not complain about that in that way at all.

Mr. WILSON. Then let us hear what you do complain of, so that I may answer that.

Mr. KER. Judge Wilson, in arguing to the jury, first gave the order of January 22, 1880, to bring it back to one trip. He then read the letter of Sidney Dillon, dated on the 21st of July, 1879, and then made the statement to the jury that, acting upon that letter, he left it at three trips. The truth was that the record shows by this letter, if the judge had read it further down:

TURNER: Make up case Pioche to Mineral Park.

BRADY.

Dated July 21, 1879.

And based upon that letter alone, Brady raised the service from what it was by the order of July 23, 1879, four trips. Succeeding that order of increase of four trips came a letter from Horace D. Beene, a lawyer, and, acting upon that letter, it was brought down to one trip. And there is no letter or anything in the jacket, good, bad, or indifferent, upon which Brady changed his mind to make it three trips instead of bringing it down to one. The letter of Sidney Dillon was the only petition and the only thing upon which it was brought up to seven trips a week, upon which there was an allowance of $29,733.33.

Mr. WILSON. I think Mr. Ker has made his speech before about the same way. He says there was nothing on file. He takes it for granted because they have one paper that that is all that the Second Assistant acted upon, and that everything that has gone before and was in the files was to go for nothing. That is the way they argue this case. Just like he picked out one petition on the Kearney and Kent route and said the whole thing was done on that, when I showed you the Hale and Nightingale letters and Seaman letters, and all those other papers which they think go for nothing. I have just shown you, gentlemen, that here is General Frémont's letter, dated October 21, 1878, asking for more service on this route. Does that go for nothing?

Mr. KER. They got it on that.

Mr. WILSON. Were those things exhausted when there had been an order made upon them? He says they got it on that.

Go a little further, gentlemen. Here are two letters from Delegate Stevens, one of them dated October 21, 1878, asking for increase of trips, and another dated in October, 1878, asking for expedition. These papers were on file, as well as the letter of Mr. Dillon, when this thing was done, and they continued to be on file as standing evidences that this service was needed. These gentlemen think that if one petition goes in there and there is action upon it, then it is functus officio, and if something turns up afterwards that petition is as dead as Julius Cæsar, and can never be looked after by the department for any purpose whatever. That is their theory of this case, and that is the way they argue this case. I say to you, gentlemen of the jury, that when the Second Assistant Postmaster-General is called upon to act in respect of any route, the whole record and whole files of that route up to that date are there for examination and consideration; and when he did this, then all these papers were there; and it is the merest nonsense, it seems to me, to say that all these papers are to go for naught and that they can pick out one paper as being the paper upon which the thing is done. He had all these papers to show the importance of creating that service, and upon them he acted. And yet, because the Second Assistant did not listen to Mr. Beene, why, of course, he must have been guilty of some fraud.

Mr. KER. He did listen to him, and put it down to one trip.

Mr. WILSON. Upon the recommendation of Beene?

Mr. KER. Upon a threat of Beene.

Mr. WILSON. Who is Beene? Beene is a lawyer living at a place called Ward, more than a hundred miles from this place, and I might with the utmost propriety, I think, argue that this Mr. Beene was some lawyer representing a rival contractor engaged in carrying the mail upon some other route that might be interfered with if there was more service put upon this route. In other words, if this mail were turned down through this country where it ought to go it might have the effect to cut off the service of some contractor on the other route who happened to be a client of Mr. Beene. But who is Mr. Beene? Do you know? Does my friend know who Mr. Beene is?

Mr. KER. He is dead.

Mr. WILSON. You say he is dead. You had Postmaster-General Key dead the other day, too. They killed Key off unceremoniously, but he happens to be holding the United States courts down in Tennessee—a pretty lively old corpse. That is the kind of argument you are treated to.

But they say he put this back on some one paper. Well, they expect you to utterly ignore the testimony of General Brady. They do not expect you to believe him at all. They say, "Why, gentlemen, we have indicted him, and having indicted him, he must come on this stand and testify, and if he does not, you must infer that he is guilty, or he would." And then when he does come on the stand and testify they say, "You must not believe him because we have indicted him, don't you see?" That is their logic. That is the way they argue this case.

Well, General Brady has testified. You have heard him testify, and you have seen him on the stand, and I am not going to stop to enter into any encomiums upon him at all in connection with this thing. He is there, and you heard what he said. Now, what was it? He said, "We wanted to get up a better mail system; I put this thing up or down in obedience to these petitions and because I thought it would improve the service in that part of the country; and I found that this contractor or subcontractor was not doing his duty in respect to the matter. My attention was called to the mail bills, and I saw there was no mail going over that route, and therefore I cut it down." But he says that Senator Plumb insisted that he was doing injustice to the contractor, and as he was anxious to make this an efficient service through there, he restored so many of these trips. That is the history of that. Now, they say he was engaged in a conspiracy when he was doing this. If he was in a conspiracy to make money would he not have availed himself of every reasonable opportunity to do it? When he could get a good excuse for doing it would he not do it? It seems to me so.

What transpires in this case? After he had put it back to three trips there came petition after petition to him, and some of them came through the White House, asking that it be put back to the seven trips. Mr. Gould wrote a very admirable letter and a very sensible letter on that subject. I am not going to stop to read those letters to you. There were also other indorsements came to him asking him to do this thing. But he declined to do it. Now, if he had been engaged in a conspiracy to put money in his pocket, there was the best opportunity in the world to do it, and yet he would not do it.

Ah, mail bills. Gentlemen, this service was restored to three trips and the expedition, and have the gentlemen brought you any mail bills since that time? Think of that for a moment. Is there anything to indicate to you that the policy that he laid down and was pursuing has not proved the true policy? If there had been anything in all that department that would have shown, since he put on the three trips, that they were not fully justified by the amount of mail that went over that route, do you not think they would have been here? Have they anything of the kind? No, gentlemen. Since that service was restored there has not been a breath of testimony to show that the mail bags have not been loaded with mail going over that route into that country.

And now, gentlemen, there is another fact you know in this case perfectly well. It is in evidence here that on account of failure of that subcontractor to carry that mail as required, deductions were made from the pay, and they stand unremitted to this hour. Brady imposed the fines and deductions just exactly as they were reported to the inspection division by the postmasters along that route, and by the inspection division to him, without any variableness or a shadow of turning in every case, and there are thousands and thousands of dollars that have been taken from the pay of those men for their failure to carry that mail in accordance with the requirements of their contracts, and they stand unremitted to this hour, or at least stood unremitted as long as he remained in the Post-Office Department.

The COURT. Gentlemen, I wish you would bear in mind that we meet to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock.

Mr. CRANE (foreman of the jury). Shall we sit four hours?

The COURT. That is what I understand; if you can stand it and if the counsel can stand it.

Mr. WILSON. I can stand it.

Mr. GREENE (a juror). I withdraw my request, if your honor please. I believe it would not be agreeable to all parties.

The COURT. Then we had better meet at the usual hour, had we not?

Mr. HARRIGAN (a juror). I do not object to it, your honor.

Mr. GREENE (a juror). I withdraw my request.

The COURT. Day after to-morrow we may make some change, but it will be understood that we meet to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

Thereupon (at 4 o'clock p. m.) the court adjourned until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

TUESDAY, MAY 15, 1883.

The court met at 11 o'clock.

Present, counsel for the Government and for the defendants.

Mr. WILSON. [Resuming.] Gentlemen of the jury, in trying to hurry through these routes I think I may say as much for the purpose of relieving you as for the purpose of relieving myself, I find that some things I possibly ought to have said I have omitted to say. Doubtless when I am done there will be many things that I shall feel I ought to have said and possibly many things that you may feel I ought to have discussed that I will have omitted. I want to call your attention back this morning, gentlemen of the jury, to the Mineral Park and Pioche route, just to make one statement that is shown by the record in this case, and that is that when it was discovered that the subcontractor was not performing this service in the manner which was contemplated at the time the expedition was made, Brady not merely cut off the service, but refused to allow the month's extra pay, as he had not performed the expedition, as it was his duty to do. I want, also, this morning, gentlemen of the jury, to bring your attention to one other matter in this case. A great deal has been said and a great many petition shave been shown to you, and I have taken pains to bring your attention to the petitions that were presented and on file before the Second Assistant Postmaster-General at the time these various orders were made. There is a paragraph in the body of these contracts which shows that petitioning was the only method they had, and was a method that they peculiarly had to resort to for the purpose of getting that which they needed. Let me read you a paragraph from one of these contracts:

They—

That is, the contractors—

also undertake, covenant, and agree with the United States of America, and do bind themselves, jointly and severally, as aforesaid, to be accountable and answerable in damages for the person to whom the said contractor shall commit the care and transportation of the mail—

They bind themselves to be responsible for all the misconduct of the carriers and all the misconduct of the subcontractors—and his careful and faithful performance of the obligations assumed herein, and those imposed by law, not to commit the care or transportation of the mail to any person under sixteen years of age; to discharge any carrier of said mail whenever required so to do by the Postmaster-General.

Now mark this, please. They bind themselves—not to transmit by themselves, or either of them, or either of their agents, or be concerned in transmitting commercial intelligence more rapidly than by mail; not to carry, otherwise than in the mail, letters, packets, or newspapers which should go by mail.

You will observe, gentlemen of the jury, the character of that stipulation of the contract. You will observe what they bind the contractor to do. He shall not carry any commercial intelligence more rapidly than the mail carries it. If a stage is running over one of these routes and the proprietor of that stage line is carrying the mail, he shall not carry any commercial intelligence more rapidly than the mail is carried; and if the mail is going over that route at a speed of a hundred hours for a given distance and he is running a stage over that same route in sixty hours, he is not permitted to carry commercial intelligence any more rapidly than he carries the mail. Now, gentlemen of the jury, do you not see that the people were deeply interested in having these mails carried as speedily as the commercial necessities of the country required them to be carried? How were they to get those privileges? How were they to get this commercial intelligence? They were required to get it through the mail, for if the party himself carried it he could not carry it any faster than the mail. How then, I ask you, were the business men living along these various routes to get their commercial intelligence as speedily as they needed it, otherwise than by pointing out to the Government that these mails were slow, and that they were getting their commercial intelligence tardily? Inasmuch as the Government would not allow it to be carried any faster than the mail was carried, therefore they were obliged to go to the Government, and say, "Give us a faster mail." So you see that the very provisions that they put in these contracts compelled these people to petition the Government, which would not allow a private carrier to bring their mail to them, to give them speedy mails.

Now, gentlemen, I pass next to the consideration of ROUTE 40113, FROM TRES ALAMOS TO CLIFTON.

That was a route one hundred and ninety-seven miles in length which was let for one trip on a schedule of eighty-four hours. I will not take the trouble, gentlemen of the jury, to point out to you on the map this route from Tres Alamos to Clifton. You will remember from the testimony that it connected the various military posts. You remember from the testimony that Tres Alamos is on the Southern Pacific Railroad. You remember that Wilcox is a station on the Southern Pacific Railroad; that this Southern Pacific Railroad as it progressed ran right over this star route and finally reached Wilcox. You remember now, when the railroad reached Wilcox, the star route was terminated at Wilcox and thereby that much of this star route service was abandoned or discontinued.

Mr. BLISS. Mr. Wilson, I think there is no evidence that the railroad ran over any portion of the star route in connection with Wilcox. When the railroad was completed Wilcox turned out to be a station.

Mr. WILSON. If the gentleman will turn to the testimony of Mr. Ray P. Eaton he will find that I have stated it exactly as it is.

Mr. BLISS. I think not.

Mr. WILSON. Just exactly as it is, and I beg that some of my associates who are to follow me will take up that testimony and read it if there is any dispute about it.

The COURT. Whose testimony is it?

Mr. WILSON. The testimony of Ray P. Eaton, the inspector of the Post-Office Department, who was out there looking after this business. On the 3d of June, 1879, two trips were added, and it was expedited from eighty-four to forty hours from the 16th of June, 1879. You remember now, gentlemen, the order was made on the 3d of June, to take effect on the 16th of June, 1879. On what was that done? Has anybody attacked any petition, any letter in respect of that route?

Mr. KER. We attacked three.

Mr. WILSON. What three?

Mr. KER. 9 O, 11 O, and 12 O.

Mr. WILSON. Here is 9 O, gentlemen. I will read it to you:

Hon. T. J. BRADY,

Assistant Postmaster-General:

The undersigned, military officers of Camp Grant, Arizona, and citizens of the same place, beg most earnestly to urge that you immediately order upon the route from Tres Alamos to Clifton a daily mail with a fast schedule. We ought to have better mail facilities, and we believe if you were cognizant with all the facts you would at once order a daily service.

Hoping that you will consider this petition immediately and favorably,

We are, respectfully,

A. K. ARNOLD,
Major Commanding, Fort Gray.

Look at it, gentlemen of the jury [exhibiting petition to jury]. Not a suspicion that a single signature to that petition is a fraudulent signature; not one. Look at the writing of the body of it as it passes around.

Mr. KER. Stephen W. Dorsey.

Mr. WILSON. Stephen W. Dorsey what?

Mr. KER. Wrote that petition.

Mr. WILSON. You say Stephen W. Dorsey wrote that petition. By whom do you prove it?

Mr. KER. By Rerdell.

Mr. WILSON. By Rerdell, gentlemen. Is that attacking that petition?

Mr. BLISS. It is undenied by Dorsey on the stand.

Mr. KER. It is undenied. Rerdell says he saw him write it in April, 1879.

Mr. WILSON. There it is, gentlemen. After you have looked at that petition and seen it for yourselves they say to you that Brady ought to have known Stephen W. Dorsey wrote it. You do not know to-day, gentlemen of the jury, that Stephen W. Dorsey wrote it. All that you know upon this subject is what Rerdell said about it, and the first that was ever known was when Rerdell swore to it. They say that Stephen W. Dorsey did not deny it. I am not prepared to say, gentlemen of the jury, whether the question was asked him or not. My recollection is that the question was not asked him; but if it had been, he could not have told. However, that is neither here nor there for the purposes of my argument. There were all these people petitioning for this service. Suppose Dorsey did write it; what of it? Hadn't he the right to write it? Has not this court said he had the right to write it? What is there in it? Now, let us take the next petition they say they attack. Here it is:

Hon. D. M. KEY,
Postmaster-General:

SIR: We ask leave to present this, our petition, for an increase of mail from Tres Alamos to Clifton, from one trip to three times a week.

This line runs a long distance along the Gila River, and has seven offices distributed on it, including the terminals.

It supplies a large mining population, which is constantly increasing, as well as the agricultural sections on the Gila River. Camp Grant is also on this route, and this is the only source of supply.

We are satisfied that if you will investigate this matter you will order an increase and direct the carrier to make faster time.

Hoping our petition will receive immediate action, we are, &c.

Then follow the signatures. I see that one of the signers is the pastor of a church. Look at that petition, gentlemen. [Exhibiting petition to jury.] It is 11 O.

Mr. KER. Written by John A. Sibbald, Dorsey's secretary.

Mr. WILSON. He says it is written by John A. Sibbald, Dorsey's secretary. Suppose it is, gentlemen of the jury, what of it? Is it possible that a Second Assistant Postmaster-General is to be condemned because he did not know who wrote the body of a petition, when every signer to that petition is an honest signer, and nobody pretends that it is otherwise? Is it possible that Stephen W. Dorsey, conceding that he had it written, is to be condemned because he wrote a truthful petition? I will show you in a moment that it is a truthful petition. Here is another one they attacked, 12 O:

Hon. D. M. KEY,
Postmaster-General:

SIR: We ask leave to present this, our petition, for an increase of mail from Tres Alamos to Clifton from one trip to three times a week. This line runs for a long distance along the Gila River, and has seven offices distributed on it including the terminals. It supplies a large mining population, which is constantly increasing, as well as the agricultural section on the Gila River.

Camp Grant is also on this route, and is the only source of supply. We are satisfied that if you will investigate this matter you will order an increase and direct the carrier to make faster time.

[Exhibiting petition to jury.] There are the signatures to that petition they say they attacked. What is the ground for attacking this petition? That somebody else other than some man who signed it wrote the body of it. Is that the vital question? I want to call your attention to those indorsements.

Mr. KER. James W. Donnelly wrote that petition.

Mr. WILSON. I don't care who wrote it. The question is, is it true?

Mr. KER. No.

Mr. WILSON. He says that the statements in this petition are not true. Let us see whether they are true or not. Gentlemen of the jury, let me turn to the indorsement on petition 12 O. Here it is:

Respectfully referred to the Post-Office Department with the recommendation that this increase be made.

JOHN G. CAMPBELL,
Delegate.

11 O is indorsed:

The within petition is based upon good reasons, and I hope the department will order the increase.

JOHN G. CAMPBELL,
Delegate.

These petitions in that form are unassailed as to the integrity of the names upon them and the integrity of the men who are represented by those names; unassailed except that now the counsel for the Government say that these petitions are not true. We will see whether they are true or not, gentlemen of the jury. I have here a letter from a gentleman who happens to be United States attorney for New Mexico. Let us see what he says about it. I read from page 1798:

SANTA FÉ, N. MEX., May 15, 1878.

Hon. D. M. KEY,
Postmaster-General:

SIR: I would respectfully beg leave to call your attention to the needed mail facilities between New Mexico and Arizona on account of the rapid settlement of each. For years the ranches of the Rio Grande Valley have supplied Southern and Eastern Arizona with produce, and this demand is daily growing more important. The business transacted between the two Territories is so rapidly increasing as to demand increased mail facilities, and my attention has been called to the inadequacy of the service on mail route between Clifton and Tres Alamos, Ariz. It is claimed that the Gila River settlements at present have a business along said route to justify a daily service, and that the present weekly is wholly inadequate to supply the wants of the settlers along the line. If it is possible for your department to increase the service on said route and order fast time on same, it would greatly benefit the people along the line for you to do so.

Hoping you may be able to benefit the section of country referred to by supplying increased service with fast time on said route,

I have the honor to remain, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

SIDNEY M. BARNES,
United States Attorney for New Mexico.

Now, there is a high Government official saying in substance what is said in these petitions.

Mr. KER. What has New Mexico to do with Arizona?

Mr. WILSON. These gentlemen ask, what has New Mexico to do with Arizona? Why, Mr. Sidney M. Barnes has just told you what New Mexico had to do with Arizona. My Brother Ker thinks there is no place on this earth except Pennsylvania, unless it might be Philadelphia, and he never has had a mind broad enough to get outside of the State of Pennsylvania, except when he came over here to Washington to try this star-route case.

Mr. BLISS. What does the evidence show as to any connection between Arizona and Santa Fé?

Mr. WILSON. Shall I read Sidney M. Barnes's letter again?

Mr. BLISS. The evidence of the witnesses on the stand.

Mr. WILSON. Oh, gentlemen of the jury, these gentlemen are trying this case upon what they bring there before you now. I am trying this case upon what General Brady had before him. These gentlemen do not seem to be able to appreciate the difference between the two. They do not seem to be able to comprehend that if his honor here tried a case and decided it upon testimony before him and decided it in good faith, that if afterward somebody came in and showed something that contradicted some of the testimony that may have been before his honor, that therefore his honor is not to be condemned for having made a wrong decision. That is the way they are trying this case. I am arguing this case now, you will understand, and I told you so at the beginning of going over these routes, upon what Brady had before him, and which I present to you, and not what these gentlemen have by their drag-nets hauled in before this jury. Here is another letter:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., April 16, 1879.

Hon. D. M. KEY,
Postmaster-General:

SIR: I have the honor to call your attention to the inadequate mail service on route 40113, from Tres Alamos to Clifton, Ariz., and to request that the service on this route be increased to at least three times a week and on a shorter schedule. The mail over this route is supplied from the main route running west, and which is a daily mail; and it is certainly a hardship to those dependent on this route to have their mail only once a week. There are now, including the terminal offices, eight post-offices on this route, and I trust you will see the urgent necessity of ordering the increase asked for.

Very respectfully,

JOHN G. CAMPBELL,
Delegate.

They say these petitions, written as they claim by Dorsey, by Kellogg, and by Sibbald, are not true. Here is a letter dated the 10th of March, 1879:

SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C.:

SIR: I respectfully call your attention to mail route No. 40113, between Tres Alamos and Clifton, Ariz. The contract heretofore has sub'd for three and six months. The latest contract was sub'd for a period of three months, from February 1 to April 1. The general opinion of the public is that the contractor will fail to make another subcontract in time to carry the regular mails from April 1.

Now, why was this postmaster thus particular to call attention to the fact that these short subcontracts were being made? It was because of his fear that something would happen to prevent the mail from being carried, as you will see in a moment.

Public opinion rises from the following facts: J. W. Dorsey, the original contractor, contracted with the Post-Office Department to carry said mail between Tres Alamos and Clifton, at $1,400 per annum; the said contractor has made a subcontract with L. M. Wood, at the rate of $2,600 per annum. As there was some little trouble at the beginning of this, the first quarter, about said contract, I feel anxious about the subcontract. Under the present circumstances it does not appear as if the contract will be successfully carried out. In case of a failure of contractors, please direct what course I shall pursue in the matter. The mail is increasing very much lately between Tres Alamos and Clifton. It would be a serious drawback to citizens and Government officials should the mail be stopped for a week or so.

Oh, once-a-week service is good enough for these gentlemen. Once a week will do for these Government prosecutors; but this postmaster tells you it would be a serious inconvenience and a detriment to the people living there if it should happen to stop for even a week or so:

Something should be done to secure the transportation of the mail should the present contractor fail.

Here he was anticipating this matter because of what? Because of the importance of that mail. They say it was not needed, and I read you this letter which they have put in testimony for the purpose of showing you that the mail was needed there, and just such a mail as was given to them by my client. Here is a letter dated the 6th of May, 1879, which we had to put in evidence as they left it out:

Hon. D. M. KEY,

Postmaster-General, Washington, D. C.:

SIR: I have the honor to respectfully ask your attention to the postal arrangements of the Government here, which are inadequate to the wants of this post and the citizens living adjacent thereto, one weekly mail between this and Camp Grant, over a long and circuitous route, being our only regular communication with the outside world. It is so indirect that very nearly two days are occupied in its transit between the two points, a distance of less than fifty miles. In my opinion (which is concurred in by all the officers at this station), the interests of the public would be greatly benefited by the establishment of a daily mail, or at least a tri-weekly one, to the distributing office of this district, over a line more expeditious than now used. Greater facilities would, I think, in this instance be accompanied by increased receipts, which would counterbalance the additional expense thereby incurred.

The country in this vicinity is being steadily settled up, and would seem to demand from the department more consideration than has hitherto been extended to it.

I am, very resp'ly, y'r ob't ser't,

M. H. STACEY,

Capt. 12th Inf'y, Bvt. Lieut. Col., U. S. A., Com'd'g Post.

Then follows another one on the 23d of May:

Hon. THOS. J. BRADY,

2nd Asst. P. M. General, Washington, D. C.:

SIR: Owing to constant increase of population along the mail route from Tres Alamos to Clifton, by reason of the mining and farming interests, and for the convenience of the post of Fort Grant, I would respectfully recommend an increase of mail facilities to a daily mail. At present we are supplied with but only one regular mail per week by the Post-Office Dept., which is inadequate to the wants of the citizens and soldiers along this route.

Hoping that the department will favorably consider this application, I remain, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. K. ARNOLD,

Major 6th Cavalry, Command. Post of Fort Grant.

Then follow after that, gentlemen, petitions to the same effect, signed by a very large number of people. You remember, gentlemen of the jury, that all these were before the Post-Office Department when the orders were made. I come now to one I want especially to call to your attention:

CAMP GRANT, ARIZONA, Dec. 28, 1880.

Hon. THOMAS J. BRADY,

Second Asst. P. M. General:

SIR: The mail route, 40113, from Tres Alamos to Clifton, should be curtailed to embrace and begin at Wilcox, omitting Tres Alamos, decreasing distance 28 miles.

There is great need of a daily mail on this route from Wilcox as far as Camp Thomas, a distance of 67 miles.

Great need of a daily mail, gentlemen; mark that.

The route supplies a very fine stock country, in which are a great many ranches, besides the military posts, whose mail is large and important, and should by all means be extended to Globe, by San Carlos Indian Agency, daily.

On former occasions I have urged the establishment of service from Camp Thomas by San Carlos to Globe, a distance of 70 miles, and I now respectfully renew the recommendation.

The business of Globe and San Carlos is principally with the East, and the mail for those points should leave the railroad at Wilcox, saving in distance at least 100 miles, and over one of the best natural roads in the country, instead of being packed over the mountains from Florence.

Norton & Stewart run a tri-weekly line of four-horse coaches from Wilcox to Camp Thomas via Camp Grant, and a buckboard from Thomas to Globe, but will put on coaches the entire distance if service be ordered.

Globe is an old mining camp, and contains nearly 3,000 persons; has fifteen large stores, one bank, and two weekly newspapers, but until recently has not kept apace with the times, partly because of lack of proper mail facilities and of the great and rapid development of the Tombstone district.

See how these things spread, ramify, and work into each other.

Recently, however, eastern capitalists have turned their attention to Globe, the result of which is largely increased business and the consequent demand for increased mail facilities.

This should and will be the important route into the Globe district, and whatever may be the merits of the Tucson or Florence routes, there can be no question but this, in point of business importance and in economy of service, is vastly superior.

It would be more advantageous to the department if the whole line could be operated as one route with a schedule of 28 hours' running time; but if not that, a schedule of 14 hours from Thomas to Globe should be required.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

RAY P. EATON,

a man sent out by the department to look after the mail service in that region of country, who traveled over it, and made this special report to the department in respect of this very thing. But that is not all, gentlemen. We have now this in the case:

RAILWAY MAIL SERVICE,
OFFICE OF SUPERINTENDENT OF 8TH DIV.,
Tucson, A. T., Dec. 21st, 1880.

HON. THOS. J. BRADY,
2d Ass't P. M. General, Washington, D. C.:

SIR: I would respectfully recommend that route No. 40113, Tres Alamos to Clifton, be changed to begin at Wilcox instead of Tres Alamos, decreasing distance thirty (30) miles. The mail for this route now leaves the railroad at Wilcox. A post-office has been established at Wilcox, and the postmaster expects to receive his mail key in a very few days.

Now, gentlemen, I am not going to take more of your time in discussing the necessity for this service. We have the testimony of Mr. Ray P. Eaton.

But you recollect that there were nine sacks of mail on that route, and you recollect what General Sherman told you as to the importance of having mail facilities out there. Here was this San Carlos Indian Agency, and here were all these military posts—this route running right into that nest of Government posts. You have not merely these petitions and letters from the officials of the Government urging this upon the department, but you have the testimony of one of the Government's agents, who is brought upon the stand here and swears before you as to the large mail that went over that route, and the importance to that section of country of having these mail facilities.

Q. What, if anything, did you observe at Fort Grant with reference to the mails, or at any other point along that line, with reference to the amount of mail matter carried over it?—A. There was a great deal of mail matter going over it—a number of bags. I think I counted nine in one day. [Page 3334.]

Now, gentlemen, just see how General Brady has all the time been making this service conform, as I said a day or two ago, to the changed condition of affairs. Here is McKusick, whose letter I last read to you, with reference to the post-office at Wilcox. That was the point to which, as you will remember, the Southern Pacific Railroad had been extended. You will recollect that Mr. Eaton tells you that there was some little trouble about getting the railroad to carry the mail. Why? Because they were not running their regular trains, but were only running their construction trains and did not want to carry it. But they got the railroad company to carry it out as far as Wilcox, and just as soon as he could, as the order shows—which I will not stop to read—he cut off this Tres Alamos and Clifton route at Wilcox, saving that twenty-eight miles. Now look at that case, gentlemen of the jury, and it is about a fair specimen. Look at the testimony of General Sherman, the testimony of Major Eaton, look at all these petitions, and then say, if you can, that General Brady has done anything there that he was not entirely justifiable in doing; and say, if you can, that Stephen W. Dorsey, even if he procured every one of these petitions, letters, and reports to be written, made, and sent to the department, had done anything that was wrong in respect of this matter. Why, is a man to be condemned because he aids the people in getting that which they need, and because he aids the Government in getting that which it needs? Here is a remarkable spectacle, gentlemen of the jury. These military officers, United States attorneys, and post-office inspectors recommending the Post-Office Department to do this thing, and then the Government coming here and prosecuting its officers for doing what its officers recommended it to do. That is the attitude of this case.

No. 38140, TRINIDAD TO MADISON.

This route was forty-five miles long; was advertised and let at once a week.

One of the objections to this is that Raton was put on this route instead of supplying it from Pulaski. What I am going to say now, gentlemen of the jury, is not a repetition of what I said about Raton a while ago. I will not stop to produce that map again before you. I apprehend you recollect something of the nature of that country. Their point is this, that he put Raton on this route from Trinidad to Madison instead of supplying it from Pulaski. Perhaps I can, without using the map, recall it to your minds. You recollect the railroad came down to a point called Pulaski and ran around to Trinidad. You recollect that Trinidad was the county-seat. You recollect that Raton was about twelve miles from Pulaski on the railroad. And you will also recollect that putting Raton on this particular route increased the distance about twenty or twenty-two miles. And you will, therefore, see that Pulaski on the railroad was a nearer point to Raton. The mail would have traveled about twelve miles by going from Pulaski down to Raton, and about twenty-two miles going from Trinidad out to Raton. They say that he ought to have supplied that post-office from Pulaski; that it would have cost less to make a special supply.

Now, let me go back and repeat what I said in the beginning of my argument as to the mode of supplying these new post-offices. There are two ways of doing it. One is by a special supply, and in that case you can only pay two-thirds of the salary of the postmaster to the carrier. That is to say, if the postmaster at Raton had undertaken to supply his office from Pulaski by a special supply, he could only pay the carrier two-thirds of the amount of his (the postmaster's) salary. You have it in evidence before you by the postmaster himself that his salary was somewhere from $12 to $16 a year. I would like to find the man—or rather, I would not like to find the man, for I think he would be a fit subject for an insane asylum—who would undertake to supply the mail from Pulaski to Raton, eight miles, once a week, for a whole year, for two-thirds of $12 to $16. Could you find a man to do it? No, gentlemen. You could not extend the route from Pulaski down to Raton. And why? Because that was a railroad route, and you could not build a railroad down there so as to supply Raton by railway mail service.

What was left to be done, then? You could not do it by a special supply, because nobody could be found who would carry it for the compensation. What was to be done? Why, put it on this route from Trinidad to Madison, almost in the line of which it lay. That is the only way that it could be done.

Now, gentlemen, this affords me an opportunity to illustrate the character of this prosecution and the manner in which the testimony in this case is distorted and perverted to pernicious purposes. How many times did these gentlemen tell you that Teller had recommended this to be put on from Pulaski, and that DeBusk had recommended it to be put on from Pulaski? And they said, although Teller recommended, and although DeBusk recommended, Brady disregarded their recommendations and put it on this route, making it cost the Government more money, and that is an indication that he was in the conspiracy. That is the way they have argued this to you. Gentlemen of the jury, I want to read you DeBusk's letter and Teller's indorsement on it, at page 1027:

RATON, LAS ANIMAS COUNTY, COLORADO,
September 18, 1878.

To the POSTMASTER-GENERAL:

DEAR SIR: A post-office was established at this place in March last, and I was appointed postmaster. This office was established to accommodate the lowermost section of a rich valley thirty-five miles in length, extending eastward from the town of Trinidad, but no mail service has yet been ordered.

Recollect that it was established in March, and this was written in September, and no mail service had yet been ordered.

The community to be accommodated has for two years past received their mail from Trinidad, twenty-two miles distant, in a private sack at great inconvenience.

The people here (cattle men mostly) have business transactions to the extent of certainly not less than $50,000 annually.

Now you are not going to say, gentlemen of the jury, that they did not need a mail.

They have one school and church building, costing $2,000; one high-school, fifty-one pupils enrolled; one resident clergyman; well-improved farms, with Government title, etc.

That was that community, gentlemen of the jury. These gentlemen say that because these men did not live in Philadelphia or New York, although they did have a school, a church building, and a high-school, and were doing a business of $50,000 annually, they ought not to have any mails; and especially they ought not to have any mails unless they could find some fellow who would carry it for two-thirds of $12 or $16 a year.

The newly-finished branch of the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railroad passes within ten miles of Raton post-office. Pulaski post-office is twelve miles distant from Raton, and directly on this line of railroad.

Recollect, as I said, Pulaski was off to the north, and the railroad circled around and came down to Trinidad. Do not forget that.

The object of this communication—

Now I come to the point I am after, gentlemen—is to petition for mail service twice a week, if not from any central point to Raton, at least from Pulaski post-office, on the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railroad, to Raton, a distance of twelve miles.

Very respectfully,

S. W. DEBUSK,
Postmaster.

CENTRAL CITY, COLO., September 23, 1878.

Respectfully requested that prayer of this petition be granted, and the service increased as asked for.

H. M. TELLER.

Now, gentlemen, what did this postmaster ask them to do? He said to them, "If you cannot give us this mail from a central point to Raton, then pray give it to us from Pulaski." They wanted their mail from a central point; that is what they were driving at. What was that central point? They had been getting their mail for two years at great inconvenience, by private conveyance from Trinidad, their county-seat, and Mr. DeBusk told you on the witness-stand that the county-seat was the point at which was concentrated all the business of that region. There is where their business was; there is where they did their trading; and they wanted it to that central point, their county-seat; that is where they wanted it, if they could get it, but if they could not get it from there they wanted it from Pulaski. They could not get it from Pulaski, as I have shown you, because nobody could be found who would give them this special supply for the amount of money that the postmaster could agree to pay for it. And hence, and properly, as I am sure you will say, this post-office was put on this route as the only practical mode by which this service could be rendered.

And yet these gentlemen come here and say to you that because that was done, Brady must have been in a conspiracy to get his share of the increased pay that would result from the lengthening of that route for about twenty-two miles.

Now, gentlemen, that was expedited, but I am not going to stop to read you the petitions. Here are letters from Belford, from Chaffee, and nine or ten others, asking that this thing be done, and the Post-Office Department did it. My client made the order, and I say he did right in making it, and if he did right in making it, then, gentlemen of the jury, you cannot condemn him for doing that which was right.

Now let us go to

NO. 46132, JULIAN TO COLTON.

I want to hurry through this just as rapidly as I can.

This route was one hundred and twenty miles long; was advertised and contracted for at once a week; increased to two trips a week; and expedited from fifty-four to twenty-six hours.

And this case, gentlemen of the jury, serves to illustrate something of the methods of this prosecution. Here is a very novel objection made to the conduct of General Brady in respect of that matter. There were a large number of petitions. I will simply read one, found at page 1814:

To the Hon. D. M. KEY,

Postmaster-General, Washington, D. C. :

The undersigned, citizens of California, respectfully represent that route from Colton to Julian, No. 46132, is a very important route. It is the only communication from the rich mines at its southern terminus to the Southern Pacific Railroad, and more frequent and more rapid mail communication is necessary.

That a new road has been opened from the San Jacinto Valley, and the same is being rapidly settled. That route, number 46130, has no railroad communications, and that by this change close connection will be made.

We therefore petition that the service on that route be made tri-weekly, and that the schedule be reduced from the present running time to thirty-six hours.

Then there is another petition recommending the same thing. Mr. Newton Booth, a Senator, says on the same page:

UNITED STATES SENATE CHAMBER,
Washington, April 10, 1877.

Hon. D. M. KEY,
Postmaster-General:

DEAR SIR: I respectfully ask your favorable consideration of the inclosed petitions for increase of service on mail route 46132, from Colton to Julian, in California.

Your obedient servant,

NEWTON BOOTH.

I concur in the above recommendation.

J. T. FARLEY.

Then follows a petition or two, and then this:

To the Hon. THOMAS J. BRADY,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General:

DEAR SIR: We, postmasters on routes 46130 and 46132, respectfully recommend above increase of service on mail route 46132 as necessary, in order to make connection at Temecula with route 46130, and for the accommodation of the business interests of parties on the routes.

That is signed by the postmasters along the line, with one or two blanks.

Now what is the objection to this, gentlemen? I am not going into a discussion of the question as to the necessity of the service, for what I have already said with reference to these other routes is equally applicable to this. But what is the main objection to this, and the one about which there has been the most talk? Why, they say that these petitioners ask for thirty-six hours and Brady made it twenty-six hours. So they say that there must have been something wrong about that; that that reduction of ten hours could not have occurred unless there was some fraud lurking around in this thing somewhere; and, gentlemen, they paraded before you this paper (6 P) and I will read it:

CHICO SPRINGS, NEW MEXICO, December 30, 1878.

Hon. THOS. J. BRADY,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General:

SIR: I hereby offer to carry the mail on route 46132, Colton to Julian, once a week, on a reduced schedule of twenty-six hours—

It was originally written thirty-six hours—for an additional compensation of $1,782 per annum, being less than pro rata; or three trips per week, and reduce schedule of thirty-six hours, for an additional compensation of $7,722 dollars per annum, being less than pro rata for expedition, and pro rata for additional trips.

Respectfully,

JOHN M. PECK.

That was originally written to conform to the petitions that had been made. Now, what happened in respect to that, gentlemen? Why, they made an offer to do this work for so much money less than it would be according to the affidavit they had filed as to the men and horses. Now, Brady made the order for twenty-six hours, and for precisely the same pay. Whenever you reduce the schedule, whenever you shorten the time, you increase the pay. Here they offered to do it for a certain amount of money in thirty-six hours, but he made them do that for the same money in twenty-six hours. Now, how did he defraud the Government in that respect, gentlemen of the jury? He simply got that mail through there ten hours sooner for precisely the same money that they had offered to do it for on the longer schedule of thirty-six hours. Now, how did he cheat the Government in that respect? I can see, gentlemen of the jury, and I think you will see, just exactly how that "twenty" happened to be written in there. [6 P handed to the jury.]

Look at the ink with which it was written. The word "thirty" is stricken out and "twenty" written over it, and I think I will show to your entire satisfaction just how that happened to be done. This pale ink was written at a different time; there is no sort of doubt about it.

Listen to this letter from Mr. Miner, found on page 1824:

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 25, 1879.

J. CHAUNCEY HAYES,
San Luis Rey, Cal.:

DEAR SIR: Yours of 14th received. The telegraph got my message mixed, it seems, as it was written twenty-six. We tried hard to have schedule made thirty-six hours as petitioned for, but could not prevail on the department to make it so. We therefore had to accept twenty six hours. We are willing to pay you four thousand per annum for three-trip service twenty-six-hour schedule. If not satisfactory we will make some other arrangement.

Respectfully,

JNO. R. MINER.

Now, do you not see how that was done, gentlemen of the jury? Miner, or somebody else connected with the management of this route—I will take it for granted that it was Mr. Miner, as he was the man who was attending to this business in the department very largely—Miner had tried to get it upon a schedule of thirty-six hours for the pay they proposed, but Brady had said, "No, I won't do it;" and he compelled them to carry it for that money on a schedule of twenty-six hours. Now, if he were in any conspiracy with these gentlemen and they were mutually trying to get money from the Government, the needs of the country and the service being an outside consideration, do you suppose he would have been higgling with Miner to get that through in twenty-six hours instead of thirty-six? What would he have cared about that? They would have made more money on thirty-six hours than they would on twenty-six, because it costs more money to run a mail through in twenty-six hours than it does in thirty-six. But here is this conspirator conspiring against his coconspirators, according to the theory of these gentlemen, for they cannot talk about these defendants otherwise than as conspirators.

Mr. CRANE (foreman of the jury). What is the point they claim on that? I have forgotten.

Mr. WILSON. The point claimed was that they had altered that, and that Brady had made the schedule twenty-six hours when they only petitioned for thirty-six hours. That is their point on that. Now I say that he made it twenty-six in the interest of the Government and in the interest of the people.

Mr. BLISS. How about the affidavit? You are stating what we claim.

Mr. WILSON. I will come to those affidavits after a while, in the due course of time.

Mr. BLISS. All right.

Mr. WILSON. But what I want particularly to call your attention to is this: He simply says that he puts in his proposition for the thirty-six all the way through there, and when Brady would not take the thirty-six, then he wrote in the word "twenty" over "thirty," and so changed the proposition as to make it twenty-six instead of thirty-six hours, and for precisely the same sum.

Now, gentlemen, I come to ROUTE No. 46247, REDDING TO ALTURAS.

That route was one hundred and seventy-three miles long, advertised twice a week, and one trip was added, and on the 3d of December, 1878, it was increased to six trips a week and expedited from one hundred and eight to seventy-two hours.

Now, what was that done upon, gentlemen? It was done on a vast number of petitions, none of which are attacked. I am only going to give you just enough to illustrate the situation. I find this on page 1233:

To the honorable ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C.:

Application for mail service six times a week from Redding, Shasta County, California, to Alturas, Modoc County, California, is, in my opinion, a proper one at this time on account of the country traversed by said route, the settlements already made thereon, and the impetus it will give to the settlement of such an extensive country. For we know that people of means and intelligence are loth to emigrate to a country that is deprived of frequent and rapid communications with the old and thickly settled portions of the country.

Respectfully,

C. C. BUSH, Postmaster.

REDDING, August 17, 1878.

And this on page 1234:

To the honorable SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL:
Washington, D. C.:

We, the undersigned, citizens residing on mail route No. 46247, from Redding, Cal., to Alturas, Cal., respectfully petition for an increase of mail service on said route, increasing the service from three trips per week to six trips per week, believing the same to be necessary on account of the large increase of population on said route. All of which is most respectfully submitted.

It is indorsed:

I earnestly request that the prayer of the petitioners be granted.

J. K. LUTTRELL, M. C.,
Third Dist., Cal.

And this on the same page:

To the honorable SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C.:

We, the undersigned, citizens and residents on mail route No. 46247, from Redding, Cal., to Alturas, in California, respectfully petition to the Post-Office Department to reduce the time of schedule by expediting the time from one hundred and eight hours to seventy-two hours. We think by reducing the schedule would be a benefit to the Government by increasing of the mail on the above-named route. All of which is most respectfully submitted.

It is signed by a long list of petitioners, and is indorsed:

I request that the prayer of the petitioners be granted.

J. K. LUTTRELL, M. C.,
California.

And then follow a number of others, gentlemen of the jury, the concluding part of one of which is:

Your petitioners feel that in justice to the present and increasing wealth and population of this section that route No. 46247, from Redding to Alturas, should be increased to six trips per week, each way, and the time reduced to seventy-two hours between those points, and for which your petitioners will ever pray. [Page 1237.]

There are a number of others of a like character, which I will not take up your time to read.

At page 3239 is a significant petition:

REDDING, May 1st, 1880.

To the Hon. SECOND ASS'T POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C.:

We, the undersigned, citizens residing on mail route No. 46247, extending from Redding to Alturas, Cal'a, respectfully represent as follows: That the present route extends over and through a country that is increasing rapidly in population, and the amount of mails transported over said route is between 500 and 600 lbs. per day, and still increasing. That said route is numbered a distance of 179 miles in length, and a large portion of the residents and settlers of Southeastern Oregon obtain all their mail by this route. Wells and Fargo have a daily express and numerous offices on this route, and the facility thus afforded us for transmission of money is very beneficial, and that we view with alarm the order to reduce the mail service on said route from six (6) to three (3) times per week. Wherefore we, your petitioners, respectfully ask that said service be not reduced, but that the same be allowed and kept at least six times a week as heretofore.

And we, your petitioners, will, as in duty bound, ever pray, &c.

Here is another of like character, indorsed by Mr. Luttrell, M. C., and also by Senator Farley and by Mr. Wigginton. Then this, on page 3233 :

RAILWAY MAIL SERVICE,
OFFICE SUPERINTENDENT OF 8TH DIV.,
San Francisco, Cal., August 16th, 1880.

Hon. THOS. J. BRADY,

Second Ass't P. M. Gen'l, Washington, D. C. :

SIR: I desire to call your attention to service on the following routes, to wit: Route No. 46267, Willow Ranch to Reno ; six times a week. Route No. 46207, Susanville to Lake View ; six times a week. Route No. 46247, Redding to Alturas ; three times a week. This route is of more importance than all the rest, while route No. 46267 runs through a very sparsely settled country, almost without post-offices, and with small settlements, from fifty to one hundred miles apart. Again, we have a very singular condition of things by having six-times-a-week service from Alturas to Lake View by route No. 46207, while there is only three-times a-week service from Alturas to Redding, through a thickly settled country, with important post-offices along the entire line. I know of no reason why the service should have been reduced on route No. 46247, Redding to Alturas, and would therefore recommend that it be increased to six times a week. I will also add that this increase of service herein recommended has not been asked of me by the contractor, nor has it been petitioned for by the people along the line, to my knowledge, and I make these recommendations from my own personal knowledge of the situation.

Very respectfully,

H. J. McKUSICK, Sup't.

Mr. BLISS. Are not all those after the order? The order that was attacked was the order for expedition. Are they not weeks and months after ?

Mr. WILSON. Of course they are after. I have read these petitions—though I have not read the half of them—for the purpose of showing to you, gentlemen of the jury, that the people desired that service and that it was needed ; and we have the testimony of the man who carried the mail, in which he stated that there were from five hundred to six hundred pounds of mail going over that route. I read to you those petitions for the purpose of showing to you that General Brady was justified in making this order, because the condition of things demanded that it should be made ; and now I read you these which come after which confirm what was on the record at the time he made those orders, and that is why they are here. I am not pretending that these subsequent communications were communications that he had before him when the order was made, but I do contend this: That when it was proposed to cut down this service that had been thus increased and expedited, then came the protests from the people, the protests from the Senators and Representatives, and the protest from the superintendent of the railway mail service in that section. That is why I use it, and I presume that it was just simply because they do confirm these petitions that these gentlemen did not bring these things into the evidence in this case.

Mr. BLISS. Now, Mr. Wilson, I shall claim the right to correct you. We attacked that order for expedition because the mail was already being carried on fast time. We attacked the payment for expedition under such circumstances.

Mr. WILSON. If the gentleman had held his peace for just about a minute he would have seen that that is the very objective point to which I am coming, and the very thing I am going to answer in this case, and I think I will answer it to the satisfaction of this jury.

Major & Culverhouse were running a stage line over this route, and this proves exactly what I have been saying about that country. The condition of things in that country would not permit of Major & Culverhouse dragging their stage-coaches along there at two or three miles an hour. That would not answer the needs of that people any more than a train from here to New York at fifteen miles an hour would answer the demands of the people who travel over that road. Consequently, while this was one hundred and eight hours under the contract, Major & Culverhouse were hauling their stages through that country in sixty hours, and they had taken the subcontract from these contractors. There was no complaint about the way this was advertised and about the way the contract was let. Nobody attacks the integrity of this advertisement. But, acting upon the best light they had in the department, they advertised it at one hundred and eight hours and let the contract at one hundred and eight hours, and there was this stage-coach line going through in sixty hours. Of course they threw their mails upon these coaches that were going through in sixty hours, and that gave the Government the benefit of carrying the mails in sixty hours when they were only getting pay for carrying it in one hundred and eight hours. Who knew about that in the department? Have they brought anybody here who tells you they knew about that? No, gentlemen. On the contrary, when Mr. Major was on the stand we asked him the question "Did you communicate in any way to the department that you were running through there in sixty hours instead of one hundred and eight?" And he answered "Why, no." There was no information of that kind in the department. But here came all these petitions to the department saying, "You have contracted to carry this mail in one hundred and eight hours; now it ought to be sixty, or it ought to be seventy-two, or it ought to be reduced; this is not right, we ought to have these mails faster." Very well. These petitions all came in, and their request was granted. Now, these gentlemen say that because the subcontractor was already carrying at the speed to which it was expedited, and because the Government was getting that service for nothing, it was a fraud upon the Government to pay for this expedition. Any private individual who would do business in that way would be written down a rascal.

Mr. BLISS. Did the man who performed the service get the money, or did these parties here in Washington?

Mr. WILSON. You had fourteen days to discuss this case in the opening.

Mr. BLISS. You stated—

Mr. WILSON. [Interposing]. I do not care who got it; it makes no difference who got it. Why, gentlemen of the jury, the law itself contemplates that there may be subcontracts, and the law itself contemplates that the contractor may make a profit by letting his routes to the subcontractor.

Mr. BLISS. These parties made $18,000.

Mr. WILSON. I do not care how much it is. That is just the vice of this whole case—because a contractor makes some money by subletting his contract it is an evidence of fraud, according to their theory.

What does this subcontract law provide? Why, gentlemen, it provides that the subcontractor shall get his pay from the Government and the balance shall go to the contractor—thus contemplating that the man who takes the risk shall be permitted to make money out of this business. Why, is it not an amazing position that these gentlemen take in this case? Here is a contractor agreeing to carry the mail for four years, summer and winter, be responsible for it, pick it up whenever it is thrown down—and the subcontractor may throw it down whenever he pleases—and yet these gentlemen say that the man who does that shall take all this risk without any possibility of profit. And they find one case or two cases, or nineteen, if you please, out of one hundred and thirty routes, where the contractor makes some money by making advantageous contracts with subcontractors. But they take no account of the money that the contractor loses on the other of the one hundred and thirty routes outside of the nineteen. That is really the complaint on this Redding and Alturas route, I grant you. They say it was expedited when it was already being carried on fast time. It was already being carried on fast time, I grant you, gentlemen. It was being carried by the subcontractor in the time to which it was expedited, we will say, for I will not pretend to speak with precise accuracy about that, and the Government was getting the benefit of that fast service which these parties never contracted or agreed to make. They could have stopped any hour if they pleased; they could have put that five hundred or six hundred pounds of mail on a buckboard and hitched a couple of mules to it and carried it through in one hundred and eight hours. They could have done that at any time, and the Government could not have complained. Then the Government would have been compelled to expedite it; they could not help themselves, unless they had absolutely disregarded the needs of that country. And that is held up to you here as a badge of fraud and an indication of conspiracy.

I heard a man making a speech over here in the Post-Office Department one day when I happened to go in. He was just concluding his argument, and he wound it up by saying that if the Government of the United States could be resolved into an individual it could not keep out of the penitentiary for three weeks. And if this is the principle upon which its affairs are to be administered, as these gentlemen contend for, it ought to go to the penitentiary for the balance of its natural life. [Mr. Bliss here addressed a remark to Mr. Wilson which was inaudible to the stenographer.] It will be a long time before you get anybody into the penitentiary on account of this case.

I might elaborate this further, gentlemen, to show you the importance of this route, by calling your attention to the testimony showing the daily mails with which it connected; but why should I? You have heard the testimony. You know there were daily mails by rail and by stage on the various mail routes connecting with this, and you have heard read what these petitioners have represented to the department, and upon which it acted; and you have the additional fact that here was five hundred or six hundred pounds of mail matter daily going over that route.

I pass from that to ROUTE NO. 38113, RAWLINS TO WHITE RIVER.

This route was advertised as being one hundred and eighty miles long, but was subsequently ascertained to be one hundred and sixty-five. The contract was originally let for once a week. On the 1st of May, 1879, there was an order made increasing it to two trips. From the 12th of May, 1879, it was expedited from one hundred and eight to forty-five hours.

You, perhaps, notice, gentlemen, that this contract and others ran a long time before there was any change made in the service. If these parties had from the beginning been in a conspiracy to rob the Government they were a long time commencing operations, so far as this route is concerned, because the service went into operation on the 1st of July, 1878, and not until May, 1879, was there anything done in respect of changing the service on this route.

Now, let us see what were the considerations that moved Brady to make the order changing service. The prosecution say that it was the money that was to accrue to him. I say it was his consideration for the public welfare.

What was the situation as to this route? Rawlins is a station on the Union Pacific Railroad, and White River was an Indian agency, one hundred and sixty five miles down in the country. Congress made the mail route connecting Rawlins and White River. At White River this route did not connect with any other mail service. White River was simply an Indian agency, where the Ute Indians were stationed and where the troops were camped that held those Indians in subjection. There was a large number of troops there, and the only communication between that point and headquarters was over this mail route. When the mails were infrequent the Government had to establish a special service by couriers over that very route. When they got their mails once a week the Government itself could not afford to rely upon its own service. It could not be delayed in communicating between this post and headquarters by a mail that only ran once a week and on a slow schedule of time. It could not afford to do that, and therefore they carried their own mail by a courier line paid for by the Government of the United States.

Mr. BLISS. Is there any evidence that the courier line was established until after this order was made? Is it not the evidence, emphatically, that it was not until after the troops went in there and the trouble came about; long after this order was made? That is my recollection.

Mr. WILSON. I do not understand it that way, but I will even take it the way you state it. What does that show, gentlemen? Why, when the mails were interrupted they had to put on more service in some way or other. They had to have this communication. I only speak of it to show the importance of speedy and frequent communication with these Government posts. The gentlemen of the prosecution want you to say that once a week was often enough for the Government to hear from that important post, or to get a communication from the Indian Office or from the War Office to that place. They want you to say that when military orders or orders from the Indian Office or from the Secretary of the Interior reached Rawlins it was amply sufficient for them to go from Rawlins to White River in one hundred and eight hours. In other words, if General Sherman sent an important order by mail to that post at White River, or the Secretary of the Interior sent an important communication to the Indian agent at White River, it was all-sufficient for it to go by rail as fast as steam could carry it to Rawlins and then when it got to Rawlins it could lie over for a week, and go to White River in one hundred and eight hours. That is their theory in this case and that is the spirit in which they argue it. But that is not all they want you to say. They want you to say that if anybody thought one trip was not enough and that one hundred and eight hours was too long, that man must have been dishonest in that opinion, and that if he acted upon it, it is evidence that he was engaged in.

the commission of a crime, and especially they want you to think that is so if he was acting in an official capacity when he entertained that opinion. Gentlemen, let us see upon what it was that Brady acted: First, there was the known fact that this was a most important route, one upon which the Government was greatly interested in having frequent and speedy communication. That of itself was enough. That of itself was sufficient to justify it. But that is not all. I find a large number of petitions indorsed by Chaffee and Corlett and Teller and Patterson, and by county officers, and a recommendation from the governor of the State. To all that what is the reply? I am not going to read to you these petitions. You have heard them read. General Sherman recommended this also. What is the reply to all that, gentlemen of the jury? Rerdell went out there and got these people to make these recommendations. If they are true, what matters it who got them to do it? The question is not who got them to do it. The question is, do they state the truth? Here is what General Sherman says about this particular thing:

Q. Can you now state the facts that led you to make that recommendation? And by facts I mean the condition of the country at that time and the troops that it was occupied by.—A. The western half of Colorado at that time was occupied by Indians known as Utes. There were three distinct subdivisions of the Utes, one of which was called the White River Utes, having their agency at White River station or agency, under Agent Meeker and his family, under the Interior Department.

Mr. BLISS. Is not that petition with General Sherman's indorsement long after the order; months after the order?

Mr. WILSON. If you will hear me through you will see I am not misrepresenting.

Mr. BLISS. You take care not to state that fact.

Mr. WILSON. I have not stated anything yet. I was reading what Sherman says. If you know what I am going to say you can make your objection in advance.

Mr. Meeker was murdered, and his family were taken and known to be in the hands of these Indians. Cries for help came. Troops were immediately ordered there, and in the fight that resulted Major Thornburgh, of the regular Army, was killed, and I think others. Other troops were then ordered there to capture, destroy, or disperse the Indians. The nearest point of communication on the railroad was Rawlins station, I think, about one hundred and twenty-five to one hundred and thirty miles north of the old agency at White River. It required a considerable force to keep up communications back to the depot or railroad. So that every means to which we could resort to relieve our troops of that amount of labor was to our military interest, and, I thought, to the interest of the General Government. Therefore, when a petition came to me in this form, signed by some officers and many citizens, and which, on its face, appeared to ask a proper thing to be done, I indorsed it with great pleasure, believing it to be for the interest of the nation.

That is what he believed about it.

Q. You thought, at that time, that it was to the best interest of the country to have the trips increased, as asked for?—A. I thought it for the best interest of the country to have trips increased as often as possible, certainly daily. Establishing intermediate offices and stations, and incurring a like amount of expense chargeable against a different appropriation of the same Government saved us the necessity of sending couriers over the line.

Now, gentlemen, Colonel Bliss says to you that the expedition had been made before General Sherman indorsed that petition, and that what he recommended was an increase of trips. Ah, but Colonel Bliss forgets that when you increase the trips you increase those trips on the expedited time. So when he was asking for this multiplication of trips he was asking for it on a forty-five hour schedule, as it was then being run. Is not that a complete answer to his suggestion?

Mr. BLISS. My suggestion is that the indorsement was long after the order was made.

Mr. WILSON. Certainly, it was after the order was made. Here are a whole lot of petitions asking for this increase of speed, and it was granted. Now after that, General Sherman comes in and says, "We not only want three trips at forty-five hours, but we want six trips at forty-five hours." That is what he asks. Do you not see, gentlemen of the jury? Let us understand this, because that is the very point I am coming to. Let me show you what they say in the indictment about this:

And afterwards, to wit, on the eighth day of March, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighty-one, at the county and District aforesaid, and within the jurisdiction of the said court, the said Thomas J. Brady did fraudulently make, sign, and file in the said office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General a certain order in writing for increased and additional service in carrying and transporting the said mail on and over the said post route numbered 38113, and for the allowance of increased pay and compensation to the said contractor and subcontractor, without the said increase of service then being lawfully needed and required, as he, the said Thomas J. Brady, then and there well knew as aforesaid, and with intent thereby to defraud the said United States of America, and which said fraudulent order in writing is as follows, to wit:

"From April 1st, 1881, increase service to seven trips per week and allow contractor $18,275 per annum additional pay, being pro rata, and allow subcontractor $13,333 per annum additional pay, being pro rata."

Did he make any increase there? No, gentlemen. They say that the fraudulent order that he made was increase of trips; this very thing that General Sherman recommended they say was a fraudulent order; that it was not needed, and that Brady knew it was not needed. That is what they say in their indictment. If General Sherman's testimony is worth anything at all, it was not a fraudulent order. They say that it was not needed, and Brady knew it was not needed. If General Sherman's testimony is worth anything before this jury, it was needed, and that disposes of the question. But these gentlemen come back upon us and say, "Oh, well, that is pleaded as an overt act." It is a lie, if it is pleaded as an overt act. It is not true. But they say before that time he had increased the trips to two and had expedited the service, and "we have brought that to the attention of the jury so that the jury will see from it that he was engaged in a conspiracy." That is their argument. Now, gentlemen, the answer to that is to be found not merely in the petitions that were before the Second Assistant, and in the letters that were before the Second Assistant, but it is to be found in the testimony of their own witnesses that it was needed when it was made.

But they make another point. They say that the petitions asked for a schedule of eighty-four hours, whereas he reduced it to forty-five, and as a matter of course, that must have been a fraud. Mr. Turner was brought on the stand in respect of that. You recollect his testimony. He said that he first made up the jacket for eighty-four hours when he saw that these petitions asked for eighty-four hours, and he carried it to Brady and said, "This is nonsense. Here is a route one hundred and sixty-five miles long. They are carrying it in one hundred and eight hours, not two miles an hour, and if we expedite it to eighty-four hours it will amount to nothing. That is only two miles an hour." Brady said, "I will not do that. If we are going to expedite that route we will make a service that will be of some value to the Government and the people. That is what we will do. What would be a reasonable schedule on that route?" That is the way he and Turner ciphered this out to about four miles an hour, and settled down on about four miles an hour, which made a forty-five-hour schedule. Turner has told you that that was just how the thing happened. That further illustrates what I have said before in respect of like matters. I will not take up any more of your time on that branch of the case.

The COURT. It occurs to me just there to make a suggestion. A schedule of two miles an hour would allow the horses and carriers to rest at night, so that when they traveled in the day-time it would be four miles an hour.

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir; that is true.

The COURT. A schedule of four miles an hour would require them to travel night and day.

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir.

The COURT. So that is just the difference between carrying the mail at night or in the day-time.

Mr. WILSON. It is simply the difference of getting the mail through. If you drive a horse all day and let him rest at night he can go on the next day. If you travel all night you have got to have more horses, and then there is a difference in the cost. You get the mail through, but it costs more money to get it through; and the statute has provided a guide or put up a finger-board to direct the officers of the department in respect of the amount of money that is to be paid.

The COURT. You mean the regulation.

Mr. WILSON. I mean the regulation. The statute merely contemplates the same thing. The regulation is based upon the statute. Now, gentlemen, when that order was made on that route, can you say that it was not needed in the face of the testimony in this case? Can you say it was an improper order to make in the light of the testimony that was before the department when it was made, because that is the period to which you must resort for the purpose of determining upon the quality of the act which was done by the Second Assistant. Can you say that four miles an hour was too fast a speed at which to carry a mail which was to be freighted with communications from the headquarters of the military for an important post like that? I do not see, gentlemen of the jury, how you can say so. You recollect it was made three times a week, and it was expedited to forty-five hours, and then on the 8th of March, 1881, it was made seven trips a week. You remember that there was no expedition in this order, as I have just shown you from the indictment. I have called your attention to the petitions upon which that order increasing the service to seven trips was made. It seems to me that you must say with General Sherman that that was a proper thing to do. Undoubtedly if General Sherman had been the Second Assistant he would have made that order. They brought a witness here by the name of Smith, and I will read from his testimony, on page 1975:

Q. Now, this is a petition, Mr. Smith, on this route from Rawlins to Meeker, Colo. (White River). Did you sign a petition asking for seven times a week?—A. I presume I did.

Q. Were you asked to sign a petition to reduce the time to thirty-six hours?

By the way, I ought to have called your attention to that. They asked for thirty-six hours in that petition that Sherman indorsed, as I remember it.

A. I do not remember what the petition was. Whatever that petition says is there.

Q. Did you read this petition before you signed it?—A. I suppose I did. It is my writing.

Q. You wrote it yourself. [Reading:]

"To the honorable the SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,

Washington, D. C., Contract Office :

"SIR: We, the undersigned, citizens and residents of Rawlins, Wyo., and other points on mail route No. 38113, from Rawlins, Wyo., to Meeker, Colo. (White River), respectfully but urgently petition and pray that the mail service on said route No. 38113, from Rawlins, Wyo., to Meeker, Colo. (White River), be increased from three times per week to seven times per week, and if practicable that the running time be reduced from the present schedule to thirty-six (36) hours, thereby accommodating the demands and important business interest of the country to, from, and through which the route runs and connects, and allowing important correspondence to be answered by return trip from both ends of said route."

Did you believe it at that time to be true?—A. It was true.

Q. Was your action in it honest, so far as you remember?—A. It was.

Q. Did you, at that time, believe that you were representing the facts to the Post-Office Department?—A. It was after the Indian outbreak, when we had great need for mail service there.

Q. And you believed at that time that there ought to be seven trips a week?—A. I did.

Q. And that it ought to be run on thirty-six hours?—A. I will say, perhaps, there ought not to have been seven, but I believe it ought to have been quick time. But you hardly ever do get what you petition for.

They did not get what they petitioned for in this case because Brady did not give them thirty-six hours. He gave them trips, but did not change the route from a forty-five-hour schedule.

Q. You asked for all you wanted?—A. Yes, sir; all we could get.

Q. What do you mean about wanting mails on account of the Indian outbreak?—A. After the Ute war broke out there was a military post at White River, and there were a good many people there, and it made a large business on that route.

Q. You wanted to get the news from the soldiers?—A. We wanted the news, but the danger from the Indians was over at that time. There was quite an office there and quite a business between the two places.

Q. How many men were there at that time at the post?—A. I don't remember exactly now, but there must have been somewhere from eight hundred to twelve hundred soldiers.

Now, I pass to page 1994:

Q. When you were running the mail once a week, how large was it?—A. About one of these number-two sacks, two-thirds full, generally; that is, at that time. It has increased since then.

Q. About how much would it weigh?—A. Fifty or sixty pounds; may be seventy-five sometimes.

Q. Did the bulk of the mail go through over the route?—A. Coming out there was nothing but letters. Going down towards White River there was papers and merchandise, &c. Coming out the mail was light.

Q. There was more mail going from Rawlins to White River than from White River back?—A. Nothing but letters coming out towards the railroad.

Q. How large was the mail coming out?—A. Oh, it would not weigh over ten pounds besides the sack.

Ten pounds of letters. That is three hundred and twenty letters, or nearly a thousand letters a week, and then he tells you that when the service was increased the mail increased.

The COURT. Would you like to take a recess now?

Mr. WILSON. Perhaps we had better. It will take me some little time yet to get through with this route.

At this point (1 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) the court took its usual recess.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. WILSON. [Resuming.] Gentlemen of the jury, another objection that is put forward in respect of this particular route is that the mails did not make the proper connections all over this route. I have in another place attempted to show to you, as had already been shown to you by the testimony, how that was done, and if the proper connections were not made who was responsible for it? But as to this particular route as I remember it, one of the witnesses who testified, testified to the fact that the schedule of arrivals and departures was fixed by the postmasters at the terminal points. Without repeating what I have heretofore said on that subject you will see how little there is in that point as against my client, and how little there is on that point as against any of these defendants. These postmasters were the parties that the Government trusted to arrange these matters, and if they arranged them improperly that was their fault and not the fault of anybody else, and so I shall take no more of your time on that subject. They say there was a letter written down there to have these petitions returned before the 4th day of March, and they argued from that that it was anticipated that a new Administration was coming in and General Brady was going out, and they wanted to hurry it up so as to get the thing done before the new Administration came in. That is the inference they draw from it. I can draw another inference from that same state of facts that is just as reasonable and just as fair. There is no testimony that my client knew anything about any such letter having been written, none whatever. But if I were going to draw an inference from that letter I should draw this kind of an inference, that when there comes a change of Administration and a change of heads of departments there is a delay in the public business, and to avoid the consequences of that delay they wanted to get this thing done before the beginning of the incoming Administration. But I shall not take up any of your time in regard to that. This order that was made, was made by General Brady on the 8th day of March, as I remember. Mr. James had come to be Postmaster-General, and they say to you that he ordered Brady to revoke that order. There is a little discrepancy or conflict in the testimony just on that point. Perhaps I had better read Mr. James's testimony on that subject. The actual fact is that he did not order that revocation to be made by Brady. He spoke to French on the subject and he said that the next day Brady came in to see him about it, and they had a conversation on the subject, when he said that Brady asked him if economy was to be the policy or the rule of his administration, and he replied that it was, but he says distinctly, and repeats it over and over again, that he did not direct Brady in that conversation to revoke that order.

Q. Did you give such an order?—A. I told Mr. French I wished that order revoked.

Q. How long after that conversation was it that you saw General Brady?—A. The next day.

Q. Was it on the next day when you saw General Brady that the conversation you have given in evidence took place in which General Brady asked you, as you have testified, "Referring to that conversation with Mr. French yesterday, is economy to be the policy of your administration?"

Then there was an objection interposed.

Q. Was it in that conversation with General Brady that this conversation to which you have testified took place?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. That was the time?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was that order that you gave to French ever carried out by Brady?

Then there was another objection.

Q. Was the order that you gave to the Second Assistant's office, to revoke this order of March 8, carried out?—A. No, sir.

Q. When did you discover that it had not been?—A. Some time in September, I think.

Q. What did you then do?—A. The order was revoked.

Q. At that time?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What time did Mr. Brady leave the office?—A. I think in April.

Now, a little further along he says, in reply to this question :

You say that you had a conversation with Mr. French on one day?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And the next day you had a conversation with General Brady?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you tell General Brady to revoke that order?—A. I did not.

Then further along :

The journals were brought to you to be signed, were they not?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. As a matter of fact, you did not read them?—A. I read them generally, or had them read.

Q. Did you sign the drafts or warrants?—A. I did while I was there.

Q. Did you have those read?—A. No, sir.

Q. You would go right on and sign warrants for that identical route, would you?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You would go right on paying the eighteen thousand and odd hundred dollars a year without knowing it, would you?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. If the order did not appear in the journal you would not think about it?—A. I would not know that the order had been issued. The journal is simply a record of the proceedings of the Post-Office Department each day. It would have to be signed by the Postmaster-General, no matter what orders were in it, as I understand the law. It is simply a record of facts.

Q. If an order had been omitted you might notice it and you might not?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. In other words, the business of the office is so immense that you have to depend on others; is that so or not?—A. That is true.

Q. Would it be possible for you to read every warrant and every order and every draft and every paper brought to you to be signed?—A. It would be a physical impossibility, sir.

Q. You would be obliged to take somebody's word?—A. You have to trust somebody.

Q. You have to trust your subordinates?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Otherwise it would be impossible to do the business?—A. Yes, sir.

Then, again :

A. My order to revoke was given to French.

Q. And afterwards you had this conversation?—A. The conversation with General Brady was the next day. That is a fact. You must draw your own conclusions.

They have argued this case, gentlemen of the jury, as though that order to revoke had been given to General Brady and he did not revoke it, and that therefore there was something wrong in respect of what he was doing. That is the argument. Mr. James tells you that he had that conversation with French, and that when Brady called to see him the next day he did not order him to revoke it, and there is no evidence in this case that he ever did order him to revoke it. Mr. James and General Brady differ as to the time of this conversation. General Brady says that some time after the time fixed by Mr. James, a month afterwards, he was in there, and the matter of these orders was brought up; that he went there because Mr. James wrote him a note on that subject, which note he produced in evidence before the jury. As a matter of course, nobody is going to say in this case—certainly I am not—that Mr. James told anything other than exactly the way he recollected this thing. I am not going to contend anything of that sort. But it is the easiest thing in the world, gentlemen, for men to be mistaken. We are often mistaken in our understanding of things, conscientiously and honestly mistaken, and if this case turned upon this very point you would see that here is a conflict in the testimony, one man understanding that a thing occurred on a particular day, and another man coming and saying it did not occur then at all, and it was not what this prosecution is seeking to make it out to be at all, because they are claiming that he gave General Brady an order to revoke it, when he says himself he did not.

Mr. BLISS. We never have claimed that he gave the order to Mr. Brady. We claim that he gave the order to French, and the next day in consequence of that, as showing that Brady had talked with Mr. French, he came to Mr. James. That is our claim.

Mr. WILSON. Gentlemen, you see there is simply an inference drawn. There is not any proof at all that Mr. French ever communicated that to Brady. If it had been communicated to Brady, French could have proven that fact and you would not have been left to inference. They have begged you to consider that at various times we have not put witnesses on the stand when we could have put them on the stand. Now, gentlemen, here is a case. Let me turn it right back upon these gentlemen. Here is a case where they are attempting to fix improper conduct upon General Brady by saying, "James communicated it to French and the next day Brady had a conversation with James." We say that that thing occurred a month afterward. They say that the next day he had a conversation with James, but nobody proved that French ever said one word to Brady about it. Nobody proved that French ever told Brady that James had spoken of this matter to him. Nobody proved that. These gentlemen say they want you to infer that he did. Now, if it was an important fact in this case they ought to have proven that fact when the testimony was available to them. If it is important to the Government to have it established as a fact that that was communicated to Brady they ought not to leave it open to mere inference when they could prove the fact, if the fact was as they claim it to be. The very fact that they did not do that is a confirmation of General Brady's theory of it, especially as he brings you a note from Mr. James dated nearly a month later in which the subject that they were talking about was alluded to. But I leave that, gentlemen.

As I have said repeatedly, they have claimed a great many times in this case that Brady ought to have known, and the fact that he did not know is significant against him. Right here, as to this very identical route where Mr. James's attention was called, as he said, to the matter, he never heard of it again until September, and in the mean time had been signing warrants to pay for that very thing. The question was asked him, "How did it happen that you were signing warrants to pay out this money on this order that you had directed to be revoked?" "Why," he said, "I signed those warrants as they were brought in to me without reading them." "Why?" "Because," he said, "it is physically impossible for one man to read all these papers and know all these things. Men have to trust somebody." The somebodies that he trusted were the subordinates of his office. Yet they say to you that General Brady should have read everything, should have held every affidavit up to the light and should have examined every petition to see whether there was an erasure of a word or an omission to dot an "i" or to cross a "t." You recollect what Mr. Brewer told you in respect of that. You recollect that other witnesses have told you that the Second Assistant signs his name to over four hundred papers every day. Yet they require of him and they exact of him that he shall look into and scrutinize every paper and discover every little irregularity, and if he did not do it, they say that is evidence that he was engaged in a conspiracy. Upon the same principle you would have evidence against Mr. James for associating himself with the other "conspirators," because he was signing these warrants and paying out the money for this service as to which he says he had given an order of revocation.

There are one or two other things in connection with this route to which I want to direct your attention. There are two or three affidavits that have been referred to. Take the Perkins affidavit, which they say was signed in blank. Perkins says that he signed and swore to that affidavit when it was in blank as to the number of men and horses. Does not the evidence in this case show, gentlemen of the jury, that that Perkins affidavit was not used? What other of these affidavits have they any evidence of that kind in respect to, except such evidence as has been furnished by Rerdell? Any? Any? When an affidavit has the jurat of an officer to it, prima facie that is correct, and it was just exactly as it now is when it was certified to by that officer. If these affidavits had been filled up as these gentlemen say they were, it was within their power to prove that fact. They proved it in the Perkins case and they could have proved it in the other cases if the fact had been so. There was Taylor, the notary public before whom many of these affidavits were sworn to by Peck down in New Mexico. Could not they have proven it by Taylor if it had been so? Taylor certified to the affidavits just as they appear here. There is the man Wainwright, up in Vermont. If the affidavits had been in blank at the time they were sworn to before him by John W. Dorsey Mr. Wainwright could have testified to that fact. I say that the very fact that they did bring one witness here to swear as to one affidavit and omitted to bring testimony as to these other affidavits, condemns that feature of this case, unless you may say that it is sufficiently proven by the testimony of Rerdell in so far as he has testified on that subject. There are two affidavits on this route by John W. Dorsey dated the 21st of April. They were both made on the same day.

Mr. BLISS. Are you not mistaken as to the route?

Mr. WILSON. I am mistaken. They are on the Pueblo and Rosita route, but I will refer to them here as I omitted to do so in connection with that route, and have a note of it. John W. Dorsey told you at first that he had not done that. Evidently he was conscientious about that. He didn't recollect having done anything of that kind. But Colonel Bliss or somebody else showed him those two affidavits, and as soon as he saw them he said "I recollect about that. That brings it back to my recollection. I got one of these affidavits in the morning, and I got the other in the afternoon. The one I got in the morning I swore to and sent back, and the one I got in the afternoon I swore to and sent back." Why does he say he did that? Because a communication came to him stating that the first one was wrong, and therefore they wanted the second one, and he swore to the second one, and sent it back. Where is the point of discrepancy? How do they seek to contradict it? They say that he said that he got these from Rerdell. They say that Rerdell was not here, and therefore he could not have sent these affidavits to John W. Dorsey, and therefore John W. Dorsey must have testified falsely about this thing. Is not that so? That is their position. Now, recollect, gentlemen, Mr. Dorsey did not swear positively that he got them from Rerdell. He said he thought he got them from Rerdell. He did not have the letter, but he thought he got them from Rerdell. They brought here three clerks from three different hotels out West for the purpose of showing to you that on the 22d, 23d, or 24th of April Rerdell was out there. Let me look at the testimony just a moment:

Q. Did you go West in the spring of 1879?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What time did you leave?—A. I left here either on the 17th or 18th of April; the 18th, I think.

Recollect these affidavits were sworn to on the 21st. The 18th you will find, if you look at the calendar, was Friday, the 19th was Saturday, the 20th was Sunday, and the 21st was Monday.

Q. Where did you go?—A. I will have to give the places in order where I stopped, if you wish it. The first place I stopped was Sidney, Nebraska; I staid there a day.

They had that man here with his register.

The next place I stopped was Laramie City. From there I went to Greeley, Colorado; from Greeley to Denver, and from there to Colorado Springs.

Now, he left here either on the 17th or the 18th; he thinks on the 18th. What else did he do? I read from page 2233:

Q. State whether or not after you returned, about the middle of May, as you say, I believe—

A. [Interposing.] I said about the 5th of May.

Recollect when he got back—about the 5th of May.

Q. [Continuing.]—about the 5th of May, 1879, you found blank affidavits among the papers connected with the business?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How many did you find?—A. Well, there were several blank affidavits of John W. Dorsey's and several of John M. Peck's. I don't know how many there were.

Q. Were they blank affidavits?—A. Well, sir, they were blank affidavits similar to that one I sent, leaving out the number of men and animals in each case.

Q. Did they purport to have been sworn to?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Were those affidavits among the papers when you left here to go West?—A. Some of them were. I think those of Peck's were here, probably four or five, or half a dozen, and I had made out, before I left here, a lot of them and sent them to John W. Dorsey. In the mean time, when I returned here, John W. Dorsey was here; but still there were some of the blanks here; some of them acknowledged up there and some acknowledged here.

So you see, gentlemen of the jury, that Rerdell himself swears that he left on the 17th or 18th; he thinks it was the 18th, but before he went away he made out these affidavits and sent them to John W. Dorsey. Three or four days before he went away he made out these affidavits, according to his own statement, and sent them to John W. Dorsey. Gentlemen of the jury, if Rerdell can corroborate anybody he corroborates, instead of contradicts, John W. Dorsey as to those affidavits coming to John W. Dorsey from Rerdell. But that is not all, gentlemen. Recollect now that John W. Dorsey says that he got the second affidavit in the afternoon, because the first one was not correct. Rerdell got back on the 5th of May. On the 6th of May he filed the first of these affidavits. Now, on the 5th is this letter:

HON. THOMAS J. BRADY,

Second Assistant Postmaster-General:

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith my proposition for carrying the mail on route 38134, from Pueblo to Rosita, Colo., on an expedited schedule.

Hoping it will receive favorable consideration.

That was filed in the department on the 6th of May. Here is another one, which was filed on the 8th of May:

HON. THOMAS J. BRADY,

Second Assistant Postmaster-General:

SIR: I have the honor to request the privilege of withdrawing the statement I presented some days ago as to the men and animals required for the transportation of the mails on route 38134, in order to correct an error therein.

Do you not see, gentlemen, how that tallies with John W. Dorsey's testimony? He says he got it in the morning and swore to it and sent it back, and got the other in the afternoon and swore to it and sent it back; that it was sent because there was a mistake in the first one, and Rerdell filed that——

Mr. BLISS. [Interposing.] He sent it back on the 21st of April.

Mr. WILSON. What of it? What has that to do with it? Of course he sent it back on the 21st of April. He sent it back to Washington, and Rerdell got here on the 5th of May, as he thinks. If he did, he wrote that letter on the same day he got back and filed it. Then he asked permission to withdraw that affidavit and put in the other on account of an error that was in the first one. Upon that they ask you to say that John W. Dorsey is convicted of lying in this case. I can conceive, gentlemen of the jury, how Rerdell may not have sent these affidavits. It may have been done by Kellogg or somebody else that Rerdell left here to look after this business in his absence. I do not know how it came about; but that is all there is in this vast display that has been made before you in respect of those two affidavits.

The next route, gentlemen, is route

NO. 35015, FROM VERMILLION TO SIOUX FALLS.

That was a route seventy-five miles in length, on which there were two trips a week. It connected two railroad points, one down at Vermillion on one railroad, and the other up at Sioux Falls, on another railroad. On the 10th of July, 1879, it was made six trips a week, and the time expedited from fourteen hours to ten hours. That was done upon a lot of petitions that were before the department, and those petitions were indorsed by Judge Kidder. All those petitions asked for a daily mail. If Brady was going to make money out of this thing there was a good chance to put on seven trips a week; but he did not do it; he made it six trips a week instead of seven, as was asked for by the petitioners. Whenever the prosecution find him granting a little more than is asked for in a petition, they say to you, "That is an indication of fraud." When you find him granting less than was asked, the rule ought to work the other way, ought it not? Ought not that to be an indication that he was not engaged in any fraud? Here these people asked for a daily mail; but he gave them six times a week. He did that upon these petitions, and the Government complains that it was not necessary. They have not proven that it was not necessary. I say the petitions are a complete justification to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General for doing exactly what he did do in respect to that matter.

There was a man by the name of Leach, who had a subcontract on that route, and he wanted to get the time extended, and procured a petition to be signed by the postmasters along the route asking that it be extended to sixteen hours. Recollect, the original contract time was fourteen hours. That is the way the contract was let. It was advertised on a fourteen-hour schedule. This man Leach having, as I suppose, made a bad bargain, and not having stipulated to get money enough to enable him to carry the service without loss, wanted the time extended to sixteen hours, and he sent in an application signed by the postmaster asking to have it extended to sixteen hours. That was favorably indorsed by Judge Bennett, then the Delegate in Congress. They say because Brady did not extend it to sixteen hours that that is an evidence of fraud. You will find there has been a great display made of an indorsement made upon a certain paper, in which General Brady says:

Write Judge B. it cannot be done.

That is all there is as to anything that Brady did or said in regard to the matter.

Write Judge B. it cannot be done.

Gentlemen, I say it could not be done. I say the law and the regulation is express that it could not be done. I will read you the regulation on the subject:

The Postmaster-General may change schedules of departures and arrivals in all cases, and particularly to make them conform to connections with railroads, without increase of pay, provided the running time be not abridged. But an application for schedule change cannot be granted * * * if more running time is asked than is given in the contract schedule.

That is the regulation made by the Postmaster-General. The regulation says that if they asked more time than is given in the contract schedule it cannot be done. What did Brady say? That was a petition asking for sixteen hours. Brady said:

Write Judge B. it cannot be done.

Mr. BLISS. The time was extended on the Bismarck route to one hundred and eight hours.

Mr. WILSON. That is on a different principle entirely. I am coming to the Bismarck route after a while. That is the next route to which I am coming and I congratulate you, gentlemen of the jury, that I am so nearly through. You see that the regulation says it cannot be done. The regulation prohibits its being done, and all he directed was:

Write Judge B. it cannot be done.

Now, Mr. Brewer, who was the corresponding clerk having the matter in charge, simply had that direction from General Brady. That is all he had. What did he do? He sat down and wrote that letter and gave the reasons. He put in that letter the reasons. They were not Brady's reasons. Brady had nothing to do with formulating that letter or with the construction of that letter, although there was nothing wrong in it. Brewer said it would be unjust to other bidders. I can see how that would be. Here are half a dozen bidders on a route advertised at a fourteen-hour schedule. Everybody bids on the faith of fourteen hours, and yet, when one man gets it on a fourteen-hour schedule, having bid below everybody else, then they turn around and increase the running time to sixteen, twenty, or forty hours for that matter. Is not that an injustice to other bidders? Do other bidders stand upon the same footing? Do they have the same opportunity? No. They go in and bid on a particular contract schedule. When that contract is made if there is an increase of the running time you have not dealt fairly with the other bidders. But that is neither here nor there. There was that regulation looking the Second Assistant squarely in the face, and he declined to do it and said it could not be done. But they say he could have increased it to fourteen hours. Suppose he could. Nobody asked him to do it, and yet they want you to infer that he must have been engaged in some rascality because he did not increase it to fourteen hours. General Brady has testified in regard to this particular route. He has been very frank with you in respect to this matter and all others, gentlemen of the jury—very—frank. He says that he was importuned by Judge Kidder. Judge Kidder lived at one of these points, and he wanted a daily mail service for the benefit of his section. General Brady accommodated him with it, and when Judge Bennett came in and succeeded Judge Kidder he wanted some favor in another locality, and Brady told him he didn't have the money, and then he wanted him to take it off this Vermillion and Sioux Falls route and put it on another, and Brady declined to do it. Now, gentlemen, I want to go one step further in regard to this particular route, and that is all I will have to say about it. On the 6th of March, 1880, I find this :

All the postmasters ask that service end at Worthing, 3 a. w. from April 1, 1880. Omit Sioux Falls and Prairie Grove and end at Worthing, curtailing distance 16 miles; reduce service, Vermillion to Worthing, 59 miles, to tri-weekly; and deduct from pay of contractor and subcontractor $3,720.99 per annum pro rata, on which one month's extra pay is to be allowed.

BRADY.

Let us see what he did that on :

VERMILLION, DAKOTA, March 5, 1880.

To SECOND ASS' P. M. GENERAL,
Washington, D. C. :

DEAR SIR: The undersigned, postmasters on mail route No. 35015, from Vermillion to Sioux Falls, Dakota, do most respectfully petition that service on said route be discontinued from Worthing to Sioux Falls, Dakota, making Worthing the terminus of said route instead of Sioux Falls.

Worthing is a railroad town on the Chicago, St. Paul and Milwaukee Railroad, a new railroad running east and west through Southern Dakota. There is only one post-office between Worthing and Sioux Falls. This office is within one mile of the Pembina and Sioux City Railroad, a railroad running north and south.

We further petition that service be cut down from daily to tri-weekly, all that the people can reasonably ask.

That is signed by the postmasters along that route. When it came to the Post-Office Department this service was curtailed to conform it to the new condition of things occasioned by the building of a new railroad through that country. The construction of that railroad introduced a new kind of service into the country, and made it unnecessary to use the Vermillion and Sioux Falls route as it had before been used. Now, what followed? Just as soon as that was brought to the attention of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General he cut down the service and took off between two and three thousand dollars a year from the pay of the contractor. I refer to that, gentlemen of the jury, to show you just how this service is being adjusted from time to time to meet the wants of the people. When there is no longer any occasion for it it is cut down, because the people are supplied in some other way.

I come now, gentlemen of the jury, to

about which so much has been said. That is the route that was advertised as being two hundred and fifty miles in length. The service was once a week on a schedule of eighty-four hours. It subsequently turned out that the route was over three hundred miles in length; about three hundred and ten. By some order, which is not exactly clear in the record—it is not clear in my mind, and I do not think it is clear in the record—one hundred and eight hours was recognized as the running time. If the records in the department are full on that subject they have not been brought here. This route more than any other, as it seems to me, serves to illustrate what I said at the outset. Perhaps more has been said in respect to this route than any other, and it has been used and harped upon as indicating that there was a conspiracy between these parties who are here accused. I need not trouble you with the map, because that has been exhibited to you so many times that to produce it now would simply be a waste of time. You know that Bismarck was at the western terminus of the Northern Pacific Railroad, and you know that the Northern Pacific Railroad was projected right over the line which was occupied by this route, and had been used before. You know that over at the other end of this route was Fort Keogh, with Miles City only two or three miles away. You know that Fort Keogh was one of the most important military posts in this Government. You know that over on the Bismarck side the mails concentrated. You know that Saint Paul was the military headquarters of that department. You know that at Fort Keogh there were mail routes running out into Montana, to Bozeman and various other places which I need not enumerate. You know that for the mail to get from Saint Paul, the military headquarters of this district, around to Fort Keogh, it either had to go by Fort Buford, some eight hundred or a thousand miles, or it had to take the other route going down by Omaha and the Union Pacific Railroad to Salt Lake City or Ogden, and thence up by stages three or four hundred miles into Montana, and then by three or four hundred miles more of stages to Fort Keogh, making a circuit of not less than two thousand miles. Here was Bismarck upon the one hand and Fort Keogh on the other, three hundred miles distant, and yet to get from one to the other you had to make one of these circuits. Congress established the mail route from Bismarck across that country to Fort Keogh at the mouth of Tongue River, and pursuant to that establishment this route was advertised and let. There are several things in connection with that route to which it probably will be necessary that I shall call your attention. In the first place, this route passed through an unexplored region. It passed through a region of country that was infested with very hostile and very savage Indians. General Miles had fourteen companies of troops at Fort Keogh, and I think, gentlemen of the jury, that I am not misrepresenting or misstating the testimony when I say that General Miles's attention was early attracted to the importance of having this very route and he made himself very active in procuring it. When John W. Dorsey went out there to put the service on this route he started the outfit, as they call it, from Bismarck, and then took a boat and went around up and came down to Fort Keogh, where General Miles was, and had an interview with him. I think I can say, and be entirely consistent with the testimony, that the suggestion as to increase of service upon that route over and above what had been contracted for came from General Miles. Undoubtedly gentlemen, that subject was talked about between General Miles and Mr. John W. Dorsey, and although Mr. Pennell and some others have sworn that when they started from Bismarck they built their stations seventeen miles apart in anticipation of increase and expedition of service, yet I say that the weight of the testimony is that when John W. Dorsey went around to Fort Keogh and had an interview with General Miles, then John W. Dorsey turned these men back upon this route. He swore he did that, and I think the circumstances confirm his testimony that he turned these men back upon this route and told them to build intermediate stations, so that when this route was increased, as General Miles thought it would be increased, they would have the stations already prepared to put the service on. Now, how happened General Brady to increase that service? It was only one trip a week and it was on a slow schedule. How came he to do that, gentlemen of the jury? In the first place, we have the testimony of Major Maginnis. Major Maginnis tells you that he repeatedly went to the department in regard to this matter and urged it upon the department. He went there in company with General Miles and represented the situation and showed them the necessity for having the service increased and expedited on that route. He argued this with General Brady. General Miles did precisely the same thing, and General Miles not only did that, but he wrote letters to the department in regard to it. He transmitted letters through the War Department to the Post-Office Department asking that this thing be done. That is what General Miles did about it.

Mr. BLISS. Expedition? You said expedition, and I thought you did not intend to.

Mr. WILSON. I am going to show this jury if I can what there was in this situation, and what influences were being brought upon the department, for the purpose of showing to the jury what the department first had before it when the thing was done, and then to show to the jury that what the department had before it was true by what was placed before the department afterwards. I read you the other day, gentlemen, the testimony of General Sherman in regard to the importance of having a mail route across this route.

There has been a great deal said about Miner's affidavit upon this route. They said he swore falsely when he said it would take one hundred and fifty men and one hundred and fifty animals. I say, gentlemen, that to perform that service properly—and the evidence shows it in this case—it would take that number of men and animals. General Sherman told you that it would have taken two regiments of troops to have picketed that line as the stage line picketed it. Mr. Miner has told you that when the service was discontinued because of the completion of the railroad across there, they sold from that very line one hundred and sixty-five horses; so they did have one hundred and sixty-five horses on it at any rate.

I am not going to take up your time, gentlemen, in reading the petitions that came in on that route. You recollect them; petitions of Boards of Trade of Minneapolis and Saint Paul, General Miles's letters, Maginnis's testimony and Sherman's testimony. Lounsberry, the postmaster there, and various other people have stated to you the importance of that route. It was not necessary that they should state to you the importance of the route, because the very map itself shows the importance of the route as does the situation of the country. It was increased and it was expedited in accordance with these recommendations. You will recollect, gentlemen, one thing that I will mention right here, for I do not want to weary you with reading testimony. You will recollect that Mr. Lounsberry asked to have that mail expedited to sixty-five hours. He was on the stand here and he was interrogated as to whether he signed that petition, and he said he did, and whether he did it in good faith, and he said he did. He said that as to trips it was all right, but that if he had to do it over again in the light of after-acquired information he did not think he would have recommended a schedule of sixty-five hours in the winter. There was no trouble about carrying it in the summer on a sixty-five-hour schedule. In the winter he would not have recommended a sixty-five-hour schedule. He was not seeking to mislead the Post-Office Department. When he made his recommendation he made it in perfectly good faith, and when the department acted upon it, it acted upon it in perfectly good faith. But afterwards he found out that sixty-five hours was too short a schedule for winter. Why? Because they had had for one or two winters very extraordinary snow-storms and even the railroads could not get their mails through sometimes for three weeks at a time. They had exceptional hard winters and after a year or two had elapsed and they found they could not get the mail through, yet the prosecution undertake to say that although in making the sixty-five-hour schedule he acted upon the suggestion of these gentlemen, Brady was engaged in a conspiracy to defraud the United States. Was this an important route, gentlemen? Was it important to have the mail go over this route? They brought here to you carrier after carrier to show that there was only a few pounds of mail. They belittled it and said there was nothing of it and all that sort of thing; but Mr. Lounsberry, the postmaster, came here and told you that when they first opened that line there was very little mail went over it. That is natural. You cannot turn the mail in a particular direction in a day. But he told you that when it was increased the mail became a very large one and increased rapidly. He said that on one occasion in the presence of one of the Post-Office inspectors and after the holiday season was over, when there was no unusual use of the mail, it weighed two hundred and forty pounds, and that the mail ran from two hundred to three hundred pounds. This route, gentlemen of the jury, it seems to me serves a very important purpose in this case. There were no intermediate post-offices. Now, what revenue would you get from such a route as that? They have brought to you a statement of the revenue. For what purpose? To show you that there was no mail over it and that the route was of no consequence. That was the purpose.

As I remember it, they have Bismarck at one end of the route, and that is a railroad station, but all the stamps that were sold at Bismarck, of course, were not stamps that went over this route. The stamps sold at that office represented letters going wherever they might through all the length and breadth of the country. And so over at Fort Keogh and Miles City. The stamps sold there represented not merely the mail that went over this particular route, but represented the mails that went out on all the routes from Miles City.

So you see, gentlemen of the jury, that the revenues do not represent the mail matter that went over that route, as I will show you as I proceed. How could they? If a man wrote one letter at Bismarck to go to Fort Keogh, there would be a three-cent stamp sold there if the stamp was bought there. Now, with that one letter there might be five hundred letters in the same sack not one of which was mailed at Bismarck. There might have been five hundred mailed in New York to go to Fort Keogh, and when they got to Bismarck they could put in one solitary letter, and then five hundred and one letters would go over that route, and yet only one of them from Bismarck. Now, the table of revenues only shows the stamps sold at the offices along that line and at the terminal points. And included in that is the box rents, gentlemen. I will give you, gentlemen, the benefit of that. I will claim the benefit of it, as you will see as I go along.

Now, there is a route three hundred miles long carrying from two hundred to three hundred pounds of mail every day over it, and no revenues from it; that is to say, no revenues from the route itself, comparatively speaking. Would you discontinue that route because there were no revenues from it? There is three hundred miles without an intermediate post-office. General Miles said it was a very important route; General Sherman said it was a very important route; Lounsberry said it was a very important route; these military officers, General Terry and the others, say it was a very important route; these boards of trade say it was a very important route; and there were two hundred or three hundred pounds of mail going over it every day. Now, would you discontinue it because at the little post-offices along the line they did not sell scarcely any postage-stamps—not a thousandth part of what the offices cost?

Now you see, gentlemen of the jury, that the importance of the route does not depend upon the stamps sold along the line of that route. It depends upon the facilities which it affords to get the mails that are gathered in from all over the country into the localities where these mails are to go.

Let me illustrate this a little further. It is only a repetition of the illustration I gave a day or two ago. Here are letters starting from New York, Philadelphia, Boston, Washington, Cincinnati, and all over the country to go out into Montana. There is a vast influx of emigration to that country. There are those military posts scattered about through that country, and these mails all concentrate at Bismarck, and then it takes three hundred miles to get these mails over into the other regions to which they are to go. They concentrate there, and then they pass over this route. If there was not a stamp sold along that route, what of it? Does it make the route any the less important? Why, no, gentlemen. That route is simply the connecting link between two vast systems of routes, one on the east and the other on the west. It is simply the channel through which all of these streams of mail that are concentrated at Bismarck flow across into that other region of country to be distributed by the various routes to the various sections of country in the West.

Why, it is preposterous, to my mind, to talk about a route of that kind not being important; and it is preposterous, to my mind, to say that because stamps are not sold along the route therefore the route itself is useless and the country ought not to have it.

Mr. BLISS. Mr. Wilson, we certainly do not claim that that route was useless.

Mr. WILSON. What is the matter? Did it cost too much?

Mr. BLISS. I think so.

Mr. WILSON. You think it cost too much. It cost too much to keep up daily communication between Bismarck and Tongue River, three hundred and three miles, through an Indian country, where General Sherman says it would have taken two regiments of troops to picket the line. It cost too much when it cost $69,000 or $70,000 a year.

Gentlemen of the jury, my Brother Bliss has made out some figures, but I will show to you if there is anything that can be made out of figures in a case like this that it did not cost as much as it produced. Let me see if I cannot demonstrate that to you. I have figured on this a little. Of course, you will understand, gentlemen of the jury, that I have to conjecture somewhat; I have to assume some things. On that route, according to Mr. Lounsberry, there was about two hundred and fifty pounds of mail. He says from two hundred to three hundred pounds; that he weighed it once and it weighed two hundred and forty pounds. I will assume that two hundred and fifty pounds of mail went over it daily. Would it be unreasonable to say that thirty pounds of that was letters?

Mr. BLISS. The mail bills show differently.

Mr. WILSON. The mail bills on what?

Mr. BLISS. Bismarck and Fort Keogh.

Mr. WILSON. Have you got them here?

Mr. BLISS. You put them in evidence.

Mr. KER. Page 2886.

Mr. WILSON. Just let me go through with my illustration, gentlemen, and see how they will come out.

The COURT. How was the time advanced from eighty-four to one hundred and eight hours ?

Mr. WILSON. If your honor please, as I said a little while ago, there is either a confusion in the record or something omitted from the record, that I confess I am not able to explain, and I said so to the jury a little while ago.

The COURT. Expedition was ordered on the basis of one hundred and eight hours, was it?

Mr. WILSON. I am not able to explain that ; I admit that.

Mr. BLISS. I may say to your honor that the condition of things was this : The schedule was eighty-four hours ; there was no evidence put in showing any increase of hours ; there was some subsequent order which recited that previous to that time the schedule had been extended to one hundred and eight hours, but there was nothing disclosed in the evidence as to how that arose. An order was allowed to be put in at one time showing how Mitchell came in. I have proposed to have the route-book of the department brought in so that we could see whether that would give us any light upon that subject as to whether or not there was actually such an order made. I do not know whether there was or not. I will look at that matter to-night, and if I find it, will ask Judge Wilson to let it come in, and then if he does not, we will only be where we are now.

The COURT. It makes a difference in the calculation.

Mr. WILSON. I did not discover that until after the testimony had closed.

The COURT. According to the advertisement the distance was two hundred and fifty miles.

Mr. BLISS. Mr. Brady restates the distance.

The COURT. The actual distance was three hundred and three miles.

Mr. BLISS. Mr. Brady restates it from some information furnished by General Rosser, at three hundred and three miles to Miles City, and three hundred and ten to Fort Keogh, or whichever is the farthest off. There is a recital in some order that it had been extended to one hundred and eight hours, but we have, none of us, looked that up. I requested at one time that it should be looked up in the route-book, but I do not recollect of any reply.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Miner made his affidavit on the basis of one hundred and eight hours, I believe ; that is my recollection.

The COURT. I supposed it was that.

Mr. WILSON. But after the testimony closed, or at some time late in the trial, I discovered this apparent confusion or discrepancy in the record, and therefore I stated that there was something there which I did not entirely understand.

Now, gentlemen, my Brothers Ker and Bliss have called my attention to the mail bills on this route. Recollect, I was discussing the question as to the importance of this route, how much mail matter was going over it and how much revenue was derived from it every day, and all that. Now, I am referred to the mail bills to show how much was going over the route. Here is a mail bill on page 2886 :

Route No. 35051, from Fort Keogh to Bismarck. Post-office at Fort Keogh. Date, July 2, 1879. Mail, consisting of 2 pouches for Bismarck, locked, dispatched this day at 8 o'clock a. m.

There were two locked pouches. You know the papers go through in canvas sacks. That was letter mail, gentlemen. Then here is another :

Post-office at Bismarck, Dak. Date, July 5th, 1879. The mail accompanying this register, consisting of two locked pouches for Bismarck, received this day at 2 o'clock p. m.

Then this on the 4th of July:

Route No. 35051, from Fort Keogh to Bismarck. Post-office at Fort Keogh. Date, July 4, 1879. Mail, consisting of 2 locked pouches, dispatched this day at 7 o'clock a. m.

Then on the 8th of July two lock-pouches; on the 7th of July two pouches locked; on the 10th of July two pouches locked:

Received this day at 5 o'clock p. m.

C. A. LOUNSBERRY,
Postmaster.

That is enough now for my purposes, enough to show that over this route were going daily two pouches of locked mail. [To Mr. Bliss.] Do you contend that those were not letters?

Mr. BLISS. I do; I have ascertained that they were not.

Mr. WILSON. Did the papers go in locked pouches?

Mr. BLISS. No, sir; they went in canvas sacks.

Mr. WILSON. Not on that route. There is no evidence on that subject.

I want to assume now, gentlemen, as Mr. Lounsberry says, that there were from two hundred to three hundred pounds of mail per day. There will not be any dispute about that. Let me suppose, gentlemen of the jury, that thirty pounds of that was letters, and give the balance of it to other mail matter. Now, how many letters is that? Nine hundred and sixty per day one way. And you will notice that there were two pouches received and two pouches sent, although the mail was lighter, as the testimony shows, coming this way than it was going the other way, as naturally it would be. There you will have, upon the hypothesis upon which I am going, $28.80 worth of postage one way each day. Now, if you will just double that to cover all the balance of it, you will have $57.60, or $86.40 of revenue for a day. Now, if you will say that there is half as much coming this way, you will have $43.20; that is to say, $154.60 worth of mail matter going over that route every day. The Government is getting that much postage every day from mail matter going over the route. How much is that in a year? It is $46,380. And yet when you come to take their table of revenue you will find it less than $10,000, and that $10,000, mark you, gentlemen of the jury, embraces all the postage-stamps sold at Bismarck, in all probability nine-tenths of which came east, and did not go over this route at all, and nine-tenths of that sold at Miles City and Fort Keogh was going west. So that this route, in point of fact, upon the most moderate calculation, was carrying mail matter that represented not less than $50,000 a year in the way of postage-stamps. And yet they say, "That is of no consequence; it did not pay; look at these little post-offices here; just see how insignificant the mail matter is that goes from these little post-offices—how utterly inconsequential." And yet here is mail matter going over that, which, upon the most moderate calculation, giving these gentlemen the benefit of every doubt, shows that the Government was receiving certainly $50,000 a year, not from that particular route, but that the postage-stamps used in the mail that went over this route amounted certainly to $50,000 a year. And if you will make a fair calculation here you will find that the postage-stamps sold more than paid the running expenses of that route.

Of course, gentlemen of the jury, that route is not entitled to the credit of all of it, any more than the New York Central Railroad is entitled to the credit of all the mail that passes over it. Why, just think of the train loads of mail that go out every day over these trunk lines. Think of the vast amount of postage-stamps sold in New York every day. Are you going to give New York the credit of all that business, or are you going to give the credit to the New York Central or the Pennsylvania Central for all the mail that goes over those lines? Why, no, gentlemen of the jury. The mail leaves these great trunk lines at every station. It sweeps through the country at forty miles an hour without even stopping at the stations. There is a postal car, a regular distributing post-office on each mail train. Skilled men are there to assort these mails, and when the train comes to a place where a mail is to be left, there is an arm and hook, and as the train goes by, it hooks in the sack and the train goes on its way. And in this way hundreds and thousands and millions of letters are put in the post-offices all over the country and distributed far and wide. And it is idle and foolish to undertake to determine the value of a route simply by what passes over it. It is idle to say that a route is entitled to the credit of all the matter that passes over it. It is, as I said, a vast distributing system, working route with route in harmony.

I take the year 1879 on this Bismarck and Fort Keogh route, and I find that they sold in that year at Bismarck $6,247 worth of stamps. They are particular to state that that is a railroad point. Undoubtedly the vast majority of that mail comes in this direction rather than the other. At Miles City, which is the next point, they sold $1,211 worth of stamps. At Fort Keogh $1,157. Making a total of $8,616.34. Whereas in point of fact this large amount of mail was going over this route just as I have before stated.

Now, gentlemen of the jury, let me go back a little and see what it was that General Brady acted upon.

The COURT. Were there any connections beyond Fort Keogh?

Mr. WILSON. Oh, yes; daily mails.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Immense mails.

Mr. BLISS. There is no evidence on that subject.

Mr. WILSON. I am not going to state it, Mr. Bliss, and the reason I am not going to state it is——

Mr. BLISS. [Interposing.] There was connection at Bozeman, I think, that appears in the evidence, though nothing in detail beyond that fact. Mr. Wilson asked some question whether there was not a route from there, &c.

Mr. DAVIDGE. General Sherman explained the situation.

Mr. WILSON. Certainly; and Major Maginnis described the situation, and told us how the railroads ran through that region into Montana and to Bozeman and Fort Keogh.

Mr. BLISS. I do not mean that there was nothing beyond Fort Keogh. What I mean is that there was no evidence about that mail matter——

Mr. WILSON. [Interposing.] Except the daily.

Mr. BLISS. I do not think daily; there is no evidence on that subject.

Mr. WILSON. I think Major Maginnis testified to that, but I am not sure. I am not going to say positively.

Mr. BLISS. I speak with confidence because, I made some preparation on that point.

Mr. WILSON. I am quite sure, gentlemen of the jury—although, of course, I am liable to be mistaken, and I have not referred to the testimony—that Major Maginnis told you exactly how the stage line ran and how letters had to go, and so did General Miles, to go up into this country about Fort Keogh. They told how they had to go to Ogden and then by stage three or four hundred miles up to Helena, and then coming back this way on the stage lines, so that when they made this route across from Bismarck to Fort Keogh, it connected, as I said a while ago, the system on the east with the system on the west.

Now, I want to show you, gentlemen of the jury, some petitions and recommendations that appear in this case.

Mr. BLISS. Mr. Wilson, I thought I should find it so, and this is what Mr. Maginnis says, at page 3246:

Q. What daily mails were there running from Ogden out in the direction of Helena and Bozeman?—A. Well, sir, there was a daily mail to Helena, and when it got up to a place called Watson's Junction, it branched there, and one branch went on the west side of the mountain to Deer Lodge.

By Mr. MERRICK:

Q. What time are you speaking of?—A. I understand that I am speaking of all along the interval between 1872 and on up.

Mr. WILSON. That is right.

A. [Continuing.] Then there was a daily mail to Virginia, and afterwards to Bozeman, and there was a tri-weekly mail established from Bozeman down the Yellowstone to Fort Keogh.

Mr. WILSON. I knew that he testified on that subject. I am going to address myself directly to the testimony, and this testimony shows, as it now appears, unless I can find something else, that when they got over to Fort Keogh they had tri-weekly mail until they got to Bozeman, and then they had a daily mail on from there to Ogden. That is the way it would seem now.

Now, I want to show you some petitions and recommendations, and let me commence with the 18th of July, 1878 (page 2140):

BANK OF BISMARCK,
Bismarck, Dak., July 18, 1878.

Hon. D. M. KEY,
Postmaster-General, Washington, D. C.:

SIR: I desire to call your attention to the mail route between this place and Tongue River, Montana.

The country west of us is settling up rapidly and the mail facilities are entirely inadequate to the wants of those living in that section of the country, including not only the settlers, but the military posts, where the want of more mail facilities are being felt daily. And should the mail route between this place and Tongue River be increased to three trips a week each way, it would meet a want that has become almost a necessity, and one that the parties living on the line of route earnestly beg may be extended to them. This request, in my opinion, is a just one, and a request which, if granted, will be a public welfare.

Very respectfully,

J. W. RAYMOND,
President.

That man could well write that letter. Any one of us looking at the situation could have written that with the utmost truthfulness.

Mr. BLISS. Who is that?

Mr. WILSON. J. W. Raymond.

Mr. BLISS. As appears by the evidence, Mr. Dorsey's banker.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Well, he lied, I suppose on that account.

Mr. WILSON. Is it possible, gentlemen of the jury, that because Mr. Raymond was John W. Dorsey's banker—that is to say that, I suppose, when Mr. Dorsey went out there to put stock on that route he probably made a little deposit of money in Raymond's bank, and because he did that it is evidence that Mr. Raymond is an unmitigated liar.

Mr. DAVIDGE. It was Rerdell who drew his drafts through Raymond.

Mr. WILSON. All right; that makes it worse yet.

Mr. BLISS. It appears in evidence that Mr. Raymond paid the bills, expenses, and so forth.

Mr. WILSON. I suppose he paid them out of his own pocket. Look here, Mr. Davidge, don't you see that Raymond paid these bills out of his own pocket, and he wrote this letter for the purpose of getting this done, and he was going to divide the profits?

Mr. DAVIDGE. I presume so.

Mr. WILSON. Don't you see that that is so?

Mr. DAVIDGE. It is very plain.

Mr. WILSON. That is the logic of it; nothing plainer than that.

Mr. DAVIDGE. As plain as anything else.

Mr. WILSON. That letter was indorsed as follows:

I earnestly, but respectfully, recommend the increase of service asked for in this letter of Colonel Raymond's. I know, personally, that the statement herein made is true. Colonel R. is a banker and one of the leading men in Bismarck. Whatever he says can be relied upon.

July 25, 1878.

J. P. KIDDER.

Now Davidge, I have got him corroborated. Here Kidder says:

Whatever he (Raymond) says can be relied upon.

Now let us go further:

BISMARCK, DAK., July 23, 1878.

To the Hon. 2D ASS'T P. M. GEN'L:

SIR: I have the honor to call your attention to the personal call—

See how this corroborates what John W. Dorsey said about General Miles taking an interest in this. Recollect this is only twenty-three days after the service was to go on. John W. Dorsey went out there some time in June, 1878, to put that service on. Now, Mr. Maginnis says:

I have the honor to call your attention to the personal call made on you last winter by General Miles and myself in relation to establishing a daily mail route between Miles City and Bismarck, which at that time, you may remember, received your favorable consideration.

Away back in the preceding winter, before John W. Dorsey knew even that he was to have this contract, when he could not have known it, General Miles and Major Maginnis had been to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General urging a daily mail over this route:

A weekly mail (route 35051) has been let, and the service is now established from this place, but with a once-a-week mail and such a long schedule the route will not be of much use, and will not shorten the mail time much beyond the long route via Montana.

Now you can see that is so. You have once-a-week mail over that route and one hundred and eight hours in which to run it, and you might just as well have none at all. The mail would go way around twenty-two hundred miles and come in, as Maginnis says, at the back door. Now, he was presenting that, recollect, on the 23d of July, 1878, calling his attention to the fact that he and Miles had presented this case to him before:

It is now proposed to increase the service to tri-weekly, and to reduce the schedule from ninety hours to sixty-five. To make the service valuable this should be done at once, and then the question of daily service may be postponed until another year.

That is what was done.

I find the country is settling faster, and the need of this mail is even greater than was set forth by General Miles at the time of our call, or in the recommendations of other Army officers which have been made to you.

I hope the service may be increased, and the schedule reduced as asked for.

With great respect, your obedient servant,

MARTIN MAGINNIS,
Delegate from Montana.

Now here is one that was signed by Mr. Lounsberry :

Hon. DAVID M. KEY,
Postmaster-General, Washington, D. C. :

The undersigned, representing the citizens and business men of Bismarck, Dakota Territory, beg to represent that at a recent letting contracts were made for mail service between this place and Tongue River, Montana, the same to be weekly. This service is entirely inadequate to meet the proper wants of the country lying between the terminal points, and especially to supply Tongue River and the country beyond. This route is along the proposed route of the Northern Pacific Railway, and will, within a brief period of time, in our judgment, become a great thoroughfare of travel and commerce.

Prophetic, gentlemen, prophetic. To-day the Northern Pacific Railroad Company is selling tickets from ocean to ocean. There is a little intervening stretch of stage line, but these great minds, these great, enterprising men of the country, to whom the country is so much indebted, are building that road at the rate of three or four miles a day :

In the interest of the Government and of the people we ask that this service be increased to three times per week, and the speed also increased so we can reach Tongue River in sixty-five hours.

Bismarck, D. T., July 22, 1878.

Signed by C. A. Lounsberry and others.

Now, let us take another one :

MILES CITY, MONTANA TERRITORY.

Hon. D. M. KEY, P. M. Gen'l :

SIR: The undersigned, citizens of Montana Territory, beg leave to state that the mail service—

The other, you recollect, was from the Bismarck end of the route ; now we come to the Miles City end :

The undersigned, citizens of Montana Territory, beg leave to state that the mail service on the route between Bismarck and Tongue River is entirely inadequate to the wants of the people now supplied by said route.

The Territory is now settling very rapidly both east and west of Tongue River, and one trip a week can hardly suffice.

We therefore very respectfully but urgently request that the route be increased to three trips a week and the schedule to at least sixty-five hours.

Then follows another that I want to read, at the risk of wearying you :

POST-OFFICE, BISMARCK, D. T., July 19, 1878.

You see this was away back in July, 1878.

THOMAS J. BRADY,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General, Washington, D. C. :

I have the honor to call the attention of the department to the necessity for increased service on route 35051, from Bismarck to Tongue River.

The country is rapidly settling. One may start from Bismarck on foot and travel to the Custer battle-field, which has already been taken by settlers, and stop every night at the ranche of a settler.

Gentlemen, there is a great deal in that sentence. There is a great deal in it that illustrates this case. There is a great deal in it that is suggestive. That substantiates exactly what I have been trying to say to you during the progress of my argument. There was that Custer battle-field, noted in history, where Custer lost his life. There is a country that was infested with hostile Indians, and although when this route was first laid out or traversed by John W. Dorsey and his outfit, General Miles had to send a squad of troops along with them to protect them against these hostile Indians, yet now, when Mr. Lounsberry—for he is the author of this letter—writes this letter in 1878, he says a man can travel on foot across that region of country and stop every night at a ranche, and that the very battle-field where Custer lost his precious life, which filled this country with mourning, is settled upon by the enterprising people of this country who are making their homes there. And these gentlemen think it is not right to give them their mails unless it pays. Oh, nothing but men in uniform with brass buttons on their coats delivering to them their mails two or three times a day will satisfy them. They have got a good deal to learn, gentlemen. If they will go out into that country among those Western people, they will find where the bone, the muscle, the sinew, the brains of this country are. And they are a class of people who are entitled to just as much consideration from this Government as any other class of people.

Now, let us go a little further with this :

One may start from Bismarck on foot and travel to the Custer battle-field, which has already been taken by settlers, and stop every night at the ranche of a settler. An important village has already sprung up at the mouth of the Tongue River, and much of the country not covered by military reservations has been taken for farming purposes.

Several of the most important military posts in the department can best be served by this route, and the service proposed will cost less than the War Department paid last year for carriers carrying special messages from Tongue River to telegraphic points.

Now, what do you think of that? It will cost less than the War Department paid to its couriers to carry special dispatches to telegraph stations so that they could reach this Government from that wilderness.

The time necessary to reach Tongue River by the old route via Buford is about ten days. This can be reduced not only to the four days allowed in the Miner contract, but when the route is once established it can and should be still further reduced to at least sixty-five hours.

I have had frequent talks with General Miles in relation to this matter, and know that he thinks the increased service proposed is very important, and I believe it will be economical on the part of the Government to grant the increase asked.

He was saying to the Second Assistant that this is economical; it will not cost as much as the War Department paid for sending special messages, which left out the interests of the people, because they could not use these War Department couriers. "Now if you will put on this service," says Mr. Lounsberry, "it will not cost as much as the War Department has been paying for couriers, and then not only the War Department will be benefited, but all the people of this country will have the benefit of this service. Not only the settlers who have located themselves upon this battle-field and along the line of this route, but the people beyond," says Mr. Lounsberry, "will get the benefit of this service."

In all probability, too, the N. P.—

That is, the Northern Pacific—will be extended next season—work in that direction may even be done this fall—and settlements will surely push ahead of their work. Carriers—have already provided for a telegraph line, which should be supplemented by direct and frequent mail communication. A military post, at least a camp, will, no doubt, be established on the Little Missouri at the point where the railroad will, and where this route now crosses it. On looking at the matter from every possible stand-point the increased service asked for should be granted.

That should be Congress—

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

C. A. LOUNSBERRY,
Postmaster.

Now, gentlemen, Mr. Lounsberry is brought here as a witness in this case. He is a gentleman, as you can see. You have seen him. You have heard him testify, and he tells you that he signed these petitions and also these letters in good faith, believing what they said to be true. But he says he was mistaken when he asked the department to reduce it to sixty-five hours in the winter time because of the extraordinary storms in that country, which rendered it impracticable at times to carry that mail.

In the face of such recommendations as that, in the face of the testimony of Miles and Maginnis and General Sherman and Lounsberry, and these petitions, which I might read to you in great numbers in addition to what I have already read, recommending the same thing and urging this with the utmost persistence upon the department—in the face of all this they ask you to condemn General Brady for having made the order increasing this to three trips and reducing the schedule to sixty-five hours.

Mr. BLISS. Do I understand you to say that there is any recommendation of expedition by General Miles anywhere, either in writing or on the stand? I undertake to say there is not.

Mr. WILSON. Now, gentlemen, is not that cutting it almighty fine? That is drawing a very fine sight on this case. How many times have I said that I take this testimony as showing the necessity for this service? Some of these men say, "We want expedition." Numbers of these petitions say, "We want sixty-five hours." Lounsberry says, "We want sixty-five hours." Lounsberry says, "I have had frequent conversations with General Miles upon this subject, and he thinks this thing ought to be done."

Mr. BLISS. Mr. Lounsberry says expressly "increase of service;" he does not say expedition. Look at the phrase carefully when speaking of Miles.

Mr. WILSON. I know he thinks the increase of service proposed is very important. What was proposed, gentlemen? That was the question. It was proposed to give three trips and sixty-five hours time. Now is it not cutting it pretty fine, is it not drawing a very fine sight on this thing, to undertake to play upon this phrase, "increase of service?" Why, before I got into this case, if anybody had talked to me about increase of service I should not have known that there was any such distinction, and when I said increase of service I would have supposed that that embraced the meaning "more of it." And that just applies, to the ordinary mind, as much to expedition as it does to multiplication of trips.

Mr. BLISS. Mr. Brady knew what it meant.

Mr. WILSON. Yes; I presume he knew what it meant. I presume when Lounsberry and Raymond and all these other people said that they wanted three trips and a sixty-five-hour schedule Brady understood that. I think he comprehended that. And when Lounsberry wrote to him that General Miles wanted the increase of service proposed, I supposed that Brady understood that to mean three trips and sixty-five hours.

But is not that very technical now, gentlemen, in a criminal case? Here is a public officer discharging a duty, pressed to make that service, and he looks about to see what is the best thing to be done, and he comes to the conclusion that these representations made by these people are true, and he makes that service what he thinks it ought to be made. Now, upon a technicality these gentlemen want to send that man to the penitentiary because increase of service, they say, only means multiplication of trips, and he ought to have understood that it only meant that, and not have given expedition.

I have read these things to you, gentlemen, for the purpose of showing to you that there was ample justification for the granting of that order. Now, after a while, after the three trips have been granted and the sixty-five hour schedule, then come these applications for a multiplication of trips, and they are granted. Recollect, Lounsberry told you how the mails grew as the service increased, showing, gentlemen, that as you increase the facilities you increase the communication between the people. And thus this mail system is the forerunner, the pioneer, not merely for the development of the material resources of the country, but it is the pioneer for the intelligence, the development of the mental qualities of the people, for the mails grow as you give facilities for carrying them. And if this Government ever does its whole duty to those people—and it cannot spend money in any better way than that—it will in that way foster and encourage the people in their own cultivation.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Had we not better adjourn.

Mr. WILSON. No, no; I want to finish this route.

The COURT. This is not the last route, is it?

Mr. WILSON. Yes; it is the last one. I am going to keep my faith with this jury and the court. I am not going to talk any seven days.

Mr. BLISS. He is managing to come within about five minutes of it.

Mr. WILSON. There is going to be some expedition in this case, gentlemen.

Mr. DAVIDGE. At any rate you are saying something.

Mr. WILSON. I made a remark or two in reference to the affidavit of Mr. Miner, and perhaps a little farther along I will have to take it up again, but I do not care to discuss it further at this time, as the afternoon is nearly gone.

I have called your attention to the usefulness of this route. They have another badge of fraud in this case, as they think, and what is it? They have read to you, I do not know how many times, the letter of Boone, in which he said that this route was not needed at all. No, no; they did not want this route; they wanted to get rid of it, gentlemen; they had taken it too low, and he wrote a letter, saying that that was an unsettled region of country, and the woods were full of Indians, and that the Government had better discontinue this route entirely. Now, they say, "Here is that letter of Boone's right here in the Post-Office Department, and yet Brady did not abandon that route, and inasmuch as he did not abandon that route, with Boone's letter just looking him in the face all the time, he must have been in conspiracy with these people."

Gentlemen, if he had discontinued that route and relieved these contractors from putting on that service, these gentlemen would have been in here saying to you, "Now, there they got hold of one that was not going to be profitable; they were going to lose money on that" (as they have lost $40,000 or $50,000), "and therefore Brady let them out of it, and that is another evidence of fraud." That is the way they would have argued this case then.

Now, what are the facts, gentlemen? Boone did want to get rid of that route. Miner wanted to get rid of that route. It looked like a hard bargain, and it proved to be a hard bargain. But Brady would not let them out. Here is a most remarkable state of affairs. Here is a conspirator, according to their theory, working against his coconspirator; his coconspirator wanted to get out and Brady holding him fast. Now, why did he hold him? Here is the best evidence in the world, gentlemen, that there was no conspiracy about this thing. General Miles and Maginnis had been to see him; Lounsberry had written to him, and he knew that this was a service that was needed ; so he refused to let them out, but held them to their bargain. And then when he came to increase and expedite that route, if they had been allowed according to that affidavit they would not have more than got out whole.

Mr. BLISS. Which affidavit ?

Mr. WILSON. The affidavit in regard to one hundred and fifty men and one hundred and fifty animals. The fact in this case was that Mr. Miner was right about it, because if they had got the $150,000 that that affidavit would have given them they would have come out about even, perhaps making a little money. But Brady would not give it to them on that affidavit. They deal with this case just as though Brady had made an allowance to them according to that affidavit. But he would not do it. Instead of that he cut them down about one-half, and they lost money largely in attempting to carry that route. And whenever they did not carry the mail on that route exactly according to the requirements of their contract, he fined them and imposed penalties upon them, and there is now a very large amount of fines and deductions imposed upon them by him that stand unremitted to this hour.

Mr. BLISS. Your honor, I desire to correct Mr. Wilson's statement as to Brady remissions. Every fine imposed, except for lost trips, during Mr. Brady's time was remitted by him. The evidence shows that ; that there were fines imposed afterwards to the extent of some $13,000, and between $11,000 and $12,000 were not remitted.

Mr. WILSON. That is another instance of drawing a very fine bead in this case. Now, Colonel Bliss knows just as well as he knows anything that the fines that he is talking about were imposed just eight days after Brady went out.

Mr. BLISS. Yes ; by his successor.

Mr. WILSON. How was this thing done, gentlemen ? You know that all these reports come in from the postmasters, as I have told you ; that they go to the inspection division ; there the tables are made up, and these orders are made up and all that, and they come around in due course of time to the Second Assistant for his signature. Now, they are claiming credit for some things, when just after Brady had stepped out of the chair and another man had sat down, these things are brought in and that other man signed his name to it. That is the kind of stuff this case is made of, gentlemen of the jury.

Colonel Bliss has made a very neat mathematical calculation in this affidavit of Miner's about how many miles a horse would have to travel in a day if there were one hundred and fifty horses on that route. I have not had time to read that speech of his since he made it, and I may have misunderstood him. There is not much of it.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Very short.

Mr. BLISS. When you began you would not have said so, but now you have got up to about the same time.

Mr. WILSON. I am not up to you yet by forty-eight hours. Brief as it was, I have not had time to read it, but I understood him to make his calculation upon the hypothesis that one horse traveled by himself, and that every horse was engaged in carrying mails. Now, it so happened that two or three hundred pounds of mail are not carried with one horse, and it so happens that you cannot use all the horses on the route in carrying the mails, but more or less of them will get disabled, and more or less of them have to be used for other purposes than the mere hauling of wagons in which the mail is. They have to be used for furnishing supplies in that country. And at the time Mr. Miner made that affidavit there were no supplies in that country, and they had to haul them long distances. But certainly it is, at any rate, a matter as to which men might differ in opinion. If you were going to calculate the number of horses that would be required to carry the mail over a route where there were no supplies, I think that most any one of you would say, "Well, I will have one to carry the mail, but I will have to have two to furnish me with provisions;" or, "two to carry the mail and one to haul fodder for them," and that will take three. It was upon that theory that Mr. Miner made his affidavit, and Mr. Bliss expected to startle you with figures, for figures are what they expect to knock you down with.

Mr. BLISS. Mr. Wilson, let me call your attention to the fact that the carrier himself swears that he started out with one horse with the mail and transferred it from a buckboard to a sleigh at the time he went over the route. That is Mr. Lambert; and another carrier swears the same way. It is on that basis that I took one horse when I made my calculation.

The COURT. Suppose there had been two horses. When you are making an affidavit for increase over a previous service I do not see that it makes any difference.

Mr. BLISS. But Mr. Wilson was referring to my calculation of how many miles each horse would travel in a day. If it took only one horse, of course it would be less than two or more horses.

Mr. WILSON. That shows how fallacious that was, and it only confirms all I have been saying about my brother. I would not say that he wanted to wilfully mislead you, but he has got a sort of jaundiced mind in regard to this; that is the trouble. He cannot see it like anybody else, nor can he see it in a reasonable way. He takes as a criterion the time when they started out with this service, running once a week and getting along on a mule.

Mr. BLISS. I fix it at the time the affidavit was made. I am talking about the time when Mr. Miner made this affidavit as to how many men and horses were then being used and how many would be used. I take the time as it was then sworn to and the number of horses that they swore they were then using in carrying the mail.

Mr. WILSON. Well, when they were carrying it with one horse they would hitch that horse to a buckboard and transfer it to a sleigh, and there was not much mail.

Mr. BLISS. Two sacks.

Mr. WILSON. Two sacks then?

Mr. BLISS. Yes.

Mr. WILSON. Well, let us have it two sacks, if you please. When you come to increase that and take four-horse coaches and make it a daily mail going through in sixty-five hours, that makes a very different thing. Has Mr. Bliss made any calculation on that basis?

Mr. BLISS. Yes; I made a calculation of how many miles a horse would travel.

Mr. WILSON. But he takes one feature of this case and presents it to this jury, and that is the trouble with this whole thing.

Mr. DAVIDGE. We had better adjourn now.

Mr. WILSON. I am ready to adjourn now, if it suits the convenience of the court.

Mr. BLISS. What ruling does your honor make about meeting tomorrow morning?

The COURT. I do not know but the present hours are about as convenient as any others.

Mr. BLISS. It is a matter for the jury, I apprehend.

Mr. GREENE (a juror). Some of the jurors have suggested that for the next three days it would be well to meet at 10 o'clock and sit till 12, then take a recess for half an hour, and then sit until half past 2, if that would please the court and counsel.

Mr. WILSON. I would just as soon take those hours as any other.

Mr. GREENE. Only for the balance of the week. I have talked to some of the jurors about it, and I do not know that there would be any objection raised.

The COURT. Then we will meet to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock.

Thereupon (at 4 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the court adjourned until to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 16, 1883.

The court met at 10 o'clock.

Present, counsel for the defendants, the Government being unrepresented.

Mr. WILSON. [At 10.10 a. m.] Shall I proceed, your honor?

The COURT. Yes.

Mr. WILSON. [Resuming.] If the court please, and gentlemen of the jury, permit me this morning, in further support of what I have said to you two or three times in the course of my argument, to read two provisions of the regulations. I will read them without comment, further than to say that they show that this mail is to be carried according to a grand scheme:

SEC. 414. General duties of superintendents of mails.—Where superintendents of mails are designated, they will have entire charge of the distribution and dispatch of all mails at such post-offices. They will see that the distribution of the post-office is done in accordance with the latest official schemes; that such schemes are kept corrected to date, as per changes issued by division superintendents; that case examinations of distributing clerks on the official schemes of distribution are kept up.

That is to be found on page 107 of the regulations. Now on page 105:

SEC. 385. Distribution of mails by schemes.—Postmasters will carefully distribute and make up mails by the official schemes which may be furnished them, and will conform to any changes that may be made in the same by the superintendent of the division, and will take up and exchange only such pouches as may be ordered by him. But such post-offices may be excepted from the requirements of this section as the general superintendent may direct.

I only read these to you, gentlemen of the jury, for the purpose of showing that the department has its scheme of distributing these mails through the country, and it is the business of the division superintendent to look after that branch of the work.

Now, gentlemen, I come to another feature of this case that has been much commented upon by the counsel for the Government in relation to this business, and that is the affidavits made by the contractors. I do not want you to be in any degree alarmed as to the time that will be consumed in examining this feature of the case. I could not properly pass over this feature of it, although I am to be followed by gentlemen who represent the parties who were the active parties in respect of these affidavits, and who will, I take it for granted, give special attention to that branch of the case. As my client is involved in this matter of the affidavits, and as the affidavits were in a degree the basis upon which the allowances were made to these contractors in cases of expedition of service, I have thought that I could not do otherwise than give this matter some consideration. In the first place, gentlemen of the jury, in order that you may entirely understand the situation, I want to show you just what the regulations of the department were in respect of this subject as set forth and averred in the indictment itself. They aver in the indictment—and for the purposes of my argument I may accept that as being the truth—as follows, commencing on page 5:

[Mr. Bliss and Mr. Ker here entered.]

And that one William H. Turner was then and there a clerk of the said fourth class in the said office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and was then and there employed and engaged in performing the duties of his said office of clerk in the said office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General; and in obedience to the regulations prescribed by the said Postmaster-General, it then and there became and was the duty of him, the said William H. Turner, as such clerk as aforesaid, amongst other things, to attend to the said business in the said contract division of the said office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, relating to the mail service and carrying and transporting the mails of the United States on and over the several post routes in the States of California, Colorado, Oregon, and Nebraska, and Arizona Territory, Dakota Territory, and Utah Territory; and to mark and indorse upon all papers relating to contracts, allowances, and the said post routes in the said States and Territories, the true date when such paper was filed in the said office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and to mark and indorse upon papers and orders made and filed in the said office, and relating to the said post routes in the said States and Territories, the true dates when such paper and order was made and filed.

This is what I particularly desire your attention to:

And whenever petitions, applications, letters, oaths, depositions, statements, and papers were received and filed in the said office, relating and pertaining to carrying and transporting the said mails on and over the said post routes in the said States and Territories, to mark and indorse upon such petitions, applications, letters, oaths, depositions, statements, and papers the true date when each was received and filed; and to wrap and inclose every such petition, application, letter, oath, deposition, statement, and paper in an envelope and cover, commonly called a jacket—and to write and indorse upon the outside of every such envelope, cover, and jacket the true name, kind, and character of the paper so inclosed, with a true brief statement and description of the nature, subject-matter, and contents of every such paper so inclosed as aforesaid; and to arrange in proper and regular order, in separate packages and bundles, the papers received and filed in the said office relating and pertaining to each of the said post routes in the said States and Territories as aforesaid; and to receive, read, write, and prepare answers to letters and communications relating to the said post routes in the said States and Territories; and to write and prepare orders for allowances to be made to and deductions to be made from the pay of contractors engaged and employed in carrying and transporting the said mails on and over the said post routes in the said States and Territories aforesaid.

Now, gentlemen of the jury, they say in this indictment that that was the duty of the corresponding clerk and they say that that was the duty of Mr. Turner. He was to write a true brief statement upon the backs of these jackets; to carry on all the correspondence, to prepare all the letters, and prepare all the orders ready for the signature of the Second Assistant. Why is this, gentlemen? It is simply in order that the Second Assistant, having this enormous amount of business upon his hands, should have the whole thing stated truly and briefly upon the back of this jacket, so that he would not be required to perform what Mr. James has called an absolute impossibility, to wit, the reading of all these papers. The very scheme of the organization of this department was to have somebody whom they could trust to look into these details and to write out in brief just as you have seen written out in brief on an endless number of these jackets, I might say, a true statement of the contents, so that the Second Assistant in casting his eye upon a jacket would know the true contents of the jacket. Gentlemen of the jury, you have seen these jackets; you have heard the contents of these jackets read. There is not a man on the face of this earth who would have the courage to stand up before this jury and say that Mr. Turner made any false statements on these jackets of the contents of these papers. I say that much by way of vindication of Mr. Turner, although he needs no vindication, because already he has been vindicated by a jury of his country.

Mr. KER. We asked them to do it.

Mr. WILSON. They asked them to do it. Yes, gentlemen, after they had stained the name of Mr. Turner. After they had driven him in disgrace from his office by making false accusations against him. After holding him for three months and a half before a jury and before the country, proclaiming him as a criminal then they came in at the last hour and asked the jury not to find him guilty, but to find him not guilty, and my Brother Ker seems to be claiming it as a merit this morning. These gentlemen knew during all those long months they were doing this thing that there was not any evidence against Mr. Turner.

Mr. BLISS. Your honor, I submit that Mr. Wilson has no right to make that statement. He charges us with having retained Mr. Turner in the indictment when he says we knew during the entire period that there was no case against him. I submit that that is not true in fact, and that there is no ground on which he can make that statement to this jury.

Mr. WILSON. I say it is true, and I say it is true in the face of this jury, because, gentlemen of the jury, you have heard the testimony—

Mr. BLISS. [Interposing.] Your honor, I submit that this is not proper.

The COURT. [To Mr. Wilson.] Stop. When counsel are interrupting for the purpose of an objection, counsel addressing the jury ought to stop to hear it.

Mr. WILSON. I did stop to hear it and was answering it. He said it was not true in fact, and I was proceeding to answer it.

The COURT. An appeal was made to the court.

Mr. WILSON. I thought he was through.

The COURT. Of course in the heat of argument a man sometimes goes on before his time. I think that you have no right in addressing the jury to say that the counsel on the other side knew there was no case against Turner. We cannot speak of what men know. They are presumed to act in good faith.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I suppose he might go this far: that if they knew anything, they knew that.

The COURT. No.

Mr. BLISS. Your honor, I submit that he has no right to go into the Turner business at all. It is not before this jury. There is no evidence on the subject before this jury. He was discharged from this indictment before this jury was impaneled.

Mr. DAVIDGE. He was acquitted.

Mr. BLISS. By a request of the counsel for the Government. While there were exceedingly suspicious circumstances, still counsel did not think that on their oaths they could ask a conviction. All that is out of the question, and whether counsel knew, or anything of that sort, I submit they have no right to go into here before this jury. All they can say is that Mr. Turner has been discharged from this indictment. The circumstances, I submit, they have no right to go into.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I understand that the record is an item of evidence in this case. The fact that Turner was indicted and the jury found a verdict of not guilty is in evidence here.

Mr. BLISS. Yes.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Now, as to what they knew, I am the last man in the world to undertake to define that. But I think, if anybody knows anything, assuming that their evidence this time is not very different from what it was at the last trial, it may well be predicated of them that they must have known.

The COURT. They are not on trial as to what they knew or what they did not know.

Mr. DAVIDGE. The spirit of the prosecution is on trial.

The COURT. The record in the former case is not in evidence on this trial.

Mr. DAVIDGE. It has been distinctly given in evidence.

The COURT. The whole record?

Mr. DAVIDGE. The record about Turner.

The COURT. The evidence?

Mr. DAVIDGE. Not the evidence. That is no part of the record.

The COURT. What you call the record probably is the act of the court in regard to some particulars; but what in common and latitudinous meaning we call the record, in this case embraces the evidence, and so I say the record in the former case is not in evidence here.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I admit it. I never said it was.

The COURT. What we have here does not embrace the evidence.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Still it is the same case.

The COURT. It is undoubtedly true that it appears that Turner was indicted. That appears on the face of this indictment. It also appears that he was acquitted.

Mr. BLISS. Yes, sir.

The COURT. That is all there is in evidence in regard to that. Now, we are not trying Turner again. The prosecution have not given any evidence in this case, and will not be allowed to give any evidence in this case against Turner. So that you cannot go further into the matter than merely to remark, if you choose, that Turner was indicted in this case, and that he was acquitted at the former trial. Whether counsel knew anything of that kind is entirely beyond the line of argument.

Mr. WILSON. Your honor, if Mr. Ker had not interrupted me I would not have gone a shade outside of the record and outside of what I think your honor will consider to be perfectly legitimate argument in this case. Now, let us see. I read to you, gentlemen of the jury, a portion of this indictment. Turner is part and parcel of the indictment, although he had been acquitted. What was the scheme of the indictment? They there say that Turner was to make true brief statements upon the backs of these jackets. I am arguing to you that there is not the slightest evidence here that anything other than true brief statements were made upon the backs of the jackets. Is that within the line of argument? They have not pretended in this case that anything but true brief statements were made upon the backs of these jackets.

The COURT. Very well.

Mr. BLISS. On that point we raise no question of their right of argument; but we say there is evidence on that subject, and they need not go any further than the Bismarck and Fort Keogh route to find it.

The COURT. There is nobody on trial for that.

Mr. BLISS. We make no objection to the argument.

Mr. WILSON. Very well. He says there is evidence that the brief statements were not true. I submit the question to you to decide whether there is any such evidence as that. But, gentlemen of the jury, I care nothing for that. As Mr. Davidge suggests, the verdict settled that question in the former case.

Mr. DAVIDGE. That is in evidence.

Mr. WILSON. That is in evidence in this case. That is settled. Mr. Turner was to make these true brief statements, and these brief statements were made upon the backs of these jackets. What were these true brief statements to contain? The contents, in substance, of what were inclosed in these jackets, and among them were the affidavits. What was that done for, gentlemen? It was, as I said a moment ago, to avoid the necessity of the Second Assistant taking up these papers and reading them in detail. I present that to your consideration for the reason that they have made an argument here that we ought to have taken not only all these petitions, but all these affidavits and held them up to the light as these gentlemen have held them up to the light before you.

Mr. DAVIDGE. That we ought to examine them with a microscope.

Mr. WILSON. Somebody had to be trusted, said Mr. Postmaster-General James. Somebody had to be trusted in this matter. The trusted subordinates were selected not by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General. They were appointed by the Postmaster-General to do this work. The work of the Second Assistant was to take these jackets and these brief statements and make the orders as he saw proper to make them. I say this much, gentlemen of the jury, for the purpose of showing to you that in the very nature of things, in the very nature of the organization of that office, in the very nature of the distribution of the duties and work in that office, General Brady was not called upon to scrutinize every one of these papers just as you have been called upon to scrutinize them on the trial of this case. The regulation provided for affidavits. Complaint was made that Brady accepted these affidavits. These affidavits were certainly to be considered. They say he ought not to have accepted them; that he ought not to have taken these affidavits; that he ought to have gone beyond these affidavits; and that if he did not resort to some other mode to find out whether they were true or not he is to be held criminally culpable. The very fact that the regulation required affidavits and provided for affidavits shows they were to be considered. It would have been simple and foolish to have made such a regulation if those affidavits were to be absolutely ignored and no attention paid to them by the Second Assistant. Why make such a regulation if they are to have no weight, and if they are to have no consideration? It would be a very strange thing, gentlemen of the jury, to make a regulation requiring a contractor to make an affidavit on a particular subject, and then turn around and treat that contractor and all contractors making affidavits as a pack of liars. And yet that is the logic of this case. General Brady has told you he did not see fit to do that; that he took it for granted that they were honest men and were stating in their affidavits what they honestly believed. But he was not governed, as I will show you presently, exclusively by these affidavits or controlled exclusively by them. There had to be some guide in this business. The Postmaster-General adopted this affidavit system. Whether he adopted it wisely or unwisely is not for you or me to consider. He adopted it as a guide in respect of this matter. He made the regulations. Gentlemen, how was this thing done before? The court put that question to me some days ago at a moment when I was not prepared to answer it. I have the answer here. I almost fear to use it lest I may be accused of going outside of the testimony in this case. General Brady, in his testimony, on page 3391, speaks of the subject, and refers to the document I have before me which accompanied the report of the Postmaster-General to Congress for the year 1881:

Practically, when I went there, the same system was pursued that was adopted by myself. The rule had not been written out and put in the regulations—

That was in 1876—

but it was the same. There was one instance—I do not know but it was Mr. Tyner' who had some queer notions, and he took into consideration the amount of soap, and candles, buckets, harness, and so forth. But I know of but one instance of that kind that obtained before I went there. I know that practically the rule was the same as was afterwards put into the regulations published a year or so after I came there. I adopted the rule, as a matter of course. I did not see any better rule to adopt then, and I know of no better rule to adopt now.

If there is any objection to my showing how it was done before I will not do so. It is not in evidence. It is part of the Postmaster-General's report.

Mr. BLISS. You had better not go out of the record.

Mr. WILSON. It is an official document.

Mr. BLISS. I raise the question because there is in some one of the reports made during this régime that we are reviewing, a statement which I am satisfied myself, by a personal examination of the record, is an incorrect statement. I therefore object to going outside of the record.

Mr. WILSON. This is an exhibit to the Postmaster-General's report.

The COURT. It does not follow that every exhibit to the Postmaster-General's report is evidence. If it is competent evidence, then it is admissible on the report. It need not be proved except the truth of the document. But, this is objected to.

Mr. BLISS. If that is all that he refers to—the particular page or two pages he has before him—I will not make any objection. The matter is not in evidence, but I will not raise the point.

The COURT. Then you can read it.

Mr. WILSON. Now I will show you how they did it:

TAMAWA, ILL., January 8, 1876.

DEAR SIR: In compliance with your request for a detail of cost beyond a mere statement of increase of stock and carriers necessary to expedite the schedule on route No. 31187, from Austin to Fredericksburgh, I herewith submit the same.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. C. KIMZEY.

Hon. J. N. TYNER,

Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Estimated cost of carrying the United States mail on route 31187, three times per week, from Austin to Fredericksburgh, Tex.

James C. Kimzey, being first duly sworn, doth state that from expenditures actually made, and other information believed by him to be reliable, the foregoing estimates are true to the best of his knowledge and belief.

J. C. KIMZEY.

Sworn and subscribed to before me this 8th day of January, 1876.

B. G. ROOTS, Notary Public.

That is the way Mr. Tyner did it.

The COURT. Did Tyner accept that affidavit?

Mr. WILSON. They give it here as being what was done.

Mr. BLISS. That was an affidavit annexed to a report of Mr. Gibson published in the Postmaster-General's report of last year, not as a part of the report, but as a report made to the Department of Justice. The Department of Justice having declined to publish it, it was put in there.

The COURT. It seems to be an affidavit of the contractor, and I do not know what the department did with it.

Mr. BLISS. I do not know, sir.

Mr. WILSON. I am only giving it to you for the purpose of showing how this thing was done when Mr. Tyner was expediting. He asked the contractor for a more detailed statement than he had before him.

The COURT. Did he give the contractor all he wanted?

Mr. WILSON. I do not know. I have not gone into that particular case. I do not give it for the purpose of showing he gave all the contractor wanted. I only give it for the purpose of showing how they got at this thing, and what elements they regarded as being proper to be taken into consideration.

The COURT. But the affidavit of the contractor does not show that. You must have some action of the department to show that that was their practice at that time.

Mr. WILSON. The letter transmitting this statement says:

In compliance with your request for a detail of cost beyond a mere statement of increase of stock and carriers necessary to expedite the schedule.

Now, he had made a statement of the increase of stock and carriers necessary to expedite the service, I presume, just as General Brady said was the practice, and just as this regulation provided, and Mr. Tyner asked him for a more detailed statement, and when he got that detailed statement he simply got a detailed statement by the contractor under oath. I only present it for the purpose of showing that they were relying upon the statements of the contractor. They had no other means of doing it. They had to rely upon the statements of the contractor. How on earth could the Post-Office Department get at this thing in any other way unless they had a horde of men at their command to travel about the country and make these investigations? But I will show you in a moment that General Brady had a check upon this thing. Mr. Tyner adopted the rule I have referred to for the purpose of informing himself. Evidently in that case the contractor had filed the usual affidavit as to the number of men and horses. This letter shows that he had done that. Mr. Tyner asked him for a more detailed statement, and he gave this more detailed statement just as he could have given it to him if he and Mr. Tyner had been sitting down at the table together and if he had picked up this affidavit. "How do you get at this?" "I get at it thus and so. It will require so many men to drive, so many horses to do the work, and so many stock tenders. It will require an expenditure of so much in the way of feed, blacksmith's bills, and all that sort of thing," setting down all the items before him. That is the way the contractors got at the thing, gentlemen of the jury, before Mr. Brady went in there and the way they got at it while he was there, and the way, I presume, that they get at it now, although I do not know about that.

Mr. BLISS. If Mr. Wilson desires, I will make no objection to having brought in in the morning from the Post-Office Department the entire record in that particular case and we will see just what was done. I never have seen it and do not know.

Mr. WILSON. I haven't either. Gentlemen, I am not arguing that question. I am only showing to you how they get at this thing. That is all. They are complaining of us because we followed the regulation that was made by the Postmaster-General. That is what they are complaining about.

Mr. BLISS. My point is that you were claiming that there was another affidavit presented. I do not know whether there was or not.

Mr. WILSON. No. I simply read that letter to Mr. Tyner from the contractor, in which the contractor refers to the fact that he had furnished a statement in accordance with the regulation.

Mr. BLISS. I understand you to say you declined to agree to the suggestion of having the papers sent for and brought in?

Mr. WILSON. I do not want to try that case.

Mr. BLISS. We have no right to ask it and do not ask it.

Mr. WILSON. I do not know anything about the facts. I do not know whether that was too much or too little, or anything about it. I am only showing to you how the matter was done. I would not even have referred to it if his honor had not called my attention to it the other day. Now, gentlemen, I think I need hardly argue to you further than I have already done in regard to this matter that the question of the number of men and horses that are necessary to carry the mail on a particular schedule, and the number of men and horses necessary to carry it on a proposed schedule, is a question about which men would differ. It is a question about which there can be no mathematical accuracy. You cannot tell. It depends upon the roads. It depends upon the facilities with which you can get supplies. It depends upon the country through which the route goes. There are many contingencies about it, and just because of these contingencies you cannot get at it with mathematical accuracy. It is, more or less, an estimate. They have, as I have before said, attempted to show to you that these affidavits stated the number of men and animals too low or too high, as the case might be, by showing what some subcontractor used. That is not the test, gentlemen. It is not what some subcontractor used who was trying to perform the service as cheaply as he could and did not perform it. That is not what was called for under these regulations. The contractor was required to state under oath the number necessary; not necessary for one month or two months, or three or four or six or twelve months, but for four years or for the life of that contract—whatever the life of the contract might be. Will you point me, gentlemen of the jury, to one single witness who has testified here as to the number of men and animals that were necessary to carry that mail—necessary to carry it so as to perform the service according to the contract? What witness have they brought here to testify as to that? They have brought you, I grant, many witnesses—men who drove the wagons or rode the horses, or had the subcontracts, to prove to you how many they used; but not one of them that I can now recall to mind has testified as to how many were necessary. In every case, as well as I can now recall the testimony to mind, when they testified as to how many they used, they were compelled to testify that they did not carry the mail according to contract. That proves that their testimony is not sufficient to show how many were necessary. Upon that kind of testimony they want you to find that these affidavits were false in their statements. You cannot do that, gentlemen of the jury.

Now they say that Brady accepted these affidavits as true. He says that he did not treat the men who made the affidavits as rascals. He says that he treated these affidavits as having been made by men who honestly believed that what they stated was true. But was he guided by those affidavits solely? Did he have no check upon them? Did he blindly accept these affidavits? No, gentlemen, unless you utterly disbelieve him. Why? He says that from his observation, from the information that he had acquired, he had ascertained that it was worth about $30 a mile for good service in that region of country. Now, of course, the cost of the service in different regions of country will vary; but in that country, a new country, a country being developed, he had learned, after his own way, that it was worth about $30 a mile for good service.

The COURT. What do you mean by good service?

Mr. WILSON. Efficient service; service running about four miles an hour, is what he says.

The COURT. How many times a week?

Mr. WILSON. That would depend upon——

The COURT. [Interposing.] One price per mile would be good compensation for once a week, but it would be very inadequate compensation per mile for six or seven times a week.

Mr. WILSON. Certainly. The $30 a mile was for once a week during the year.

The COURT. That is what I understand; for once a week.

Mr. WILSON. Yes; $30 a mile for once a week.

The COURT. What expedition?

Mr. WILSON. He thought about four miles an hour was the proper speed to run the mails through that country. Of course you cannot make every mail route run at exactly the same speed.

The COURT. Nor at the same time of the year.

Mr. WILSON. Of course you cannot. As a general rule they make the schedules running the whole year through in the same way. In one or two cases they had a practice of making a longer schedule in the winter and a shorter one in the summer, but there is no such case here where they had a summer and winter schedule. That grows out of the condition of things, the character of the country, the climate, &c., through which the route passes.

Now, he says that was his guide. When a contractor filed an affidavit which did not conform substantially to that rule, what did he do? You find all through this case that he refused to allow them according to what they had stated in their affidavit, and he required them to come down, and he made a special bargain with them, allowing them in the neighborhood of $30 a mile, according to the particular circumstances of the case. Some of them were as low as $22, and some of them went above $30 a mile. That was the test he applied to those affidavits. You may say it was not the best test, gentlemen, but the regulation, mark you, provided for the affidavits. Now, he put a check upon these affidavits by ascertaining what he regarded as being a fair compensation per mile for the service, and he applied that test to these affidavits and determined upon the amount that he would allow by virtue of that test and the affidavit, or in connection with the affidavit.

Now, gentlemen, they may say to you that $30 a mile was too much. If it was too much, they ought to have proved it. They ought to have proved by somebody that $30 a mile, or the range that he has given you here, was an exaggerated amount to pay. That is a thing that is susceptible of proof, and they ought to have proved it.

But they say, gentlemen, that these affidavits were altered, and he ought to have known it. Now, assume, for the purposes of this argument that I am making to you, that they were altered, just as these gentlemen say they were, and that they were sworn to in blank just as these gentlemen say they were, and that the numbers of the men and animals were put in after they were sworn to. Then what? Have they proved to you by any man, have they brought to you a witness, have they brought to you a circumstance that indicates that General Brady had any knowledge of that fact whatever. I defy these gentlemen to point to a syllable of testimony in that direction. Here, as I have shown you, by reading from this indictment this morning, was a man whose duty it was to put those affidavits in a jacket and to make an indorsement upon that jacket and present it to General Brady; and you know from the regulations and the course of business in that department that not one of these affidavits or papers ever came to General Brady until it had first gone to this corresponding clerk. Such papers make their first appearance before General Brady when inclosed in the jacket with this true brief statement indorsed upon it. Does not that show to you, gentlemen of the jury, that he never saw those affidavits until they came to him regularly sworn to and inclosed in that jacket? How did he know that a blank had been filled up, if it was filled up as these gentlemen state? How did he know that an affidavit had been changed, if it was changed as these gentlemen say it was? You will see, gentlemen of the jury, that, from the very nature of things, it was impossible for him to know it. When it came to him, it came to him wrapped in this jacket with this true brief statement upon it. Now, why should he take out an affidavit to see whether or not it had been changed? Mr. Turner or Mr. Brewer had made that true brief statement upon it, and what does it show? It shows upon the face of it that the contractor swears that it required so many men and horses on the existing schedule and so many men and horses on the proposed schedule. What necessity for him to open that jacket and hunt out that affidavit to see whether that corresponding clerk had stated the truth about it.

Mr. BLISS. Mr. Wilson, do I understand that you claim that there is any jacket in this case which states on the outside the number of men and horses?

Mr. WILSON. If I had one of the jackets I would show it to you.

Mr. BLISS. I do not think there is one that states it.

Mr. WILSON. My recollection is otherwise, but I do not care about that, gentlemen of the jury. Let us take it upon his hypothesis, and see how this thing will work out. There is stated upon the back of the jacket the amount of the present pay, and the amount that would be required under the proposed schedule. It is the duty of the corresponding clerk to make that calculation. He makes that calculation upon what basis, gentlemen? Why, upon the basis of the affidavit, does he not? Now, why should General Brady look into that jacket and get out that affidavit to see if the corresponding clerk had carefully and properly done his duty, which was to make a true brief statement? In the nature of things, gentlemen, you know, from the manner in which this business is done and from its magnitude, that he would rely upon the brief statement that was made upon the back of that jacket, as he had a right to rely upon it. And, therefore, I say it is conclusive that General Brady never knew that there had been any affidavits sworn to in blank and afterwards filled up, or any affidavits changed, even if the fact be as they claim.

But even if he had taken out the affidavit and looked at it, then what? Why, they say he would have seen here that in certain places the number of men and animals was filled up in a different ink, evidencing that it was not written at the same time when the body of the affidavit was written. Well, now, suppose he had seen that; suppose he had opened it, looked at it, and seen that; I will venture to say that there is not one man in a thousand who would suppose that that had been filled up after it was sworn to in blank. Why, gentlemen, he had a right to rely upon the integrity of the officer before whom the affidavit was sworn to. Here is a notary public or a clerk of the court who affixes his certificate to the jurat that this affidavit was sworn to before him on a certain day by a certain man, and he puts his seal of office to it. Now, that imports verity at least; prima facie that is true. But they say now that General Brady ought to have suspected that officer of having certified to a lie. I say that he had a right to rely upon it. Are you going to presume wherever you see a paper with a word interlined, signed and sealed by somebody and acknowledged before some public officer, that that must have been interlined after it was signed? Or will you presume that it was interlined before it was signed? Why, certainly you will presume that it was interlined before it was signed. If you were a public officer acting upon that paper I do not believe that it would be an evidence that you were doing a criminal thing because you did not suspect, and act upon that suspicion, that it was interlined before it was signed. If General Brady had taken out these affidavits and looked at them and seen all this in them he could, with the utmost propriety, have supposed—and he could have acted upon that supposition—that that paper was then in the exact condition that it was at the time it was sworn to before the officer whose certificate was attached to it.

Gentlemen, I deny that these affidavits were sworn to in blank. I say the evidence is not sufficient to establish it. I admit that Rerdell swore to it, but I deny that that proves anything. I admit that there was one affidavit, that of Perkins, that is proved to have been sworn to by him in blank; but I say that the evidence in this case shows—and I do not think anybody will ever, successfully at least, dispute it—that that affidavit was not used, but another affidavit was used instead.

Mr. BLISS. Brady told Congress it was used.

Mr. WILSON. Well, gentlemen, Congress asked him for those papers——

Mr. DAVIDGE. [Interposing.] Your honor, I object to these interpolations during the argument. I recollect that when we interrupted Mr. Bliss in opening this case he became very much irritated on one or two occasions.

The COURT. I think the interpolation was out of order; but where counsel are misstating the evidence——

Mr. BLISS. [Interposing.] I have endeavored to confine myself to that. He says nobody will claim that that affidavit was used. I stated that we claim that Brady told Congress it was used. I have confined myself strictly in my interruptions to cases where there has been a misstatement of the evidence; at any rate I have meant to.

The COURT. That is an additional fact; it is not a correction of the statement that he was making.

Mr. WILSON. The evidence in this case shows that that affidavit was not used. Do you deny that? Do you claim that it was used?

Mr. BLISS. I claim that Mr. Brady said to Congress that it was used, and then I say in fairness that there are some indications from the calculations that the other one was used.

Mr. WILSON. The calculation is what settles it, and Mr. Bliss knows that that calculation settles it, because the calculation is made upon the basis of an affidavit, and the calculation was not made on the basis of that affidavit, and that settles that.

Gentlemen, they could prove without any trouble that the Perkins affidavit was sworn to in blank. Why did they not prove it as to all of these others? Mr. J. S. Taylor was the notary public down in New Mexico who took the affidavits of Peck that he swore to there. Wainwright took the affidavits of John W. Dorsey in Vermont that he swore to there. And here was Kellogg right here in Washington who administered the oath upon some of these affidavits, and if they were sworn to in blank, Kellogg was right here and could have proved that fact. There was no necessity for swearing to them in blank before Kellogg, because he was right here, and he could have inserted the number of men and animals. It would have been an easy thing for these gentlemen, if these affidavits had been sworn to in blank, as they say they were, to have brought those gentlemen here and proved the fact, just as they did in the Perkins case. But they did not do it, and the fact that they did not do it is sufficient for our purpose in this case, and sufficient to warrant me in saying that it is not true, or they would have proved a thing so easily proved as that.

But they say that on these affidavits the number of men and horses was filled in at a different time from the body of the writing. I admit, gentlemen, that as to many of them that is evidently so. I think there is no doubt about it, and anybody looking at them can see it. You will find, for example, where an affidavit is written out, and then you will find the number of men and animals written in in a different ink. That is shown right upon the face of it. I think, however, that I can give you a very consistent reason why that is so, and I think I can show you how that is absolutely consistent with entire integrity upon the part of Mr. Miner and everybody else who had anything to do with it.

As I said a while ago, this matter of ascertaining the number of men and horses necessary is one of calculation. Suppose you are going to put in an affidavit as to the number of men and horses. That being a matter of calculation, it would be perfectly natural—nothing unnatural or suspicious about it—for you to sit down and write the body of the affidavit and then take up a pencil and piece of paper and calculate how many are necessary on this branch of the case, and then how many were necessary on the other branch of the case, and then perhaps consult with somebody about it. If it was Miner and Vaile, they would discuss the matter with each other as to how many were necessary. Why, gentlemen of the jury, just such things as that happen throughout all the business affairs of life. After they had settled upon how many would be necessary for the one and for the other, then they would fill in that blank and swear to it. So you see, gentlemen of the jury, that in that way these contractors might have prepared, and most probably did prepare, these affidavits; or, after having prepared the affidavits and fixed the number of men and animals, they may have concluded that they had got it wrong, too much or too little, and erased a word and put in another. If they were going to carry on a scheme of fraud, you would not have found these things in these affidavits. They would have been as clean as a ribbon. There would have been no interlineations and no erasures. Everything would have been done up in apple-pie order, as we sometimes say. But, the very fact that you find these affidavits in the condition they are is an indication to my mind that it was not a scheme of fraud that they were in, but that they were endeavoring to ascertain what was the truth, and then to make these affidavits as they conscientiously believed the truth to be.

A portion of what I was going to say in regard to this matter I am going to pass over, simply because I know I am taking too much of your time, and I want to pass on.

Now, gentlemen, I have gone through with these routes, one by one, and called your attention to them, so far as any acts of General Brady are concerned, and so far as the evidence relating to the necessity or propriety of the service is concerned. I have not troubled you with the orders permitting subcontracts to be filed or withdrawn, for it seems to me they cut no figure in this case. Nor have I troubled you with orders directing change of address. I have not dealt with those things in any detail, nor do I propose to. I have attempted to show to you that every one of the orders made is entirely consistent with innocence of this accusation, and if they are, then the law settles it that they are not adequate to establish guilt.

I trust you will not forget that the offense charged in this case is a conspiracy; that these parties combined, confederated, and agreed together to defraud the United States.

I have referred you already to the operations of the department as to fines and remissions. I have already called your attention to the mail bills, the introduction of which was at the suggestion of General Brady, for the purpose of seeing that these parties performed the service as their contracts as expedited required.

You have here this remarkable situation of things: General Brady, who is charged with having conspired with these parties, devising means by which he should catch the men with whom he is alleged to have conspired in failing to discharge their duty in respect of the matters as to which they say they conspired. Now, gentlemen, very naturally, if there was a conspiracy, you would expect that there would be no fines and deductions made, because that would be taking money out of their pockets instead of putting it in. Brady, however, relentlessly imposed fines and deductions. And not merely that, gentlemen, but we have produced to you here on the defense case after case where he refused to make remissions of deductions that had been made.

I want to call your attention now to what they say about these fines and deductions in the indictment. One of the means by which they allege that this conspiracy was to be carried out was that Thomas J. Brady fraudulently refused to make deductions from the pay of these other defendants for failures to perform services in accordance with the contracts and agreements. They say that a part of the means was that he was to refuse to make deductions. Have they proved anything of that kind, gentlemen? Have they shown you a case where he refused to make a deduction when it came to him through the inspection division? Not one. But, on the contrary, all the testimony in this case shows that that averment in the indictment is absolutely and unqualifiedly false.

Now, gentlemen, I repeat that I have gone through with these acts of General Brady to show you that you cannot extract from them proof of conspiracy, and thereby to show you that if the Government has got any case against him it must be found elsewhere.

The prosecution must prove much more than these orders. They must prove that those acts that were done by him were done from corrupt motives; that he did them for personal gain, and not from such considerations as I have been presenting to you.

Now, gentlemen, I am strongly sustained in this and in all I have said, as I think, by what the court has said, and in proof of that I read to you from page 3264 of this record:

The COURT. I probably was a little hasty when I said there were two objections to this paper, one of them being that it was not within the time laid down, and the other being that it could have no influence on the question. In regard to the second point I had not fully considered it. Since then I have recurred to a certain line of authorities and principles which I think make this paper competent evidence. At this stage the court cannot assume that the Government has established fraud at all. That is the question we are trying. The motive of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General is very important matter in the issue we are trying. It is everything.

I cannot say that a man charged with a crime can prove himself innocent of that crime by proving that he has not been guilty of another crime. That, of course, cannot be done. But where the evidence is in the same line of business, the same kind of transaction, and the act offered to be proved tends to throw light upon the motives of the party in doing the act he is charged with doing, I think it is competent evidence, although it may be subsequent to the commission of the other act. On the ground, then, that it may throw some light upon the motive of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General I think it is admissible.

Now, gentlemen of the jury, as I said, these orders, in and of themselves, every one of them, are in the direct line of the lawful duty of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General. They say he ought not to have made them. I say that they were orders that he was called upon either to make or to refuse to make, and he had to decide. He made them. They say that they were fraudulent orders. They say they were corrupt orders. I say that they must prove that, not by the orders themselves, but they must prove that that motive was a corrupt motive, and they have to prove that, gentlemen, beyond a reasonable doubt. At page 4745, Mr. Ker, in his speech, said :

It is true we have not been able to show by anybody that money was actually paid to Thomas J. Brady.

They recognize the importance of showing, and they have been attempting to show, that somebody paid money to Brady. It is the testimony touching the question whether any money was paid to Brady that I now propose to consider.

In the line of, and as a part of, my argument to you, and for the purpose of showing to you that at least I am very strongly supported in my views of this case, I want to read you part of what the court said at the former trial, at page 979 :

The COURT. In the progress of this trial, I have seen piles of petitions from men of the highest standing in the country, official and otherwise, to the Post-Office Department for increase of service and expedition upon these routes. Now, looking on the face of those papers, I cannot see anything to condemn in the conduct of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General in complying with these petitions. He is not to be supposed to have gone over those routes himself, but he acts upon the petitions before him as a public officer must in all cases. You have not brought home to him any facts, so far as I can remember, to show that in ordering these expeditions on these routes and the increase of service, he acted from any improper motives, because he is backed by these petitions from gentlemen of the highest position in all quarters of that country, and men presumed to be acquainted with the routes, and with the improvements and industries that are springing up in this new country. If I had seen that there was anything in the evidence to bring home a reasonably strong suspicion of improper motive on the part of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, I should not hesitate to go further into this and investigate it. But there is no evidence of that kind ; the contracts are apparently sustained by petitions, and the petitions justified the Postmaster-General in doing what he did.

Now, gentlemen, I only refer to that for the purpose of showing to you that the Government in proving this case must go farther than the proof of these orders. They have got to bring proof that Brady acted from corrupt motives. And it is simply because they have to produce evidence of that kind, gentlemen of the jury, that they have brought here the testimony of Walsh, of Rerdell, of Cable, and McLellan, all of which is intended to establish to the satisfaction of this jury the alleged fact that Brady did receive money from these contractors who are alleged to be co-conspirators with him. That is the purpose of that testimony. That is the reason that is brought here. And now I propose, gentlemen, to examine that testimony, and see whether or not that, in connection with the other testimony in this case, shows that these contractors, the co-defendants with General Brady, paid him money for these orders ; and I will take up these witnesses now in the order I have named.

First. I want to consider the testimony of John A. Walsh. Now, you will remember, gentlemen, that the question is, does the testimony of these witnesses prove that these contractors paid money to General Brady? For motive is the great question in this case. Did he make these orders in the honest discharge of his duty as Second Assistant Postmaster-General, or were they bought from him with a price? Now, Mr. Walsh testifies, and what is his story, gentlemen of the jury? He says that there was an interview between him and General Brady over at Sheridan's room. He says that he wrote a note to General Brady asking him to meet him there. And these gentlemen made a great deal of noise over the fact that we did not ask Brady anything about that note. That is not a material thing in this case, gentlemen. They met there frequently; there is no doubt about that. Brady says it was a sort of general rendezvous for those parties; whether they met on that particular day or not he does not know. The note asking him to come there was a matter of no consequence. They met there frequently. The note says nothing about what the meeting was for, and whether they met pursuant to the note, or casually, or by verbal request, is a matter of no sort of consequence in this case. It is what occurred that is of consequence. He says, at page 2207:

Agreeably to the terms expressed in that note General Brady met me at the house of General Sheridan, and after some desultory conversation, which just now I cannot recall, we touched on the subject of the difficulties that Jerome J. Hinds at that time was causing the Post-Office Department and the Second Assistant Postmaster-General. I expressed it as my opinion that Mr. Hinds would make a very great deal of trouble for Mr. Brady; that he had expressed a determination to do so, and I thought had every disposition. General Brady remarked that he did not care particularly about Mr. Hinds; that Mr. Hinds was powerless to affect him. We may have and probably did discuss some other subjects before coming to the point, which was the payment of the notes of General Brady that I held, amounting to about $25,000. General Brady asked me if I had the memoranda or data with me. I responded that I had. I had the notes in my pocket. I had also memoranda as to other amounts than expressed in the notes.

And then he goes on to speak about this alleged indebtedness of Brady to him:

Mr. Brady sat there listening to me. I told him that everything was pretty well determined except as to the matter of interest; that there was no interest expressed on the face of the notes; that that matter had been held in abeyance and that now would be a proper time to adjust it; that the time had come when I desired the payment of the notes, for the reason, among others, that I needed money. Mr. Brady sat there very calmly at the table turning the papers over in his hands and putting them down; he looked at me inquiringly and asked me if I was in earnest. I told him yes, I thought I was. He asked me if I did not think that that matter had been pretty well and fairly liquidated. I asked him to explain. He entered into an explanation without any sort of hesitation. He reminded me of the fact that I was in the enjoyment of a very remunerative contract.

Q. What contract was that?—A. From Albuquerque, New Mexico, to Prescott, Arizona.

Q. You held that contract?—A. Yes, sir; at that time. He informed me that he had expedited that very largely, had increased the service; the pay had been largely increased as the result, and that he did not really think that he owed me anything; that he did not see how I thought he could possibly owe me. I reminded him of the fact, as I had repeatedly told him, that the contract, even viewed from that standpoint, was unremunerative; that it had been a source of no profit to me; on the contrary, a loss; that he himself was largely instrumental in my ever having entered into it, and that I felt that such increase and expedition as had been accorded me was made under the law. He smiled at that, and asked me if I had not seen cases where petitions, &c., very numerous and largely signed, had not effected any result whatever. He then referred to the fact that after he had cut my trips down from 1876, that all the petitions that had come from that country had not succeeded.

Now, mark you, gentlemen, see what this man is saying. He does not pretend that there was any arrangement between him and Brady—of course not—that for the expedition of this route anything was to be paid. And yet he says that Brady coolly informed him that although—because that is the substance of it—there had been no understanding between them, yet Brady coolly informed him that he was to pay him for that service. Now that is done, gentlemen, for the purpose of impressing upon your minds that because he did that to Walsh he must have done it to these parties.

He said, in brief, that the matter of petitions was simply to enable him to act within the law, and that any man might have understood that, not seeing half as much as I had.

Now, look at that for a moment. You see petitions coming in from all over this country asking for this service—petitions, with which Brady could have had no possible connection. And yet he says that Brady said to him that the petitions were simply to enable him to act within the law.

I asked him what he meant by saying what I had seen. He referred me to the Price and Peterson drafts, and said that I ought to have been able to have divined from them what was the custom. I asked him what was the custom; that I still could not understand from those drafts; all I knew was the existence of the drafts but how they came to be made, and what they were made for, was none of my affairs and none of my business; that he had turned them over to me to his credit, and that it was not my province as a banker to inquire into the cause of their being made. He told me that my affectation of not knowing what the terms were was rather ridiculous; that I should know. I told him that I did not.

Now, mark this:

He said that the amount that he exacted, as a rule, was 20 per cent. of the amount of the pay that was increased (the total increase of pay over the original contract)—20 per centum of that multiplied by the term of the contract.

That is what Brady said he exacted from the contractors, and that is brought here for the purpose of showing that these contractors in this case paid Brady 20 per cent. or some other per cent. of the increases. Then he goes over a great deal that is not necessary for me to read.

Q. Go on with the conversation.—A. He further informed me that I owed him $8,000, as my pro rata for the Congressional corruption fund. I do not know that he stated it that way.

* * * * *

The WITNESS. That $8,000 was the amount of my part of the pro rata to contribute towards the passage of the appropriation bills, and the star route in Congress. I told him that I had not authorized any disbursement of money; that I had been a witness before the Congressional committee that was investigating the subject of star-route matters; that I felt that I had probably been as largely investigated as most any contractor, and that it had not cost me a cent; nobody had asked me for any money, and in a general way I expressed some doubts as to the money having been spent, and reminded him, further, that I had refused to contribute to Chase Andrews, who had approached me.

He told me that that would not do; that I must not expect that those things could be done without some sort of effort, and that they always cost money. He then reminded me, further, that there had been a remission of fines and penalties in my case, and that the percentage that he was accustomed to receive on such occasions was 50, and that if I proceeded carefully to debit and credit his account, he thought that I would find that he did not owe me anything. I had remarked by that time the absence of the papers from the table.

Now, gentlemen, Walsh said that Brady told him that it was the custom to receive, on the matter of remissions, 20 per cent. of those remissions. That is what he testifies to. Now, gentlemen of the jury, you know that is not true, as a matter of fact. I am not talking about what Walsh says. But you know it is not true, as a matter of fact, that

Brady received any such 50 per cent. of these remissions. And why do you know it? Why, gentlemen of the jury, we have shown to you that those remissions were made, and we have shown to you by an official of the Sixth Auditor's office that whenever a subcontract was on file, they sent the remissions to the subcontractor. What better proof can you want in this case that that is a lie? Here is a subcontractor who gets, say, 65 per cent. of the expedition. They produce to you various subcontracts here, in which it is stated just how much of any increase of compensation by reason of expedition the subcontractor shall get. When all the fines are imposed the subcontractors, according to these contracts, have to bear those fines and deductions. And why? Simply because that was the mode used by the contractor to compel the subcontractor to perform his duty; and if he failed, the deduction was made from him; and if there was remission, of course the remission went to him. And we have proved to you here by the officers of the Sixth Auditor's office that when they made those remissions they sent the money to the subcontractor, to whom it belonged. Now, you know that Walsh's statement about that is a lie.

Now let us go a little further:

By Mr. MERRICK:

Q. What papers?—A. My notes and memoranda that I had given him. When the conversation had assumed this shape, I thought perhaps the matter was getting pretty serious, and I asked General Brady what he meant by taking the notes. He said he meant to make a settlement of that in that way; that that was a settlement of it; that that account was audited, and was dismissed. I asked him if he thought that I was going to submit to that. He asked me what I could do. Well, I suggested mildly—

Now, if Walsh had been a great, stalwart fellow, like I am, you know he would not have suggested that "mildly." But being an effeminate, weak, timid sort of a man, he suggested it mildly—

Well, I suggested mildly that I might go to the court. He remarked that I might go there, and perhaps it was all the good it would do me; that probably I ought to have learned enough by this time to find out that appeals to any of these tribunals were not productive of any great results.

* * * * *

A. That was substantially an end to the interview. I talked to him further about my willingness to sell out in relation to my remark that the service had been unproductive of results to me; that I had lost money; that I had originally gone into the matter because he told me that the contractors were reputable people, and that I might loan them the money with safety; that my being a contractor was a matter of chance; that there was no solicitation on my part; it was really the result of necessity; and that, waiving the moralities of the matter altogether, it was not fair to treat me as he would his other contractors; that I did not come under that classification. He remarked that if I did not make money out of the contract it was because I did not know the business. I told him that that was possible. That I had accepted the contract and had attempted in good faith and to the best of my ability to perform the service; that I had performed the service; that I had stocked the route with the best mules and the best stock that had ever gone to the Territory, and that I felt convinced that there was absolutely no money in it; and I generally took occasion to doubt that contractors had agreed to pay any such money. He assured me that I was mistaken; that I was in error about it; that it was painfully obvious that I did not understand the business, and the best thing that I could do was to sell out.

This conversation was had, Brady having taken from him $25,500 of notes and put them in his pocket.

That I was willing to sell out—perfectly willing, and that he could aid me in finding a purchaser if he wished to; that he was potent, certainly, with his contractors, and that I would willingly sell out at a sacrifice. He told me that that was the best thing I could do. I do not suppose you want that part of it wherein I was approached by the contractors to sell out, do you?

* * * * *

Q. What else, if anything, passed at that interview, and how did you part?—A. We parted very much as philosophers. He seemed very philosophical and he seemed satisfied. I was very anxious to sell out then; more anxious than I was before.

* * * * *

Q. You have already stated that, and in a connection where it is appreciable, I think. Did he say anything about what you may have supposed to have been his reason for making these expeditions?—A. Oh, well, he said that he didn't think for a moment that I thought it afforded him any amusement to make expedition. I told him that I didn't know that I did, but I supposed the law directed him. He said that petitions simply enabled him to act within the law; that the petitions were matter of form. The petitions worked all right if it was all right; and when it was not, they didn't.

Q. He said that?—A. No, sir.

Q. Do not state anything but what he said.—A. I will refer to what he did say. He cited me petitions that produced no effect.

Q. Does anything else suggest itself to your recollection of what passed in that interview?—A. No, sir; not now.

Mr. MERRICK. That is all I have to ask him that I now think of, your honor.

By the COURT:

Q. Did you get your notes?—A. No, sir; I went away.

He went away as a philosopher, after Brady had taken the notes, put them in his pocket, and told him that this thing was settled up; that the account was audited and closed. He put the notes in his pocket, and he says they parted as philosophers. Gentlemen of the jury, that is the testimony of Mr. Walsh in this case. It seems from his own testimony that there was nobody there but himself and General Brady at the time this interview occurred; nobody there but these two. Brady says that there is not a word of truth in that story; not a word. You have it resting therefore, so far as the mere matter of the statements of the two men are concerned, upon the statement of Walsh on the one hand and the statement of Brady on the other. To my mind, gentlemen of the jury, that story is absolutely incredible. It is preposterous to suppose that General Brady would deliberately tell John A. Walsh or anybody else that he had thus been committing crimes. Walsh wants you to believe that General Brady told him that these contractors in the Post-Office Department were paying him 20 per cent. of all increase of service, and 50 per cent. of the remissions that were made of fines and deductions. Now, I say in the very nature of the thing that is absolutely preposterous. I cannot conceive of a man of sense and character thus putting himself absolutely in the power of a man like John A. Walsh, and doing it at the very time that he was robbing Walsh of $25,000 worth of his property. Just think of it. He picked up $25,000 worth of these notes and put them in his pocket and said, "That is settled." "How settled?" "Why, I charge all contractors so much money on these increases. I make them pay it, Mr. John A. Walsh, and you can go and tell it if you want to." Just think of it! If he had stolen these notes from Walsh how absolutely improbable it is that he would in the very next breath give John A. Walsh the evidence of his corruption in office. The thing is absolutely preposterous. But, gentlemen of the jury, I say that the evidence is overwhelmingly the other way. Recollect now, he does not say that Dorsey paid Brady 20 per cent. He does not say that Vaile or Miner or anybody else paid him 20 per cent. or any other per cent., but he makes this cover all these contractors, everybody. He makes it broad enough to sweep the entire country. It is introduced for what purpose? To prove that Miner paid him money, that Vaile paid him money, that Dorsey paid him money, and that Peck paid him money. That is what it is introduced for. Let us see how the testimony stands. They have got to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that he was paid money; that he was corrupted; they have got to prove it beyond a reasonable doubt. I say the story in itself is improbable. Then on the other hand General Brady says that it is not true. In addition to that Stephen W. Dorsey swears that he never paid Brady one farthing, and Vaile does the same and Miner the same, and so through to the end of the chapter. These men concurrently swear that no such money were ever paid. So you have John A. Walsh on the one hand and all these witnesses upon the other, and these records against it, too, because, gentlemen of the jury, when you come to look into these warrants that they have brought before you, you will find them all going in the direction where these parties could not out of that money have paid General Brady a single solitary farthing. Up to the division of these contracts Vaile got this money. You recollect that. After that, for a quarter or two, Dorsey got it and then it went to Bosler, and so on. The record itself shows that this money did not go to Brady; it did not go in that direction. It went into other channels. They have not traced a farthing of that money into the hands of Brady. So that, gentlemen of the jury, while Walsh swears that Brady told him this improbable story you have Brady and all these other parties and these records disputing and denying that fact. When you put the one in one scale and the other in the other can you say that they have proven by the testimony of Walsh that money was paid to Brady? I say, gentlemen, that it not only does not prove it beyond a reasonable doubt, as they must prove it, but that the preponderance of the evidence is overwhelmingly the other way.

Now, by whom next do they undertake to prove this? By the testimony of Rerdell. [To the court.] Is the court going to adjourn at 12, or sit right along to day?

The COURT. I shall try to accommodate you.

Mr. WILSON. Anything will suit me. I want to get through, and I will accommodate myself to the wishes of the court. I thought I would have been through by this time; but I am not.

The COURT. Do you think you will close to-day?

Mr. WILSON. I will.

The COURT. We will adjourn at half past 12 o'clock, if you can go on.

Mr. WILSON. I can go on until then very well.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Will the court adjourn then for the day?

The COURT. No.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I thought the arrangement was to take a recess.

Mr. WILSON. The jury want to leave at 2.

Mr. BLISS. If we are going to adjourn at 2, let me suggest that 12 o'clock will divide the time better.

Mr. WILSON. It is not material to me.

Mr. BLISS. I see it was announced yesterday, or suggested by Mr. Greene, that we meet at 10 o'clock and sit until 12, and then take a recess for half an hour, and then sit until half past 2, if that would please court and counsel. I do not know but what some of the jury may have acted under the belief that that was the arrangement.

The COURT. The court said it would meet at 10, and would accommodate all parties concerned as well as possible.

Mr. WILSON. Suppose we take a recess for half an hour now, and I will close at 2 o'clock, or probably before.

The COURT. We will take a recess until half past 12 then.

At this point (12 o'clock m.) the court took a recess until half past 12.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. WILSON. Gentlemen, here is the best place in all my argument to make an apology. I want to apologize for my Brother Bliss and my Brother Ker in that they consumed so much time in the argument of this case. I think that an apology to you through me from them is necessary, because, having now traveled the same road that they did, I find that they could not have gone over the ground they did go over in much less time than they did. All that I said, therefore, about their making their speeches immortal by making them eternal, and all I said about the opening of this case being compared to nothing else on earth than the crater of Vesuvius, I want to take back.

Mr. BLISS. All right. That is handsomely done.

Mr. WILSON. Now, gentlemen, a word more. The apology that I have made for them I hope I may have the benefit of myself.

Mr. CARPENTER. It counts for you.

Mr. WILSON. I say I hope I may have the benefit of it myself. I have done the best I could to get through with this case in the shortest possible time I could, and I have omitted to say many things that I had intended to say.

Now, gentlemen, I come to the testimony of Rerdell. He is one of the witnesses by whom, in connection with Walsh—I am going to try to state this thing fairly as to their position—they attempt to prove that these contractors paid Brady money. How do they seek to prove it by Rerdell? They first prove that certain books were kept in which charges were made against Brady under an assumed name, or a false name; second, that Dorsey paid money to Brady, and third, that Brady advised him to copy the books so as to keep the real books from the committee. These three facts that they have sought to prove by Rerdell they seek to use for the purpose of showing that Dorsey and these other contractors paid money to Brady.

That is the purpose of it. In other words, gentlemen of the jury, they bring here this statement of Rerdell in regard to these books. In the first place, let me suppose that there were just such books as are claimed to have been kept in this case. Let me suppose that Rerdell did keep exactly that kind of books. Let me suppose that Dorsey did give to Rerdell that very identical memorandum. Let me suppose that every one of those entries was made exactly as Rerdell states they were made in that book. I want to know, gentlemen of the jury, how you are going to charge that up against General Brady. Does anybody pretend that he ever saw those books? Does anybody pretend that he knew that those entries were ever made—supposing they were made? Does anybody pretend that he ever heard of these books until Rerdell made that statement which he made to James and Mac-Veagh, a denial of which, in the form of an affidavit, was subsequently published? General Brady tells you he never heard of that thing until it came out at that time. Nobody pretends that he ever did hear of it, because even when Rerdell said he told him about copying the books he does not pretend that he told Brady what was in those books. So you have a case, gentlemen—I am talking now about my immediate client—where they are seeking to make a circumstance against General Brady by what? By what somebody else wrote in somebody else's books of which he had no knowledge. Upon the same principle, gentlemen, if you adopt that as testimony in this case; if you would allow that to make any impression upon your mind in this case as against my client, applying the same rule—for if it is good here it is good anywhere, under all circumstances—one man can make evidence against another man, no matter where he may be. Any merchant, any mechanic, may make evidence against anybody else; or anybody else may make evidence against him. I say, gentlemen, that that thing is monstrous. It is a principle that cannot prevail in the minds of just men. The law will not allow one man to make testimony against another man. The law will not allow one man to confess for another man that that other man has been guilty of some crime. The law does not tolerate a thing of that kind. Common sense and common justice revolts against such a proposition. Yet these gentlemen come to you and they argue to you that because there were such books (and for my present purposes I am assuming that there were), without a shade of evidence that Brady ever knew or heard of them until the time that I have stated, that you are to allow that to have weight in the scale as against my client. It cannot be true, gentlemen of the jury. But, gentlemen of the jury, I deny that there were any such books. Do not understand me as conceding that there were any such books. I deny it. I say the weight of the evidence in this case, although it does not come properly within the range of the argument that I have to make to you, is against there being any such books and especially, as I will show you, that it is against there being any such entries in those books, if any books were kept. Where is the evidence of such books ever having been kept? You have the testimony of Rerdell upon the one hand. You have the testimony of this man Gibbs, who could not recollect certain things until just a few days before he testified, although he had been talked to about it over and over, and inquired of about it over and over again, and did not remember; yet one day, just before he came on the stand and testified, all at once it flashed upon his mind that there was such a name as Smith on those books. He never could remember it before. Then you have the testimony of Donnelly. You have those three. Donnelly says he copied a book. Upon the other hand, you have the testimony of Stephen W. Dorsey that no such book was ever kept. You have the testimony of Kellogg, in whose office these books were kept, according to Rerdell, openly, where Kellogg must have known it if there were any such books. Kellogg swears there never were any such books there. Then you have the testimony of Torrey that there were no such books. Rerdell swears he sent one of these books to New York to Senator Dorsey and that he went over to New York and got that book in the presence of Torrey and carried it away. Torrey says there never was any such book there, and these other two witnesses swear that there never was any such book there. I deny, gentlemen, that there were any such books. But, as I said a moment ago, concede that there were such books. What then? You cannot use that fact against my client, because he had no connection with them whatever. Now, gentlemen, I admit that Mr. Rerdell could manufacture such a book as that. He had the capacity to do it. He is the man who would do it. He not only had the capacity to do a thing of that kind but he has demonstrated to you that he is the character of man who is willing and ready to do just that kind of thing. He says those books were opened by a memorandum that was given to him written by Senator Dorsey. Without going into any detailed argument about that thing, you could not fail to observe, gentlemen of the jury, that there was at least—allow me to state it as mildly as I can—very great doubt thrown upon the integrity of that memorandum by the Government's own witness. They put Mr. Boone upon the stand and they showed him that memorandum. It was vital to them to show that that memorandum was written by Stephen W. Dorsey. They wanted to prove that Stephen W. Dorsey wrote that memorandum in order to bring it squarely home to him. They could not rely upon Rerdell to prove that Stephen W. Dorsey wrote that memorandum. They could not trust him. They knew they could not trust him. They knew he was a disgraced man. They knew that perfectly well, and therefore they must help that out. Nobody would believe that Stephen W. Dorsey did that upon the testimony of Montfort C. Rerdell. Nobody would take his testimony for anything. Therefore, this being a very vital point for them, what did they do? Here was Boone who knew Dorsey's handwriting perfectly well, and when they brought him on the stand, knowing the importance of fixing this thing upon Mr. Dorsey, they showed him that memorandum and asked him in whose handwriting it was, and he said that down to a certain point, where everything was perfectly innocent and cast no discredit upon anybody, it was the handwriting of Stephen W. Dorsey. Boone said down to a certain point, every part of which is perfectly consistent with all the facts of this case, it was written, he thought, by Stephen W. Dorsey; but as to the balance of it he did not think Stephen W. Dorsey wrote it. That is to say, when you come down to that part of it where the Smith and the Jones figure on the memorandum, that part of the memorandum which is intended to apply to my client, the Government's own witness, Mr. Boone, does not corroborate Mr. Rerdell as to that having been written by Stephen W. Dorsey. So that when you get to the vital part of this memorandum the greatest discredit is cast upon it by the testimony of the Government's own witness.

Are you, gentlemen of the jury, going to punish anybody on the testimony of Rerdell? Are you going to take his statement in regard to matters of this kind, and thereby convict somebody of a crime? Are you going, upon his statement as to what he entered in books, to say that Dorsey paid to Brady the sums of money that he entered on these books? I apprehend not.

Gentlemen, suppose any one should come to either of you and make an accusation of a grave character against a neighbor of high character, and suppose that while he was telling his story you should detect him in picking your pocket or robbing your money-drawer. How much credence would you give to such a man's story against your neighbor? Suppose he should come and tell you that your neighbor had written a certain paper, indicating his connection with an infamous, a criminal transaction, and at the same time should exhibit another paper and assert that it was written by your neighbor, when it was palpable to your senses that the latter was a lie. How much credence would you give to the former?

Suppose he exhibited to you a letter which he told you he received through the mails, and you at once discovered that it never came through the mails, how much credit would you give to the statements of such a man against your neighbor? And suppose before he got through with his story he should frankly say to you that he had repeatedly sworn falsely; that he had time after time upon one occasion and another occasion sworn falsely. How much credit would you attach to the story of a man like that? Such a man is Rerdell. I am not going to waste adjectives on him. Right here in your presence he was acting as the party, as I said in the beginning, to a vile scheme. I want to acquit these learned counsel of any participation in that scheme. I want to acquit my Brother Merrick and these other gentlemen, for Mr. Blackmar has stated since I commenced my address in this case that Mr. Merrick rejected the proposition. I give him credit for it. I want to acquit Mr.

Blackmar, too. Mr. Blackmar was doing simply what he was instructed to do. But does that help Rerdell? That is the question. What kind of a man is he? That is the question we are looking into. He has shown to you his willingness and his eagerness to sit around the table with his codefendants. He has shown to you that he was a traitor, that he was a spy, that he was writing down what transpired between the defendants and their counsel and carrying it to the counsel for the Government. Nobody will deny that after Mr. Blackmar's statement. What kind of a man is he? Can you conceive of a man more depraved in his character, more utterly abandoned and wicked in his character than Montfort C. Rerdell? That is the kind of man Rerdell is. He admits that he did try to control the construction of this jury in the interests of the Government. He did his best to do that thing. And not only that, gentlemen. You recollect how all through this case the prosecution have struggled to bring Stephen W. Dorsey into connection with the business as a party in interest while he was a member of the Senate of the United States. From the beginning of this trial down to the close of the opening argument of my Brother Bliss there has been a great struggle in this case on the part of the Government to put Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey in the attitude of a party in interest in these contracts while he was a member of the United States Senate. Now, gentlemen, away back in September of last year Mr. Rerdell had an interview with Mr. Woodward. He wrote out a statement for Mr. Woodward and he swore to that statement. He was then going over to the Government, you remember. Mr. Woodward told him that would not do; that was not enough. I think I quote his precise language. Woodward said to him, "That is not enough," after he had made the statement, and sworn to it. Then he went off to Hartford, and made another statement and that was not enough, although he swore to it. Then he came down here, and about the time the trial was beginning made a supplemental statement. The first you recollect was not enough, and he was making more. Now, mark you, it was important to get Stephen W. Dorsey associated with this thing while he was in the Senate. When Rerdell came on the stand there was produced before you, gentlemen, that Chico letter. The first we ever heard of it was when it was produced by the prosecution and handed to Mr. Rerdell, he having previously given it to them. That was the more, as I think, that he was furnishing to Mr. Woodward when Mr. Woodward had told him that he had not given him enough. Gentlemen, the very moment you saw that you saw that there was something about it to indicate that it was a fraud; and although this man Rerdell swore unblushingly that he received that letter from Stephen W. Dorsey, and that Stephen W. Dorsey wrote that letter, yet the Government's own witnesses said that Stephen W. Dorsey did not write that letter. You saw the envelope. It never came through the mail. That man Rerdell manufactured that letter for the infamous purpose of showing to this jury and convincing this jury that Stephen W. Dorsey was interested in this business before he left the Senate of the United States. It was for that purpose, or it was for no purpose under the sun. Now, if he would manufacture a thing of that kind, would he not manufacture in this case anything to suit his purposes? Everything that that man has touched, everything he has said in aid of this prosecution, is to be regarded with the most extreme suspicion, to say the very least. In all these fourteen days—not too long a time, I grant you—and in all the picking up of circumstances that lay strewn around through this case—

Thick as autumnal leaves that strow the brooks
In Vallombrosa,

everything that they could lay their hands upon they have apparently discussed, but they have studiously avoided saying a word about the Chico letter. By their silence they confess that that was an infamous fraud injected into this case by this man Rerdell for a vile, mean, wicked, criminal purpose, because it is criminal to do so wicked a thing as that. He has not only told you, gentlemen of the jury, that he swore falsely, but he has told you that he was perfectly willing to steal Dorsey's property; to take it by false pretenses. He is perfectly willing to do that, and I think that the Chico letter shows that he was perfectly willing to commit a base, mean forgery. So much for those books. That is all I am going to say about them. What is the next thing that Mr. Rerdell is called upon to testify about, for the purpose of showing that Dorsey paid Brady money? He tells you that on one occasion he saw Dorsey go to Middleton's bank and get some money, and then they went from there to the Post-Office Department, and then Dorsey told him to step into Turner's room and wait for him and he would go to Brady's room; that Dorsey went on and went into Brady's room and came back. From that you are called upon to infer that when Dorsey went into Brady's room he paid Brady that money that he got out of the bank. That is the inference that is to be drawn from that. Gentlemen, there are in connection with that the foot-prints of a very artful villain. This thing is the lie by insinuation. It is the meanest of all lies. Look at it. "I saw Dorsey draw money. He and I walked to the Post-Office Department. He told me to go into Turner's room and he went into Brady's room. Don't you see, gentlemen, how that was done? He got me out of the way so that I should not see him pay that money. I didn't see him pay that money." He wants you to draw the inference that the money was paid. I say it is a lie by insinuation, and the meanest of all lies. It is the same kind of a lie that the miserable debauchee tells when he winks and nods and smirks to his companions as a lady passes along the sidewalk. He does not say a word about her, but he foully asperses her character by his winks and nods and smirks without saying a word. It is the same kind of a lie that Iago told to the dusky Moor about the fair and the pure Desdemona. That lie so inflamed the mind of Othello that

Trifles light as air

became to him

Confirmation strong as proof of Holy Writ, and the fair Desdemona, innocent and pure, became the victim of her husband's wrath because of an insinuated lie. It is the same kind of testimony, the same character of testimony, which these gentlemen are relying upon by this proof from Rerdell to show that Dorsey paid money to Brady. Now, gentlemen, in the first place Dorsey did not get that money, as some would have you believe. There, you see, is the sum and substance of the whole thing, for if he did not get the money of course he did not pay it to Brady. We brought the checks here, and an examination of those checks confirmed the testimony of Dorsey that he never did any such thing. The checks show he did not do it, although Rerdell located the time. The only sum of any considerable amount that was paid at about that time was a check drawn in favor of Rerdell himself which Rerdell himself indorsed, and on which Rerdell of course got the money. He took it to Dorsey, and Dorsey carried it with him to New Mexico.

Mr. BLISS. There is no evidence of that.

Mr. WILSON. Dorsey says so.

Mr. BLISS. No, I think not.

Mr. WILSON. I may be mistaken.

Mr. BLISS. There was a promise given that where Mr. Dorsey took that money should be accounted for, but it was not carried out.

Mr. CARPENTER. Rerdell got the money.

Mr. BLISS. And Dorsey says brought it to him.

Mr. WILSON. Yes. They did not then go to the Post-Office Department as Rerdell said.

Mr. BLISS. Not on that $7,500 check.

The COURT. There is no question about the $7,500 check.

Mr. WILSON. Brady and Dorsey both deny this thing. They say there is no truth in it. Now, what is the next thing, gentlemen of the jury, in connection with Rerdell so far as General Brady is concerned? He says that Brady suggested to him to copy these books. Brady denies that. Rerdell says he never talked with Brady more than five or six times in his life. Brady says that he never talked with him but very few times, scarcely at all, because he tells you he did not like the man then any better than he did after he had disclosed his true character on the witness stand. I believe that I can trust Brady's denial as against Rerdell's affirmation, especially as Rerdell says to you that there was no special intimacy between them. Now, as to this letter that is alleged to have been written. Nobody pretends that Brady ever saw the letter. Bosler says he never received any such letter. The Government put Bosler on the stand for the purpose of showing that such a letter had been written to him. Bosler they cannot discredit. Bosler says that no such letter ever came to him. He kept files of his letters, and he had searched for it and no such letter ever came to him. He said moreover that a letter containing such things as that could not have come to him without his recollecting it. They cannot discredit their own witness. They put Mr. Bosler on the stand for the purpose of showing that such a letter came to him and he denied it. But even suppose it had been written? Is my client to be bound by what other people write in their letters? If you adopt that rule, I could ruin every man in this jury box before to-morrow morning. They come here and say, "Why don't you produce these books?" I presume my brethren do not put that question to me. They do not pretend that my client ever had those books? The gentlemen who represent other parties in this defense will no doubt have occasion to discuss all that matter, and I need not weary you with it. They certainly could not put that question with any seriousness to me or to my client, because they do not pretend he ever had these books. The same is true with reference to these stubs, &c. Need I waste your time so far as my client is concerned about that? I know you are not going to draw any inference against my client because he did not produce a book that he neither kept nor had nor ever saw, and they do not pretend that he did.

Now, they have got another thing that they are relying upon as against General Brady. They say that away back in June, 1878, John W. Dorsey, sitting with some men around a camp fire out in Dakota, said that they had formed a ring in Washington and that they were going to have the assistance of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General in the matter of increasing and expediting service on that particular route.

The COURT. Was that in June, 1878?

Mr. WILSON. June, 1878.

The COURT. I thought it was July.

Mr. WILSON. I think it was in June.

Mr. CARPENTER. June.

Mr. KER. August, 1878.

Mr. BLISS. I think it was some time as late as August.

Mr. WILSON. My recollection is it was when John W. Dorsey went West to put the service on.

Mr. BLISS. He went West in June.

Mr. CARPENTER. To put this service on.

Mr. WILSON. He had just gone out there to put on the service.

Mr. BLISS. No. He started the trips from Bismarck on the 1st of July, before he went to Fort Keogh, and had the interview with General Miles; so that it was afterwards.

The COURT. It was in the latter part of July, I think.

Mr. WILSON. Very well. I do not care whether it was June or July. My recollection is that it was June, but I will call it July. They say, then, that in July, 1878, John W. Dorsey made that kind of a statement, not using my client's name, but the words Second Assistant Postmaster General. I would like to stop, gentlemen, and read the testimony of these two men for the purpose of showing to you just exactly how the thing was stated by both of them; but I will not detain you. Suppose John W. Dorsey did make such a statement as these two witnesses have detailed to you.

Mr. BLISS. The interview with General Miles appears to have been the 28th of July, 1878, and the transaction was after that time. Miles fixes it by an indorsement.

Mr. WILSON. I am admitting your statement as to the time. Suppose he did. Suppose John W. Dorsey had said that very thing. I cannot see that there was any occasion for his saying it. I cannot see any particular reason why he should have talked to these men at all about this thing. But suppose he did. My client was not there at all, and I say he is not bound by what Mr. John W. Dorsey said away back in 1878. But, gentlemen of the jury, I want you to bear in mind that this matter of repeating conversations three or four or five years after they have occurred is dangerous. Such evidence is the most dangerous evidence that ever came before a jury, because the change of a word makes a very material difference in the meaning of a sentence. Here we had an illustration the other day. On the first day of my address to you in this case, I believe it was, a gentleman came to me and said "Mr. Chandler's boy is drowned." That was a very serious matter. It turned out that the word that was sent here was not that he was drowned, but that he was found. The little fellow had strayed away from his mother and got lost and they had found him. There is an immense difference between drowned and found, although only the change of a word. Five years afterward some man might come here and repeat that the boy was drowned whereas in fact the message was that he was found. I could give you many illustrations. You know how it is, gentlemen, in your own experience. A man makes a statement to you. You misapprehend him entirely. If you were to go off and repeat that statement as you misunderstood him, then you would convey a false impression to the party to whom you made that statement. If that false impression were not corrected, and years went by and the man was called upon to say what you had said to him, he would still have that first impression that was wrong. In the present case years have intervened to make changes and to dim memory, and you are called upon to hear the testimony. There is a certain direction in which testimony is sought, and no matter how honest you may be, the very fact that the thing is drifting in a particular direction and that it is sought to make an impression in a particular direction would only have a tendency, perhaps entirely unconsciously with you, to stimulate your memory in that particular direction. The result of it all, gentlemen, as every lawyer knows, is that when you come to repeat a conversation years after it has transpired, such testimony is the most uncertain of all testimony. We cannot recollect here things that occurred but a few days ago, statements that were made but a few days ago. In the intense excitement of this trial, where every man's attention is fixed upon this very matter, we cannot remember testimony for three days. We cannot state it accurately three days after it is given. How will it be five years from now, if one of you gentlemen were called upon to state what a witness swore to in this case, when your attention was riveted upon that witness, and when your duty required you to know exactly what he said? Do you think you could repeat it with accuracy? Would you be willing to swear that he swore thus and so? No, gentlemen. How is it about these two witnesses? One of them came here at the last trial, as he tells you, and testified. He was here for some months, as I recollect it, or weeks, at any rate, and this particular thing, so vital in this case, this particular thing which is intended to prove that Brady was to get money out of it, was never alluded to by him at all. He says the reason it was not was because he was not asked the question. Now, how is it about the other man—Cable, I believe, his name is? He tells you he was not here at the last trial, and Pennell came all the way out there to Dakota to get him as a witness. You recollect the circumstances—how he got off the train, and they went to the hotel and dined together, and Pennell asked him whether he recollected a conversation out at that camp-fire in 1878, and he told him he did. He told you the extraordinary story that, although Pennell had gone all the way West for the purpose of subpoenaing him, he never asked him what he knew about the matter, never asked him what the conversation was about, never intimated to him what that conversation related to or what it was that he was to come here to testify about. Without any sort of intimation from him except the simple fact that he recollected the conversation, he was subpoenaed and brought here, hundreds of miles, to testify in this case. Gentlemen of the jury, you may believe that. All of you may believe that. I do not believe that. It is too unnatural. It is too unreasonable. This Government was not going to bring a witness here at enormous expense to testify in regard to a matter without knowing anything whatever about what he was going to testify to. That man did not tell the truth, in my judgment. But whether he did or not, in the first place, such testimony, as I said, is utterly unsatisfactory in its nature. It is utterly unreliable, because it is merely repeating a conversation, and repeating a conversation years after that conversation is said to have occurred. But more than that, gentlemen of the jury, as I said before, it is one of those things that you cannot fasten upon my client unless you adopt a theory and a principle in this case that would be utterly and everlastingly subversive of the rights of every citizen in this country.

The COURT. The evidence was not admitted as against your client.

Mr. WILSON. I know, your honor, but they have argued as though it were, and therefore I am compelled to refer to it. As I understand, the court said at the time that this testimony was not competent against my client. So that is out of the way, gentlemen, and I need not have taken so much time in its argument.

Now, gentlemen, let us come to another thing. I am only going to allude to it briefly, because I am under promise to this jury to quit at 2 o'clock, and I shall do so, or within a very few minutes after that time. They say that this memorandum and these books showed entries against my client of thirty-six thousand and odd dollars. When, gentlemen? Mark you, in June, 1879. You may take all the orders that were made up to that time. All this, remember, they say was given to him in May, 1879. Take the list of all these expeditions that were made up to July, 1879, and the aggregate of the whole of them would be about $56,000. I am talking about the Dorsey routes now. Mr. Miner says the increases and expeditions both amount to about $76,000. Now, mark you, gentlemen, of all these expeditions the subcontractors got about 65 per cent. You recollect that testimony. They have shown you these subcontracts. I will put it at 65 per cent. on an average for the subcontractors. Nobody pretends that Brady got any of the subcontractors' money or that Dorsey got any of it. They want you to believe that, taking the increases and expeditions both, $75,000, and allowing the subcontractors 65 per cent., yet that Dorsey had actually paid to Brady $36,000 on account of that. They want you to believe it. I say it is absurd right upon the face of it. This record shows that it is not true.

Mr. BLISS. The memorandum does not speak of $36,000.

Mr. WILSON. There was $36,000 in all charged up.

Mr. BLISS. That went on to the books before they were recopied in the spring of 1880.

Mr. WILSON. Call it $18,000. I will take it in that way. The thing is absurd, gentlemen of the jury, for the additional reason——

Mr. CARPENTER. [Interposing.] It was all before the end of June.

Mr. WILSON. Certainly it was.

Mr. BLISS. What was?

Mr. CARPENTER. All the charges.

Mr. BLISS. There is no evidence of that.

Mr. CARPENTER. Yes; the testimony shows it.

Mr. BLISS. I think not. The memorandum is here.

The COURT. The memorandum contains no date.

Mr. BLISS. Mr. Rerdell says the memorandum was obtained in May or June. I think the memorandum accounts for only $18,000. That is my recollection, and there is no evidence of anything beyond that, except what appeared when the books were copied in 1880.

Mr. CARPENTER. You are wrong.

Mr. BLISS. I think not.

Mr. CARPENTER. Yes, you are.

Mr. WILSON. I am willing to take their figures. The statement is absurd enough anyhow, but it is particularly absurd for the additional reason that there was no payment made upon any of these routes until after July, 1879, and could not be.

Mr. BLISS. The Mineral Park route was increased $22,000 in 1878, I think.

Mr. WILSON. These gentlemen apparently, cannot understand the logic of their argument and the logic of this case. Gentlemen of the jury, during that period of time Mr. Vaile was drawing the money, was he not?

Mr. CARPENTER. Every dollar of it.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Vaile drew the money up to April. I am talking about what Dorsey had done. They do not pretend that any of the Vaile money went into this memorandum or into these books. Vaile drew all the money up to April, 1879, because he had become the treasurer of this concern. Then Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey got a portion of these contracts, and what they are trying to prove is that Stephen W.

Dorsey, for the purpose of getting these contracts expedited, was paying these large sums of money to Brady. That was it. Now, from April, 1879, to the end of the next quarter, for they paid by quarters, was the first of July, and in addition to that, gentlemen of the jury, it would take them a good part of a month at the department to get ready to pay for that quarter. So that in this very quarter that these gentlemen are talking about when they say Dorsey paid this money—we will say only $18,000—to Brady he had not received a farthing from any of these contracts; not a farthing.

Now, gentlemen, I have gone over all the evidence by which they undertake to prove that this money was paid to Brady, and I say that they have not proved it, and that they have fallen very short of proving it. Instead of proving it, I say that when you take all the testimony in this case it will appear that it is impossible that any such payments could have been made. Brady denies it, Dorsey denies it, Vaile denies it, Miner denies it, and these record facts stand up here denying it with the utmost emphasis.

There is another matter that is referred to in connection with this case which I wish to consider briefly. They say that Brady violated the law in creating a deficiency. I do not want you to misunderstand me about that.

Remember that the extent of the service is always under the control of the Postmaster-General. He can add trips or take them off, he can increase the speed and he can diminish it within the contract limits. He can, therefore, at all times control the amount expended and keep within the appropriation. If the service he has created it is found will exceed the appropriation he can cut it down so as to keep within it. Now, a little history:

The country had emerged from a period of great stagnation, during which everything had been at a stand-still. Specie payments were resumed on the 1st of January, 1877, and the country entered upon an era of unexampled prosperity. Great discoveries of minerals occurred in the West. Thousands of people went there for that reason. Others went there and filled the valleys with their flocks and herds. They were clamorous for mails, as I have before shown you. Now, the Postmaster-General and General Brady discussed this subject, and I will show you what was said.

The COURT. Before you proceed, I have the record of Rerdell's testimony, at page 2249:

Q. When was this?—A. It was in the latter part of May, I think; after my return from Colorado. I returned in the early part of May.

That was in answer to Judge Wilson. Then Mr. Merrick asked:

Q. That was in the spring of 1879?

And the witness answered:

A. Yes, sir.

I understand him to refer there to that memorandum which was handed to him by Dorsey at that time, and which bears out your construction of the evidence.

Mr. WILSON. I thought I was right. Of course it is impossible for me to run through all of this evidence. I have to rely much upon my memory. I am always glad to be corrected where I make a mistake, but I thought I was right in that case, and it seems I am.

Now, gentlemen, as to the discussion between the Postmaster-General and the Second Assistant. They went on increasing this service, and this is what occurred. I read from page 3392 :

Q. What communication did you have with the Postmaster-General with reference to the matter of increasing and expediting the service and the manner of doing it during the period that you made these increases and expeditions ?

That was objected to, and then there was a little discussion, and the witness went on :

A. Judge Key became Postmaster-General some time in March, 1877. Previous to that time there had been some increases of service. Of course there is always somebody wanting some office, and during that spring there was quite a fight made on Brady, and it was especially charged that he had been extravagant, and all that sort of thing, in the conduct of the Second Assistant's bureau, by virtue of these increases, &c. The matter was thoroughly investigated and brought to Judge Key's attention.

* * * * *
Mr. MERRICK. * * * Let us get at something that has some significance.

The WITNESS. This will have significance : Judge Key discussed the matter with me as to what had been done—

Recollect this was in 1877—and said to me at the conclusion that what I had done was right ; and, in answer to my direct question, said I should continue that policy until he notified me to the contrary. Frequently after that, when matters would come up that I did not feel like acting upon myself, I would go to Judge Key and discuss the matter with him. And he was even more liberal than I was. And so it ran along until in 1879, when, if the hundredth part of things were done that we were asked to do, there would have possibly been an excess of expenditures over the appropriations. Then the matter was discussed in the fall of 1879, whether we should go ahead and increase and expedite service, as we had been doing, and appeal to Congress to make good the probable deficiency. He authorized it, and it was done. The appeal was made to Congress, and Congress sustained it. And there was nothing ever done in the Post-Office Department, while I was there as Second Assistant, that to my knowledge did not receive the consent and assent of the Postmaster-General.

Now, you see, gentlemen, that here was the situation I have already very briefly described. The people were clamorous for this service. The department had been going on increasing and expediting, and they saw that this thing was going to exhaust the appropriations made for that fiscal year, and they discussed the matter whether they should continue to increase and expedite or what they should do, and it was the conclusion between Judge Key and General Brady that they should go on as they had been doing and then should report the matter to Congress for its consideration. Recollect, gentlemen, that at any moment they could cut down the service so as to keep within the appropriations. But they concluded to go on, and then when Congress met in December they would tell Congress just what they had been doing, and if Congress did not approve of it then they would reduce the service so as to come within the appropriations. If Congress did approve of it and give them the money they would go on as before. That is exactly the way it was.

Mr. GREEN (a juror). How long had General Brady been Second Assistant before Judge Key came in ?

Mr. WILSON. Brady went in in 1876 and Judge Key came in in 1877, and this service went into operation in 1878.

Now, gentlemen, they did go on. Just see what happened. I will show to you now from this record that it sustains General Brady in what he has said to you. On the 6th day of December, 1879, a communication was sent by General Brady to the Postmaster-General, and two days after that that same communication was sent by the Postmaster-General to Congress. That communication was exhibited to you, gentlemen, as an evidence on the part of Brady of violation of the law. I say to you that it is evidence of the fact that he and Judge Key thoroughly understood this thing; that they had determined to furnish the country with this service and then submit the matter to Congress, and if Congress did not approve of it they would reduce the service. Let me read the letter to you:

SIR: I have the honor to state that the appropriation for inland mail transportation on star routes for the current fiscal year has proved insufficient to meet the wants of the rapidly-growing service.

The annual cost of the service now in operation is $7,620,004, while the appropriation is but $5,900,000.

Not only will the present appropriation allow no increase of mail facilities during the year, but it will be necessary to curtail the existing service in order to bring its costs within the appropriation.

He brought this directly to the attention of Congress—"there is not enough money now to pay for the service as we have it; we cannot increase the mail facilities any more with the money we have; and unless there is something more appropriated we will have to curtail the service." Could you make a franker statement to Congress than that?

Believing that this cannot be done without great injury to many deserving communities, and, further, that pressing necessity exists for increased service in many places, I venture to suggest a method of relief.

And then he recommends the appropriation of money.

In view of this fact, I have the honor to request your recommendation to Congress that about one-half this amount, say $2,000,000, be reappropriated for mail transportation on star routes.

He was referring to some money which had not been expended before and which had been covered back into the Treasury.

This will enable the department to maintain the present service, and besides afford a margin for reasonable and necessary increase during the remaining half of the fiscal year.

Very respectfully, &c.,

THOS. J. BRADY,
Second Assistant P. M. General.

Now, you see that he says that he and Postmaster-General Key had talked this matter over, and they had determined to go on and report it to Congress. When Congress meets he sends that communication to Judge Key, which, of course, was to be transmitted to Congress, stating the exact situation.

Now, Judge Key sends it to Congress by this letter:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., December 8, 1879.

SPEAKER HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES:

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a communication from the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, calling attention to the insufficiency of the appropriation for inland mail transportation for the present fiscal year, and asking that the sum of $2,000,000 be reappropriated out of the unexpended balances of former appropriations for that purpose, which have been covered into the Treasury, and be made available to meet the necessities of the service and of the country during the current fiscal year. I cordially indorse this recommendation, and take this occasion to suggest that the business interests of the country would be promoted by the prompt and favorable action of Congress.

D. M. KEY,
Postmaster-General.

Duplicate to the United States Senate.

Now, gentlemen of the jury, do you not see that the Postmaster-General approved this thing? But I am not talking particularly about that. They say that he had created a deficiency, and that is what I am talking about. Gentlemen, there was no deficiency. There was money enough to pay for all the service that they had put on, but there would have been a deficiency if they had gone on to the end of the fiscal year. They brought that subject, as I have shown you, directly to the attention of Congress, by the recommendation of the Postmaster-General that that be granted because it would subserve the business interests of the country, and he cordially indorsed it for that reason.

Now, what happened? Why, Congress looked into this. They have had a great deal to say about that investigating committee. The committee investigated it, and there was sent to that committee, as these gentlemen have told you and as the evidence in the casis shows you, every one of these cases that you are now considering. If Congress did not want this to go on they ought to have said so, but they did not say so. They appropriated over $1,100,000 for the purpose of carrying on this service until the end of that fiscal year. But these gentlemen say, "Oh, they did not give him as much as he asked for; he asked for $2,000,000 and they only gave him $1,100,000." Why did he ask for $2,000,000? This communication that I have just read to you gives you the reason, because he said there were many deserving communities that needed more mails, and in order to increase the mail facilities as it would be proper and necessary to increase them during the remainder of the fiscal year he would have to have $2,000,000, although he could carry on the service with $1,100,000. They gave $1,100,000. Then Congress passed what these gentlemen call the 50 per cent. law, that is to say, to restrict expedition to 50 per cent. of the original letting. Who recommended that, gentlemen? General Brady is the man who recommended that to Congress.

They say that part of this scheme was to deceive the Postmaster-General. Was he deceived, gentlemen? In the light of this testimony to which I have called your attention, was he deceived? We have brought in the records showing that his name was signed to them every day. Of course, they meet that by saying that they were carried to him at intervals of a week or two, and he would sign a number of them at a time without knowing what was in them. I take it for granted that that is undoubtedly so. But was he deceived? That is the question. Why, he tells you that that was a subject-matter of discussion between him and Judge Key, and I say that that is corroborated by the testimony I have just called your attention to. That allegation of the indictment is not true.

Gentlemen, it seems to me that that is a complete answer to both of these objections that have been urged against him. It seems to me that what I have said, and that to which I have called your attention, shows that General Brady was only carrying out a policy; whether a wise one or an unwise one it is not for me to say, and, perhaps, not for you to say. I think it is not for you to say. But he was carrying out a policy which was to give frequent and expeditious mails to that region of country about which we have been talking—a policy that was indorsed by the Postmaster-General, and a policy that he was instructed by the Postmaster-General to pursue.

Now, these gentlemen talked to you about General Brady's wealth. You know, gentlemen, that when that subject was touched upon in the testimony his honor ruled it out as being irrelevant to this case, and, therefore, what there is about General Brady's wealth is largely drawn from the imagination of these gentlemen of the prosecution. One minute my Brother Bliss would hold up to you this enormous amount of Chattanooga stock that Brady was carrying. I suppose all you gentlemen know what that means. That is exhibited to you as evidence of wealth. In about five or ten or fifteen minutes after that he turns about and talks to you about this Chattanooga wild-cat stock. One minute it was a mine of wealth, a pile of gold. The next minute it was wild-cat.

I do not think I ought, gentlemen—I must not—occupy your time in matters of that kind. In the “Ginger letter,” as they call it, you see mention is made of telephone stock and telephone bonds; and if I had the lively imagination of my Brother Bliss I could imagine how wealth might be obtained in a great many ways out of telephone stock and telephone bonds—buying them when they were worth nothing, when everybody was afraid to touch them, when the enterprise was in its infancy and you could get a bushel basketful of it for not more money than would buy you a breakfast. I can imagine that stock, as this great invention became developed and began to show what it was, growing in value until that which was comparatively worthless would be worth a vast amount of money. I could draw upon my imagination as to how a large amount of wild-cat, bought for nothing, could grow in value on the Wall-street market until the owner would be independent by reason of it. I can imagine a great many ways in which a man can make money, and I do not think that it is anything to a man’s discredit that he does make money. I think the most of us are trying to make money. I have been trying to nearly all my life, and I have not succeeded very well, while others, who have not tried half so hard as I have, have succeeded a great deal better. Now, look at my Brother Davidge over there, how innocent he looks when I mention a thing like that. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLISS. He can afford it.

Mr. WILSON. I say I can draw upon my imagination——

Mr. DAVIDGE. [Interposing.] That is the way I got mine.

Mr. WILSON. [Continuing.]—weak and poor as it is, and see how a man might get money without stealing it, and if I had as lively an imagination as my Brother Bliss, I would not have a bit of trouble on that score in addressing this jury. But, gentlemen of the jury, there is no evidence that he has wealth or has not. Whether he has or has not they have not proved, and they have not proved that any farthing of what he has ever came from any one of these codefendants of his.

Now, gentlemen, I am about to leave this case. I am to be followed by others, and in conclusion will come my Brother Merrick. When he comes to address you, I just want you simply to remember one or two things: I want you to remember that vituperation and abuse are not argument. There is no logic in a fish-woman’s talk—not comparing my Brother Merrick, of course, to a fish-woman. But there is no logic in vituperation. There is no argument in abuse. It proves nothing to call a man a scoundrel. It does not prove this case to howl about conspirators. That is the very question you have to try, whether these defendants are conspirators. And when he comes here talking to you, in the conclusion of this case, about these men being conspirators, I want you just to have in your minds all the time, gentlemen, a silent question to Mr. Merrick: “Is not that the thing we are trying here? And are not we to decide, and not you, Brother Merrick, whether these men are conspirators or not?”

The Government has charged them with that crime, charged that they agreed together, and the Government has to prove that—not assert it, but prove it—and I want you, gentlemen of the jury, to hold them to that.

When they come to argue this case, notice and see if they tell you when this conspiracy was formed. See if you can find out. You have not found out in fourteen days of their opening. See if you can find out in the conclusion, from anything that Mr. Merrick says, when this conspiracy was formed.

And when they assail these gentlemen, see if they point out to you any act done by my client that was not in conformity with law. When he charges my client with having done some act in his official capacity that was a violation of law, let him point it out to you and show you wherein it was a violation of law.

When they charge him with retroactive orders, for example, let them give you the particular retroactive orders. Let them give you succinctly and in order all that happened in the department with reference to those orders, and see if they can make it out that they were retroactive orders. Mr. Merrick cannot do it, nor any other living man.

When he comes at you with Agate and Pagosa Springs, and some other place, and says Brady gave a month's extra pay, you just bear it in your minds that the law provides for a month's extra pay, and the contract provides for a month's extra pay.

And when they say that Brady gave pay for increased distance, I want you to remember that whenever, by reason of putting on a new post-office, the distance was increased, the pay was given according to the contract, and the distance was ascertained by the usual method of ascertaining distances—it was certified to by the postmasters upon distance circulars sent out.

And when they talk to you about fines and deductions and remissions, I want you to remember that in every case where delinquency was reported fines were imposed, and that in no case were there any remissions except where the inspection division reported them favorably, and sometimes not even then.

And when they talk to you about this service not being needed, and Brady knowing it to be so, I want you to remember these piles of petitions in regard to this matter that nobody has ever assailed or questioned.

Do not forget these things when they are standing here and shouting in your ears, "fraud and conspiracy."

Gentlemen, so far as I am concerned, I am going to turn this case over to you.

Time would not permit me to discuss many things that have been pressed upon you by the prosecution, but I think I have considered all that are worthy of serious consideration and many that were scarcely worthy of notice, and I have only detained you to notice them lest some unfavorable inference might be drawn from an omission to do so.

I know that I have been tedious and uninteresting, but I am sure you will overlook that when you consider the great responsibility that rests upon me in such a matter as this. I expected that my Brother Chandler would have shared this responsibility with me, but the court has willed it otherwise.

The Government has put forth and will continue to put forth all its energies to induce you to convict these defendants. It is a powerful, a fearful adversary. It has more eyes than Argus, more arms than Briareus, and resources without limit. It threatens, and men tremble; it commands, and men obey.

In a contest such as this, with such an adversary, we look to you—I will not say as a shield, but as the chosen instrument of the law—to stand firmly and indifferently between this Government, with all its power, and these citizens whom it has arraigned.

I have no fair words or polished phrases for a conclusion, gentlemen. I have attempted to present it to you in a plain way. I have tried to keep within this record. I have tried not to overstate anything in favor of my client or these other defendants, nor to understate anything that might militate against him. I have sought to deal with this record fairly, and I trust, gentlemen of the jury, that you will deal with it in the same way.

When you come to look through this evidence, look at these defendants, honorable men, I feel sure, gentlemen of the jury, that you will be moved by a single impulse, and that is to look at this evidence as it is; and that wherever any act committed by any one of these defendants is consistent with integrity you will attribute to it an honest purpose instead of a dishonest purpose. If you do that, gentlemen of the jury, I think I can retire from this case with a feeling of absolute security that no harm will come to any one of these defendants by reason of your verdict.

I thank you, gentlemen, and I thank the court.

The COURT. Who goes on to-morrow?

Mr. DAVIDGE. We will determine, your honor, between now and to-morrow morning. One of us will go on.

The COURT. Adjourn the court.

Thereupon (at 2 o'clock and 8 minutes p. m.) the court adjourned until to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock.

THURSDAY, MAY 17, 1883.

The court met at 10 o'clock.

Present, counsel for the Government and for the defendants.

The COURT. I wish to say just one word this morning about a matter. There has been a crazy man going about the court-house for several days. I understand that his name is England, and that he is a member of the bar. He was carried out the other day from within the bar, making exclamations of some character. The man is evidently deranged, but he is a dangerous man to be at large. I am just informed by one of the bailiffs that he was here this morning and said he was going to shoot the court.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Shoot the court?

The COURT. Shoot the person of the court.

Mr. DAVIDGE. That is of more importance to your honor.

The COURT. I shall have to get a substitute, I suppose. But it is a disgrace to the authorities of this town to have the peace and order of the community disturbed by allowing such a man to go about the streets for so many days. He is a dangerous man. You cannot tell what whims crazy people will get into their heads. Somebody ought to take charge of this man. If he were a sane man, of course I should disregard his threat and think nothing of it, but no one can tell at what moment a crazy man may whip out a deadly weapon and shoot his best friend. We have an instance reported in the paper this morning of such an occurrence yesterday in the neighborhood of Relay House. I suppose the court itself could make some order in regard to this man, but I dislike to interfere in a matter that belongs properly to other persons whose duty it is to look after men of this kind.

Mr. CARPENTER. The court could properly make an order instructing the bailiffs not to admit him to the court-house.

The COURT. Of course he is not to be admitted here. That order has been given. It was given yesterday. His threat is that he is going to shoot me for making that order. That is worse than any step that has been taken by counsel in the trial of this case.

Mr. WILSON. I believe he was nearer to me than any one else when he sat in the court-room.

The COURT. I have a note here from Mr. George B. Sheriff, a member of this jury, which I will read. It is addressed to me :

MAY 17, 1883.

I regret having to inform you of my inability to attend court this morning, owing to a very bad sore throat, but hope to be able to be in place to-morrow morning.

Very respectfully,

GEORGE B. SHERIFF.

Mr. WILSON. I am glad to hear that it is only sore throat. If it had been any derangement of his mind I should have taken some of the responsibility for it to myself.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I suppose, under the circumstances, that the court will adjourn until to-morrow.

The COURT. Of course, we cannot go on with eleven jurors. Gentlemen, you are adjourned until to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock.

At this point (10 o'clock and 10 minutes a. m.) the court adjourned until to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock.

FRIDAY, MAY 18, 1883.

The court met at 10 o'clock a. m.

Present, counsel for the Government and for the defendants.

HON. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL addressed the jury on behalf of the defense as follows :

May it please the court and gentlemen of the jury: Perhaps some of you, may be all of you, will remember that I made one of the opening speeches of this case, and that in that opening speech I endeavored to give you the scheme or plan of the indictment. I told you, I believe, at that time, that all these defendants were indicted for having conspired together to defraud the United States. In that indictment they were kind enough to tell us how we agreed to accomplish that object; that we went into partnership with the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, he being one of these defendants, and that we then and there agreed to get up false petitions, to have them signed by persons who were not interested in the mail service, to sign fictitious names to these petitions, those names representing no actual, real, living persons; that we also agreed to have false and fraudulent letters written to the department urging this service; that in addition to all that we were to make and file false and fraudulent affidavits, in which we were to swear falsely as to the number of men and horses to be employed, and the number of men and horses then necessary; that in addition to that we were to file fraudulent subcontracts; that the Second Assistant Postmaster-General was to make false and corrupt orders, and that all these things were to be done to deceive, mislead, and blindfold the Postmaster-General. They also set out that these orders so corruptly made were to be corruptly certified to the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department in order that we might draw our pay. That is what is known as the general scheme or plan of this indictment. You have heard the testimony, and remember some of it. Of course you do not remember it all. Probably no man ever lived who could do such a thing. You have heard the testimony discussed, I believe, for about twenty days, so that I take it for granted you know something about it, or at least have an idea that you do. The story that we told you in the first place, and that we now tell you, is about this:

In 1877 Mr. Peck, Mr. Miner, and John W. Dorsey made up their minds to make bids and to go into the mail business. I want you to remember that there is not one word in this indictment about any false bid ever having been made. Remember that. There is nothing in this indictment about a false bond having been given; not a thing. There is nothing in this indictment charging that any of the original contracts were false. I want you to remember that. There is no evidence that any person signing any one of those contracts as security was not perfectly solvent. There is no evidence, not one syllable, that any proposal was fraudulent, or that any bid was fraudulent. How is it possible for a bid to be fraudulent? I will tell you. If you make a bid, and make a contract or enter into an agreement at the same time with some of the Post-Office officials so that your bid will be accepted when it is not the lowest, there is a fraud, and there is a fraudulent bid. There is one other way, and that is to put in a bid to carry the mail at so many thousand dollars, and then have below that straw bidders, men not responsible, and when the time comes to accept the bid of those gentlemen they refuse to carry it out, and then the law is that it shall be given to the next highest, and he refuses, and the next, and he refuses, and the next highest, and he refuses, and so on until it comes to the highest bidder. There are such combinations and have been, I have no doubt, for many years in the Post-Office Department. That is called straw bidding, and it is fraudulent bidding. There is no such charge as that in this case. Every bid that was made was made in good faith, and every bid that was accepted was followed by a good and sufficient contract entered into by the party making the bid, and so that is the end of that.

Now, in 1877, I say these men entered into an agreement among themselves that they would bid on certain routes, and Mr. Peck, or Mr. Miner, or John W. Dorsey—they may have it as they choose—somebody, wrote a letter to Stephen W. Dorsey and in that letter told what they were going to do and requested him to get some man to obtain information in regard to these routes. You know that testimony. Stephen W. Dorsey was then in the United States Senate. He sent for Mr. Boone and he showed him that letter. In consequence of that Mr. Boone sent out his circulars to the postmasters all over the country, or all over the portion as to which they were to bid, and asked them about the roads, about the price of oats and corn, about the price of labor, and about the winters; in other words, all the questions necessary for intelligent men, after having received intelligent answers, to make up his mind as to the amount for which he could carry that mail. Mr. Boone, you remember, says that he was to have at that time a certain share. There is a conflict of testimony there. Mr. Dorsey says that he told Boone that when John W. Dorsey came here they could arrange that, and he had no doubt but what they would be willing to give him a share; but that he did not give it to him. The circulars were sent out and the information in some instances, and I do not know but all, came back. Then they agreed upon the amounts they were to bid. I believe Mr. Miner came here in December, and John W. Dorsey, I think, in January, and in February the bids were made. All the amounts were put in the bidding-book issued by the Government, by Mr. Miner and Mr. Boone; all with two exceptions, and those amounts had been placed there by them, but under the advice of Stephen W. Dorsey those amounts were lowered. I remember one was upon the Tongue River route, the other route I have forgotten. Mr. Miner, Mr. Peck, and John W. Dorsey were together. Afterwards a partnership was formed between John W. Dorsey and A. E. Boone. Stephen W. Dorsey advanced some money. There is nothing criminal about that. It is often foolish to advance money, but it is not a crime. It is often foolish to indorse for another, and many a man has been convinced of that, but it is not a crime. He advanced until, I believe, he was responsible for some fourteen or fifteen thousand dollars, and thereupon he declined to advance any more. He saw Mr. Miner in Saint Louis, and said to Mr. Miner "This is the last I am going to advance." I think he gave him some notes that he hypothecated or discounted at the German-American National Bank. He wanted security, and thereupon they gave him Post-Office drafts for the purpose of securing his debt. He would advance no more money and went away to New Mexico. Mr. Miner had a power of attorney from John W. Dorsey who was absent, and a power of attorney from John M. Peck who was absent. I believe on the 7th of August, or about that time, Mr. Boone went out. Why? They had not the money at that time to put on the service. Why? A great many more bids had been accepted than they had anticipated, and instead of getting twenty or thirty routes they got, I believe, one hundred and thirty-four routes. The consequence was they did not have the money to stock the routes. There was another difficulty. There was an investigation by Congress, and that delayed them a month or two, and the consequence was that when the 1st of July came, the day upon which the service should have been put on, it was not only not put on, but they had not the means to do it. Then what happened? Then it was that Mr. Miner took in Mr. Vaile, and an agreement was made which bears date the 16th day of August, 1878. It was not finally signed by all the parties, I believe, until some time in September or October. Under that contract, which you have all heard read, and which probably I may read to you before I get through, or some portion of it, Mr. Vaile was given an interest in this business. More than that; subcontracts were given to Mr. Vaile, and under the subcontract law which was passed on the 17th day of May, 1878, I believe, Vaile could file his subcontract in the Post-Office Department, and that rendered all Post-Office drafts or orders that had been given absolutely worthless. That was done. The subcontracts were given to Vaile under the powers of attorney that Miner held from Peck and John W. Dorsey, and of course he could act for himself. That was the situation. Stephen W. Dorsey was not here. When he returned he found that everything had been disposed of except his liability, and that he would have to pay the notes. His security was gone, and the subcontracts were filed. At that time he and Mr. Vaile had a quarrel. That is our story. In the mean time John W. Dorsey was on the Tongue River route. I believe he visited Washington in November and left word that he would like to sell out all his interests in these routes, and I believe fixed the price. Some time in November or December Mr. Vaile made up his mind to take the routes, and afterwards changed his mind. Stephen W. Dorsey was then in the Senate. On the 4th of March, 1879, his term expired. I believe on that very day, or about that day, he wrote a letter to Brady calling his attention to these subcontracts that had been filed for the protection of Vaile and denouncing them. That was the first thing he did. Then a few days afterwards the parties met. In a little while afterwards they made a division of this entire business. You know how the division was made. Stephen W. Dorsey fell heir to about thirty of these routes, I think. In addition he had to pay $10,000 to his brother and $10,000 to Peck. Mr. Vaile, I think, took forty per cent. and Mr. Miner thirty per cent. Mr. Vaile and Mr. Miner went into partnership and Stephen W. Dorsey took his routes, and that ended it. Mr. Peck was out and John W. Dorsey was out. That is our story. When they divided those routes, in order to vest the property of those routes in the persons to whom they fell, it was necessary to execute subcontracts and give Post-Office drafts and things of that character. All those necessary papers they then and there agreed to make. Up to this point there is not one act established by the evidence not entirely consistent with perfect innocence; not an act. That is our story. After these routes fell to us we did what we had the right to do and what we could to make the routes of value. As business men we had the right to do it, and we did only what we had the right to do.

The next question that arises, and which of course is at the very threshold of this case, is, did these parties conspire? That is the great question. In my judgment you should settle that the first thing when you go to the jury-room. After having heard the case as it will be presented by the Government, and after having heard the charge of the court, the first thing for you to decide is, was there a conspiracy? How is a conspiracy proved? Precisely as everything else is proved. You prove that men conspire precisely as you prove them guilty of larceny or murder or any other crime or misdemeanor. It has been suggested to you that as conspiracy is very hard to prove you should not require much evidence; that you should take into consideration the hardships of the Government in proving a crime which in its nature is secret. Nearly all crimes are secret. Very few men steal publicly, with a band of music and with a torch in each hand. They generally need their hands for other purposes, if they are in that business. All crime loves darkness. We all know that. One of the troubles about proving that a man has committed a crime is that he tries to keep it as secret as possible. He does not carry a placard on his breast or on his back stating what he is about to do. The consequence is that it is nearly always difficult to prove men guilty as stated in the indictment. But that does not relieve the prosecution. That burden is taken by the Government, and they must prove men guilty of conspiracy precisely as they prove anything else. Is circumstantial evidence sufficient? Certainly, certainly. Circumstantial evidence will prove anything, provided the circumstances are right, and provided further that all the circumstances are right. A chain of circumstances is no stronger than the weakest circumstance, as a chain of iron is no stronger than the weakest link. Where you establish or attempt to establish a fact by circumstances, each circumstance must be proved not only beyond a reasonable doubt, but each circumstance must be wholly inconsistent with the innocence of the defendants. Now, let me call your attention to what I claim to be the law upon the subject, and I will call the attention of the court to it at the same time. I will take this as a kind of test:

The hypothesis of guilt must flow naturally from the facts proved and must be consistent with them; not with some of them, not with the majority of them, but with all of them.

In other words if they establish one hundred circumstances and ninety-nine point to guilt and one circumstance thoroughly established is inconsistent with guilt or perfectly consistent with innocence, that is the end of the case. It is as if you were building an arch. Every stone that you put into the arch must fit with every other and must make that segment of the circle. If one stone does not fit, the arch is not complete. So with circumstantial evidence. Every circumstance must fit every other. Every solitary circumstance must be of the exact shape to fit its neighbor, and when they are all together the arch must be absolutely complete. Otherwise you must find the defendants not guilty. The next sentence is:

The evidence must be such as to exclude every reasonable hypothesis except that of guilt. In other words, all the facts proved must be consistent with and point to the guilt of the defendants not only, but they must be inconsistent, and every fact proved must be inconsistent, with their innocence.

Now, what does that mean? It means that every fact that is absolutely established in this case, must point to the guilt of the defendants. It means that if there is one established fact that is inconsistent with their guilt, that fact becomes instantly an impenetrable shield that no honest verdict can pierce. That is what it means. That being so—and the court in my judgment will instruct you that that is the law—let us talk a little about what has been established.

In the first place nearly all that has been established, or I will not say established, but nearly all that has been said for the purpose of showing that our motives were corrupt, and that we actually conspired, rests upon evidence of what we call conversations. Some witness had a conversation with somebody, three years ago, four years ago, or five years ago. The unsafest and the most unsatisfactory evidence in this world is evidence of conversation. Words leave no trace. They leave no scar in the air, no footsteps. Memory writes upon the secret tablet of the brain words that no human eye can see. No man can look into the brain of another, and tell whether he is giving a true transcript of what is there. It is absolutely impossible for you to tell whether it is memory or imagination. No one can do it. Another thing: Probably there is not a man in the world whose memory makes an absolutely perfect record. The moment it is written it begins to fade, and as the days pass it grows dim, and as the years go by, no matter how deeply it may have been engraven, it is covered by the moss of forgetfulness. And yet you are asked to take from men their liberty, to take from citizens their reputation, to tear down roof-trees, on testimony about conversation that happened years and years ago, as to which the party testifying had not the slightest interest. As a rule memory is the child of attention—memory is the child of interest. Take the avaricious man. He sets down a debt in his brain, and he graves it as deep as graving upon stone. A man must have interest. His attention must be aroused. Tell me that a man can remember a conversation of four or five years ago in which he had no interest. We have been in this trial I don't know how many years. I have seen you, gentlemen, gradually growing gray. You have, during this trial, heard argument after argument as to what some witness said, as to some line embodied in this library. [Indicating record.] You have heard the counsel for the prosecution say one thing, the counsel for the defense another, and often his honor, holding the impartial scales of memory, differs from us both, and then we have turned to the record and found that all were mistaken. That has happened again and again, and yet when that witness was testifying every attorney for the defense was watching him, and every attorney for the prosecution was looking at him. How hard it would be for you, Mr. Juror, or for any one of you to tell what a witness has said in this case. Yet men are brought here who had a casual conversation with one of the defendants five years ago about a matter in which no one of the witnesses was interested to the extent of one cent, and pretend to give that conversation entire. For my part, were I upon the jury, I would pay no more attention to such evidence than I would to the idle wind. Such men are not giving a true transcript of their brains. It is the result of imagination. They wish to say something. They recollect they had a conversation upon a certain subject, and then they fill it out to suit the prosecution.

Now I am told another thing; that after getting through with conversations they then gave us notice that we must produce our books, our papers, our letters, our stubs, and our checks; that we must produce everything in which we have any interest, and hand them all over to this prosecution. They say they only want what pertains to the mail business, but who is to judge of that? They want to look at them to see if they do pertain to the mail business. They won't take our word. We must produce them all. It may be that with such a net they might bring in something that would be calculated to get somebody in trouble about something, no matter whether this business or not. They might find out something that would annoy somebody. They gave us a notice wide enough and broad enough to cover everything we had or were likely to have. What did they want with those things? May be one of their witnesses wanted to see them. May be he wanted to stake out his testimony. May be he did not entirely rely upon his memory and wanted to find whether he should swear as to check-books or a check-book, and whether he should swear as to one stub or as to many. May be he wanted to look them all over so that he could fortify the story he was going to tell. We did not give them the books. We would not do it. We took the consequences. But what did we offer? That is the only way to find out our motive. I believe that on page 3776 there is something upon that subject. I will read what I said:

Now, gentlemen, with regard to the books. As there has been a good deal said on that subject I make this proposition: Mr. Dorsey has books extending over a period of twenty years, or somewhere in that neighborhood. He has had accounts with a great many people on a great many subjects. He does not wish to bring those books into court, or to have those accounts gone over by this prosecution, not for reasons in this case, but for reasons entirely outside of the case. If the gentlemen on the other side will agree, or if the court will appoint any two men or any three men, we will present to those men all our books, every one that we ever had in the world, and allow them to go over every solitary item and report to this court every item pertaining to John W. Dorsey & Co., Miner, Peck & Co., or Vaile, Miner & Co., with regard to every dollar connected, directly or indirectly, with this entire business from November or December, 1877, to the present moment, and report to this court exactly every item just as it is. I make that proposition.

That proposition was refused. What else did I do? I offered to bring into court every check, including the time they said we drew money to pay Brady. I offered to bring in every check on every bank in which we had one dollar deposited; every one. That was not admitted. And why? Because the court distinctly said that it rests upon the oath of the defendant at last; he may have had money in banks that we know nothing about. To which I replied at the time that if we stated here in open court the name of every bank in which we did business, and there is any other bank knowing that we did do business with it, we will hear from it. So that we offered, gentlemen, in this case, every check on every bank but one. I did not know at that time that we had ever had an account with the German-American Savings Bank; I did not find that out until afterwards. But you will remember that Mr. Merrick held in his hand the account of Dorsey with that bank; and Mr. Keyser, who, I believe, had charge of that bank, was here, and if there had been anything upon those books, certainly the Government would have shown it.

More than that; that bank went into the hands of a receiver, I think, eight months before any of these checks are said to have been given for money which was afterwards given to Brady. Now, they insist, that because we failed to bring the books into court, therefore the law presumes that the absolute evidence of our guilt is in those books. I believe they claim that as the law. If my memory serves me rightly, Colonel Bliss so claimed in his speech. In other words, that when they give us notice to produce a book, and we do not produce it, there is a presumption against us. That is not the law, gentlemen. When they give us notice to produce a book or letter and we do not produce it, what can they do? They can prove the contents of the book or letter. In other words, if we fail to produce what is called the best evidence, then the Government can introduce secondary evidence. They can prove the contents by the memory of some witness, by some copy, no matter how; and that is the only possible consequence flowing from a refusal to produce the book or letter.

And yet, in this case, gentlemen, Mr. Bliss wishes you to give a verdict based upon two things: first, upon what we failed to prove; secondly, on what the court would not let them prove. He tells you that they offered to prove so and so, but the court would not let them; he wants you to take that into consideration; and secondly, that there were certain things that we did not prove; and that those two make up a case. That is their idea. Now, let us see if I am right about the law.

The first case to which I will call the attention of the court is a very small one, but the principle is clear. It is the case of Lawson and another, assignees of Shiffner, vs. Sherwood, and it is found in 2 English Common-Law Reports; 1 Starkie, 314:

Shiffner had indorsed the bill to Thompson, in whose hands the bill was (when it became due) on the 12th of January, 1815. Before the bill became due Shiffner applied to Masson, in order that provision might be made for the bill when due. The witness, who was called to prove notice to Sherwood of the dishonor of the bill on the 12th, stated that he sent a letter to him containing such notice two or three days after the dishonor of the bill, but the witness was unable to state whether it was two days or three days.

If it was three days it was not in time; if it was two days it was in time. I see the syllabus states that—

Notice was given by letter to the defendant, notice in two days being in time, but notice on the third too late; it cannot be left as a question for the jury whether notice was given in time, although the defendant has had notice to produce the letter which would ascertain the time.

Then the decision continues:

Richardson, for the plaintiffs, contended, that since Thompson was the holder of the bill when it was due, notice from Shiffner on the second day was in good time, and that although the witness could not state with certainty whether the notice had been sent on the second or third day, yet since this might be ascertained by the production of the letter itself, which was in the possession of the defendant, it was incumbent on him by the production of the letter to show that sufficient notice had not been given, and that, at all events, in the absence of the letter, there was evidence to go to the jury that sufficient notice had been given.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH. The witness says two or three days, but the third day would be too late. It lies upon you to show that notice was given in due time, and I cannot go upon probable evidence without positive proof of the fact, nor can I infer due notice from the non-production of the letter.

THE COURT. If the witness had sworn, however, that the notice was given in two days, then the failure to produce the notice itself, which was in the hands of the party, would have allowed the evidence of the witness to stand.

MR. INGERSOLL. The evidence then would not have been necessary. If the witness had sworn that he gave the notice in two days, then there would have been no necessity for the letter; the letter would cut no figure:

The only consequence is that you may give parol evidence of it. The onus probandi lies upon the plaintiff, and since he has not proved due notice, he must be called.

Now here is a case in which a man says that he sent a letter to the other man, giving him notice of the dishonor of the bill, but he cannot say whether he sent it in two days or three days.

THE COURT. Colonel Ingersoll, you cannot argue that question to the jury; you cannot cite an authority and discuss it to the jury.

MR. INGERSOLL. Then I will just suppose a case. We will suppose a case like that. Here is a man who gives notice in writing to another; he writes him a letter, and then he forgets the date of the letter; he says it was either the 1st or the 2d of March. If it was written on the 1st of March it is good and the other man is held responsible.

THE COURT. I must stop this. I recognize the authority of the jury to render a verdict covering both law and fact in the case, but I cannot allow questions of the competency or admissibility of evidence to be discussed by counsel before the jury.

MR. INGERSOLL. Then I will discuss it with the court; it is immaterial to me which way I turn when I am talking. I understood your honor to decide that we were to discuss these questions in our argument, rather than to discuss the law before we entered upon the argument.

THE COURT. I said this: That you could assume the law to be as suited your purposes in your argument to the jury; but you cannot discuss questions of law one way or the other, as to what the law is, before the jury. You may assume the law to be as you claim it, and when the case reaches the proper stage the court will instruct the jury in regard to the law.

MR. INGERSOLL. Let me finish, then, upon this one point. If the notice had been given on the 1st of March, then the defendant was responsible; but if on the 2d, he was not responsible. The man swears that he sent him a letter either the 1st or the 2d, and thereupon gives the defendant notice to produce that letter. He will not produce it. Now, the point I make is that the inference cannot be drawn that if the letter were produced it would be dated the 1st of March.

THE COURT. You are perfectly right. The authority decides that point in that way, and I have no doubt the decision is correct. It results in just this: The question depends upon the evidence of this witness, and if he could not tell whether the notice was given on the 1st or 2d, of course his evidence failed to make out the case.

MR. INGERSOLL. In other words, the court admits, as I understand, that you cannot patch out that kind of testimony with a presumption.

THE COURT. It depends upon the evidence of the witness. If the witness had sworn that the notice was given on the 1st, which would have been in time, that would have been sufficient ; but as the witness was not able to say whether the notice was given on the 1st or 2d his evidence did not make out a case against the plaintiff.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I go a great deal farther than that, and the law goes a great deal farther than that, in my judgment. If he had sworn that it was dated the 1st, and the defendant had had the right to swear and did swear that it was not dated the 1st, and then they had given notice to produce that letter, and it was not produced, there could have been no presumption.

The COURT. There you and I part.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That may be. We may entirely disagree as to the law, and we probably will disagree at least upon this point.

The COURT. If the testimony of the witness giving secondary evidence is upon its face sufficient, and the other side is in possession of primary evidence which would correct his error, if he made an error, and the party who has this primary evidence in his possession will not produce it, then the testimony of the witness must stand.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Well, there we part. Now, I insist that in this case the jury are the judges of the fact and of the law.

The COURT. Not on a question of the competency or admissibility of evidence.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Not on a question of the admissibility of evidence, because all the evidence has to go to the jury by the consent of the court, and the court can stop that evidence at any place. But when the evidence is before the jury, then I contend—and I do not do it offensively——

The COURT. [Interposing.] I know.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I contend that the jury are the absolute judges of the law. If they acquit, that is the end. Now, are they the absolute judges of the fact if they acquit. If they convict, then the court judges of the facts. If they convict, then the court may set the verdict aside. But if they acquit, that is the end.

The COURT. There is no difference between you and the court upon that point. The jury have a right to render a general verdict which includes both law and fact, and whether they decide one way or the other on a question of law, it is impossible for the court to determine. But in the progress of a trial, in regard to the rules of evidence which apply to secondary and primary evidence, and the consequences of the failure of a party in whose possession primary evidence is to produce it, the court has a right absolutely to tell the jury what the law is.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The court has that right, and the jury then have the right to judge whether that is the law or not.

The COURT. And the jury are absolutely bound by the decision of the court upon such questions of law as that.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I differ from that entirely.

The COURT. The jury will take their law from the court.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I have no doubt of that, but I am now discussing——

The COURT. [Interposing.] The court will not permit such a question of law as that to be argued before the jury.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I am arguing before your honor.

The COURT. I know that ; but after you have obtained the decision of the court you cannot turn around and appeal to the jury to vary from the decision of the court upon a question of law and insist upon the right of the jury to determine the question adversely to the decision of the court.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I insist, then, to your honor that the jury must at last decide the law in this case.

The COURT. Not upon a question of this sort.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Now I will read another case to the court, found in 9 Maryland, Spring Garden Mutual Insurance Company, vs. Evans. I read from page 16. It seems this was a case where a man sued an insurance company for loss by fire, and the question was whether he had furnished the preliminary proof of loss. The following notice to produce was served upon the defendant's attorney:

Take notice that on the trial of the above cause you are required to produce the written notice of loss by fire sent to you by the above plaintiff and left with you in Philadelphia shortly after said fire; as also the account of the particulars of the plaintiff's loss by said fire, accompanied and verified by his affidavit and the certificate of a magistrate or notary public, certifying his opinion of the amount of such loss by fire, and that the same was occasioned without fraud or evil practice, which said last two papers were also delivered to your company shortly after said fire.

Shortly after said fire and before this suit.

The insurance company refused to produce the papers and did not produce them. Question: Have the jury the right to presume that those papers were given him?

The COURT. No, they have not; and that question was determined by a higher authority than that, the Supreme Court of the United States, and I think it is reported in 13 Howard. A failure to produce papers upon notice will not establish the existence of the papers.

Mr. MERRICK. Certainly not.

The COURT. But if the secondary evidence is given of the contents of those papers, then it is another question altogether.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Now, the court decides in this case that the only consequence of their refusal to produce the papers, they not denying that they had them, was to allow the opposite party to prove their contents. That is all; that it could not be patched out with a presumption.

The COURT. But if afterwards they should attempt to contradict the secondary evidence the court would not have allowed them to do it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. It does not say so.

The COURT. That is the law.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Suppose, after the other side had proved the contents, there was an offer of the actual original papers. I can find plenty of authority that they must be received.

The COURT. I have never seen such authority, but I have seen a great many to the contrary.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I have never seen an authority to the contrary that was very well reasoned. But, then, I will not argue about that, for that is not a point in this case.

The COURT. If you have the papers, and have received notice to produce them, you are bound to produce them. If you do not produce them secondary evidence is admissible to prove their contents. But after the secondary evidence has been received, the court will not allow you then, after having first failed to produce the papers upon notice, to resort to the primary evidence which you ought to have produced upon the notice, for the purpose of contradicting the secondary evidence that was given.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Now let me give the court a case in point: In this very case that we are now trying, Mr. Rerdell in his statement to Mac-Veagh said there was a check for $7,000; that the money was drawn upon that check; that he and Dorsey went together to the Post-Office Department and that Dorsey went into Brady's room; that that money was drawn by Dorsey. That was his statement to MacVeagh and James.

The COURT. It was not his statement here.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes, that was his statement here, as I will show hereafter. But let me state my point. He was coming upon the stand. The check, instead of being for $7,000, was for $7,500; instead of being drawn to the order of Dorsey or to bearer, it was drawn to the order of Rerdell himself; instead of being drawn at the bank by Dorsey, it was drawn by Rerdell in person and had his indorsement upon the back of it. We were asked to produce that. I preferred not to do it until I heard the testimony of Mr. Rerdell. Why? Because I wanted to put that little piece of dynamite under his testimony and see where the fragments went, and I did. That is my answer to that.

Now, I find another case in the first volume of Curtis's Circuit Court Reports, where it is said, at page 402, that—

By the common law a notice to produce a paper—

The COURT. [Interposing.] Before we part from what you were saying, I wish to say that I do not think that the other side gave you notice to produce the checks; that is my memory.

Mr. CARPENTER. Oh, yes.

The COURT. It was a tender of your own. You proposed to bring all the checks for that month upon that bank, and subsequently you did produce those checks except two, and the absence of those was more or less satisfactorily accounted for.

Mr. MERRICK. They never were accounted for.

The COURT. I say more or less. But there was no notice to produce those checks given by the other side.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes, long before that. Let me state my memory to the court: I do not remember exactly every one of these four thousand pages of testimony; there are three or four that I may be a little dim about; but I do remember that a notice was given to us to produce everything in the universe nearly, and that the court held that the scope was a little too broad.

The COURT. Yes; I remember that.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The notice said checks, check-books, and in fact any correspondence that we might have had with anybody.

The COURT. I do not think it specified checks.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Oh, yes; the very word "checks" was in the notice.

The COURT. But whether it was or not, the court decided that the notice was too sweeping.

Mr. INGERSOLL. There is something that illustrates the point I make in my argument, as to how hard it is to remember what has been done, even right in this case.

The COURT. After a decision of that kind has been made upon the sufficiency of a notice, it goes out of my memory more or less.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I have forgotten the page, but I will tell you where it comes in: It was where Mr. Rerdell swore about the stub-book.

Mr. CARPENTER. On page 2255 is the notice itself.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I find the notice, may it please your honor, on page 2255, and it was dated the 13th of February. This is the notice, and it gave the same notice to all the defendants:

You are hereby notified to produce forthwith in court, in the above-entitled cause, all letters and communications, including all telegrams, of every kind and description, purporting to come from any one of said defendants and addressed to you or delivered to you, and all memoranda in which reference is made to any contract or contracts of any one of said defendants with the United States or with the Postmaster-General for carrying the mail under the letting of 1878 on any route in the United States, or in any way referring to any contract or contracts for so carrying the mail, in which J. W. Bosler or any one of said defendants had any interest, or in any way referring to any act, contract, or proceeding thereunder, or to any payment, draft, warrant, check or bill, or note, or to any possible loss or profit in connection with such contract or contracts, or to the management or execution thereof, or referring to any possible gain or profit to be derived by any of said defendants from contracts for carrying the mail of the United States, or to any payments under such contract, or to the distribution of the proceeds made or to be made of said payment, or to the management of any enterprise or enterprises in connection with the transportation of the mail, or to gains, profits, or losses accruing or likely to accrue from such enterprises, or to the financial means for carrying on the same; and also to produce any and all books containing any entry or entries in regard to any of the subjects, matters, checks, drafts, or payments relating or having reference to the subjects, &c., hereinbefore referred to; and also any letter-book or letter-books containing letter-press copies of letters referring to the said subject or subjects.

I believe just about that time, or a little after, another notice was given.

Mr. MERRICK. If the counsel will allow me, my impression is that that notice was deemed by the court to be too broad.

The COURT. It was.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Then another notice was given that specified all these things.

Curtis says in this case that—

By the common law, a notice to produce a paper, merely enables the party to give parol evidence of its contents, if it be not produced. Its non-production has no other legal consequence.

I find, too, that in the Maryland case they make a reference to Cooper vs. Gibson, 3 Camp., 303. I also have another case, to which I will call the attention of the court, United States vs. Chaffee, 18 Wallace, 516. I have not the book here, but I can state what it is.

Mr. WILSON. Have you sent for it?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I believe I did. My recollection of the case is this: That an action was brought against some distillers; that by law distillers have to keep certain books in which certain entries by law have to be made. Notice was served upon the defendants to produce those books. They refused so to do; and the question was whether any presumption arose against the defendants on account of that refusal.

The COURT. I agree with you entirely that far in your law, that the mere fact of the failure to produce books or papers has no effect at all against the party declining to produce them. But it is a different question altogether, after secondary evidence has been given, in consequence of such refusal, to supply the place of the primary evidence. The mere refusal to produce books and papers on notice does not prove the existence of any such books and papers nor of the entries in them.

Mr. INGERSOLL. But this case will go a great deal farther.

The COURT. If the books and papers have an existence, and the party who has received the notice has refused to produce them, and the other party has given secondary evidence of the contents of such books and papers, that secondary evidence will have to stand, under those circumstances, as the proof in the case.

Mr. HENKLE. For what it is worth.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is not the point. Of course that will stand for what it is worth.

The COURT. Of course it is like other evidence, it must stand for what it is worth.

Mr. HENKLE. There is no inference to be drawn from the non-production of the books.

The COURT. No; but an inference is to be drawn from the secondary evidence which takes the place of the primary, and the jury have a right to take into consideration the failure of the other side to produce.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is what I deny.

Mr. DAVIDGE. The contrary has been decided by the Supreme Court.

The COURT. No, it has not.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I was not arguing the point last stated by your honor that the jury may take the secondary evidence for what it is worth. I was arguing this point: Can the jury hatch and putty and plaster the secondary evidence with a presumption born of the failure to produce the books and papers?

The COURT. What I mean is just this: If you should fail to produce the primary evidence, and then the secondary evidence of the contents is not contradicted——

Mr. INGERSOLL. [Interposing.] It may not be contradicted, because it happens to be inherently improbable.

The COURT. Of course the fact of your failure to produce the primary evidence will not force the jury to believe the secondary evidence if they see reason for disbelieving it. But the witness who gives secondary evidence stands before the jury with his evidence to be judged by all surrounding circumstances of the case.

Mr. WILSON. Pardon me, but I would like to understand this. If your honor please, I understand the proposition of Government to be this: That when they give notice to produce a book or paper and it is not produced, the jury have a right to infer from that something against the defendants. That is their proposition.

The COURT. They have a right to argue in that way.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Nobody denies that.

The COURT. The court is not going to instruct the jury that they are bound to believe the secondary evidence, but they are to judge of it from the manner in which it is presented and from all the circumstances.

Mr. MERRICK. May I make a remark?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I have no objection.

Mr. MERRICK. I do not care about it particularly, but this is the proposition of the Government: The Government claims the law to be as your honor has intimated, and we have formulated it in one of our prayers. But that abstract proposition is hardly applicable in the present case, for the Government claims the application of another and plainer proposition: That wherever a defendant himself takes the stand and has in his possession a certain paper which, when called upon on cross-examination to produce, he refuses, then a presumption unquestionably arises of such potency that it is difficult to resist.

The COURT. How much potency that has, under such circumstances, belongs to the jury.

Mr. DAVIDGE. And that same defendant throws the postulate of the argument of the other side sky high.

Mr. MERRICK. I will get Mr. Davidge to go up and bring it down when I come on.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The point I make is that there is no difference, so far as the law is concerned, whether the defendant, as a defendant, fails to produce the books and papers, or whether, in his capacity as a witness, he fails to produce the books and papers. The law, it seems to me, is exactly the same.

Now, in this case of the United States vs. Chaffee et al. (18 Wall., 544), it appeared on the trial below that they did keep the books; that did not appear by their evidence, but by the evidence of the Government; but that fact that they kept the books was absolutely established, those books consisting of day-books, journals, and ledgers:

Now, the court instructed the jury that it was a rule, without exception, that where a party has proof in his power which, if produced, would render material facts certain, the law presumes against him if he omits to produce it, and authorizes the jury to resolve all doubts adversely to his defense; that although the case must be made out against the defendants beyond all reasonable doubt in this case as well as in criminal cases, yet the course of the defendants may have supplied in the presumptions of law all which this stringent rule demanded. "In determining, therefore, in the outset," said the court to the jury, "whether a case is established by the Government, you will dismiss from your minds the perplexing question whether it is so made out beyond all doubt."

This is the language of Mr. Justice Field:

It need not, in the exigencies of this case, be so proved in order to throw the burden of explanation upon the defendant, if from the facts you believe he has within his reach that power. In the end all reasonable doubt must be removed, but here, at this stage, you need say only, is the case so far established as to call for explanation.

* * * "If, then, you conclude that, unexplained and uncontroverted by any testimony, the opening proof would enable you to find against the defendants for the claim of the Government, or any material part of it, you will then take up their testimony in view of the principle" stated, that of presuming against a party who fails to produce proofs in his possession.

Justice Field denounces that, that you should presume against the party because he fails to produce books and papers known to be in his possession. And why? I suppose a party can not be presumed out of his liberty; he cannot be presumed into the penitentiary; and you cannot make a prison out of a presumption any more than you can make a gibbet out of a suspicion.

And again, the court instructed the jury that the law presumed that the defendants kept the accounts usual and necessary for the correct understanding of their large business and an accurate accounting between the partners, and that the books were in existence and accessible to the defendants unless the contrary were shown.

That same thing has been claimed here.

The COURT. No.

Mr. INGERSOLL. We have heard it very often that this was a large business.

The COURT. You have not heard anything of that kind from the court.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I am not saying that. I said "claimed;" if I had referred to your honor I should have said "decided." Here is another instruction of the court:

If you believe the books were kept which contained the facts necessary to show the real amount of whisky in the hands of the defendants in October, 1865, and the amount which they had sold during the next ten months, or that the defendants, or either of them, could by their own oath resolve all doubts on this point; if you believe this, then the circumstances of this case seem to come fully within this most necessary and beneficent rule.

He applied the word "beneficent" to a rule that put a man in the penitentiary on a presumption.

The COURT. He was conservative.

Mr. INGERSOLL. He ought to read some work on the use and abuse of words. Now, Judge Field says further:

The purport of all this was to tell the jury that although the defendants must be proved guilty beyond a reasonable doubt, yet if the Government had made out a prima facie case against them, not one free from all doubt, but one which disclosed circumstances requiring explanation, and the defendants did not explain, the perplexing question of their guilt need not disturb the minds of the jurors.

That is this case exactly ; that is the exact claim of Colonel Bliss in this case. Gentlemen, you have only to take into consideration, he says, what we offered to prove and what the court would not allow us, and what the defendants failed to prove. "Why didn't they call Bosler?" Judge Field says further :

Their silence supplied in the presumptions of the law that full proof which should dispel all reasonable doubt. In other words, the court instructed the jury, in substance, that the Government need only prove that the defendants were presumptively guilty, and the duty thereupon devolved upon them to establish their innocence, and if they did not they were guilty beyond a reasonable doubt.

We do not think it at all necessary to go into any argument to show the error of this instruction. The error is palpable on its statement. All the authorities condemn it. The case of Clifton vs. United States, in 4 Howard, cited by the court below, was decided upon a statute which cast the burden of proof upon the claimant in seizure cases after probable cause was shown for the prosecution, and, therefore, has no application. The instruction sets at naught established principles, and justifies the criticism of counsel that it substantially withdrew from the defendants their constitutional right of trial by jury, and converted what at law was intended for their protection—the right to refuse to testify—into the machinery for their sure destruction.

Now, gentlemen, we claim the law to be this : That while notice is given us to produce books and papers and we fail to do it, the only legal consequence is that the Government may then prove the contents of such books and papers, and that their proof of the contents must be passed upon by you.

The next thing to which I call your attention is the crime laid at our door, that we exercised the right of petition. It is regarded as a very suspicious circumstance that petitions were circulated, signed, and sent to the office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General. Why did these people petition? Let me tell you. If you will look in every contract in this case you will find certain provisions relative to carrying the mail. Among others you will find this : That no contractor has any right to carry any newspaper or any letter faster than the schedule time ; that he has no right to carry any commercial news, or to carry any man who has any commercial news about his person, faster than the schedule time.

The COURT. But cannot he carry the mail matter as fast as he chooses ?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes, sir ; but he cannot carry anybody else faster.

The COURT. Oh, yes.

Mr. INGERSOLL. And no other person has the right to carry any mail matter except that contractor.

The COURT. Either fast or slow ?

Mr. INGERSOLL. No, sir ; the community is absolutely at the mercy of the department.

Mr. HENKLE. He cannot carry the mail faster than the schedule time.

Mr. INGERSOLL. No ; he cannot.

The COURT. Why ?

Mr. CARPENTER. Because he has to carry it according to contract.

Mr. INGERSOLL. He has to carry it according to schedule.

The COURT. I do not know of any such regulation as that.

Mr. CARPENTER. The contract provides that he shall carry it by the schedule.

The COURT. I do not know that there is anything in the contract to forbid him carrying it faster than that.

Mr. CARPENTER. Yes ; there is.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Let us settle that. One would suppose that all questions would be settled in this case, but that is a new one.

Mr. HENKLE. The reason why is because the people along the route have a right to expect the mail to arrive at a particular time, and if it went either faster or slower than the schedule time, they would be deprived of the privilege of knowing exactly when it arrived.

The COURT. Mr. Henkle has the credit of making that discovery.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I think it is the law. It is the same as the railways; they have to advertise when they come and when they leave. Otherwise, you might wait there a week.

Mr. HENKLE. Your honor has forgotten. We had that question up at the former trial, and discussed it at the time.

Mr. MERRICK. Oh, no. This is the first time I ever heard it in my life.

Mr. HENKLE. I remember discussing it at that time.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Here is the contract at page 543, and I will read that part of it:

Not to transmit by themselves, or either of them, or either of their agents, or be concerned in transmitting commercial intelligence more rapidly than by mail; not to carry, otherwise than in the mail, letters, packets, or newspapers which should go by mail, or convey or transport any person engaged in carrying letters, packets, or newspapers which should go by mail.

Now I turn over to see what they will do with a man if he does that, and I find on page 554, at the last line of the first paragraph, that the penalty is equal to a quarter's pay in each case.

The COURT. Yes; but he is not forbidden to go faster than the schedule time.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes; he must carry it according to schedule.

The COURT. Where is that?

Mr. INGERSOLL. There it is in the contract.

Mr. HENKLE. Allow me to read it:

1st. To carry said mail with certainty, celerity, and security, using therefor such means as may be necessary to transport the whole of said mail, whatever may be its size, weight, or increase, during the term of this contract, and within the time fixed in the annexed schedule of departures and arrivals; and so to carry until said schedule is altered by the authority of the Postmaster-General of the United States, as hereinafter provided, and then to carry according to such altered schedule.

The COURT. That is, within the time.

Mr. INGERSOLL. No, "of departures and arrivals."

Mr. HENKLE. Excuse me; one of the main elements of such a contract is the schedule, to leave the starting-point at such a time and arrive at the destination at such another time, and thus to carry it on that schedule.

The COURT. Within the time.

Mr. CARPENTER. According to the schedule.

Mr. INGERSOLL. All I want to get at is that point, that no mail can be carried by anybody except the United States, and if a community wants more mail it has no right to establish an express that will carry the mail faster, because the United States has the monopoly. Now, if you want more mail, what are you to do? You cannot start one yourself; the Government will not allow it. What have you to do? You have to petition the Government to carry the mail faster or to carry it more frequently; and the reason you have to ask the Government to do this is because the Government will not permit you to do it; consequently you have only one resort. What is that? Petition. And, in this very case I believe his honor used this language:

Every man carrying the mail has the right to take care of his business. He has the right to get up petitions. He has the right to call the attention of the people to what he supposes to be their needs in that regard. He has the right to do it, and the fact that he does it is not the slightest evidence that he has conspired with any human being.

Now, if the man carrying the mail has the right to call the attention of the people to their needs, have not the people the right to do all that themselves? If the man carrying the mail has the right to get up a petition, surely the people have the right; and if the people have the right, surely the man has that right. That is the only way we can find out in this country what the people want—that is, to hear from them. They have the right to tell what they want.

But these gentlemen say, "Anybody will sign a petition." Well, if that is true, there is no great necessity for forging one. Very few people will steal what they can get for the asking. If a bank or a man offers you all the money you want, you would hardly go and forge a check to get it. I will come to that in a few moments.

Now, gentlemen, according to this evidence you have got to determine, as I said in the outset, Was there a conspiracy? The second question you have to determine is, When? In every crime in the world you have got to prove the four W's—Who, When, What, Where? Who conspired? When? What about? Where? Now I want to ask you a few questions, and I want you to keep this evidence in mind. Was there a conspiracy when Dorsey received the letter from Peck or Miner? Had the egg of this crime then been laid? Had it been hatched at that time? Is there any evidence of it? The object then was to make some bids. It is not necessary to conspire to make bids. You cannot conspire to make fraudulent bids unless you enter into an agreement that the lowest bid is not to be accepted, or agree upon some machinery by which the lowest bid is not received, or put in a bid with fraudulent and worthless security. Will the Government say that there was a conspiracy at the time Peck or Miner wrote to S. W. Dorsey? What evidence have you that there was? None. What evidence have you that there was not? The evidence of Miner and the evidence of S. W. Dorsey. What else? Boone had not been seen at that time. John W. Dorsey was not here. Peck was not here. Peck or Miner had written the letter. Was there any conspiracy then? Is there any evidence of it? Is there enough to make a respectable suspicion even in the mind of jealousy? Does it amount even to a Trifle light as air?

Was it when Dorsey sent for Boone? Boone says no. He ought to know. S. W. Dorsey says no. John W. Dorsey was not here. Miner had not arrived. The only suspicious thing up to that point is that Dorsey lived "in his house;" that he received this letter "in his house," and that Boone visited him "in his house." That is all. Now, if there is a particle of evidence, I want the attorney for the Government who closes this case to point it out, and to be fair. Was it when Miner got here in December, 1877? Miner says no. Boone says no. Stephen W. Dorsey says no. John W. Dorsey was not yet here. All the direct evidence says no. All the indirect evidence says nothing. Now let us keep our old text in view. I want to ask you if there is a thing in all the evidence not consistent with innocence? Was it not consistent with innocence that Peck and Miner and John W. Dorsey should agree to bid? Was it not consistent with innocence that John W. Dorsey met Peck at Oberlin, and that he met Miner in Sandusky? Was not that consistent with innocence? Was it not consistent with innocence for Peck to write S. W. Dorsey a letter? Was it not consistent with innocence for Dorsey to open it and read it and then send for Boone and give it to him? Boone in the mean time proceeded to get information so that they could bid intelligently. Was that consistent with innocence? Perfectly. More than that, it was inconsistent with guilt. What next? May be this conspiracy was gotten up about the 16th of January, when John W. Dorsey came here. Dorsey says no; Boone says no; Miner says no; and S. W. Dorsey says no. That is the direct evidence. Where is the indirect evidence? There is none? Ah, but they say, don't you remember those Clendenning bonds? Yes. Is there anything in the indictment about them? No. Was any contract granted upon those bonds or proposals? No. Was the Government ever defrauded out of a cent by them? No. Is there any charge in this case relative to them? No. Everybody says no. John W. Dorsey entered into a partnership with A. E. Boone after he came here. Is that consistent with innocence? Yes. No doubt many of the jury have been in partnership with people. There is nothing wrong about that. He also entered into partnership with Miner and Peck. There were two firms, John W. Dorsey & Co., which meant A. E. Boone and John W. Dorsey, and Miner, Peck & Co., which meant Miner, Peck and John W. Dorsey. Is there anything criminal in that? No. They had a right to bid. They had a right to form an association, a partnership. There was nothing more suspicious in that than there would have been in evidence of their eating and sleeping. Now, then, was this conspiracy entered into on August 7, 1878, when Boone went out? Boone says no, and with charming frankness he says if there had been a conspiracy he would have staid. He said, "If I had even suspected one, I never would have gone out. If I had dreamed that they had a good thing, I should have staid in." He swears that at that time there was not any. Miner swears to it and S. W. Dorsey swears to it. Everybody swears to it except the counsel for the prosecution. Rerdell swears to it. That is the only suspicious thing about it. Now, at that time, August 7, when Boone went out, S. W. Dorsey was not here and John W. Dorsey was not here. Who was? Miner. What was the trouble? Brady told him, "I want you to put on that service. If you don't I will declare you a failing contractor." A little while before that Miner had met Dorsey in Saint Louis, and Dorsey had said, "This is the last money I will furnish. No matter whether I conspired or not, I am through. This magnificent conspiracy, silver-plated and gold-lined, I give up. There are millions in it, but I want no more. I am through." So Mr. Miner, using his power of attorney from John W. Dorsey and Peck, took in Mr. Vaile.

I believe that Mr. Rerdell swears that the reason they took in Vaile was that they wanted a man close to Brady. According to the Government they had already conspired with Brady. They could not get much closer than that, could they? Miner was a coconspirator, and yet they wanted somebody to introduce him to Brady. John W. Dorsey and S. W. Dorsey were in the same position. They were conspirators. The bargain was all made, signed, sealed, and delivered, and yet they went around hunting somebody that was close to Brady. Brady said, "I will declare you all failing contractors. I can't help it, though I have conspired with you. I give up all my millions. This service has got to be put on. The only way to stop it is for you to seek for a man that is close to me. You are not close enough." Now, absurdity may go further than that, but I doubt it. You must recollect that that contract was signed as of the 16th of August. You remember its terms. At that time not a cent had been paid to S. W. Dorsey. His Post Office drafts had been cut out by the subcontracts. Afterwards he had a quarrel with Vaile. We will call it December, 1878. Was the conspiracy flagrant then? Let us have some good judgment about this, gentlemen. You are to decide this question the same as you decide others, except that you are to take into consideration the gravity of the consequences flowing from the verdict. You must decide it with your faculties all about you, with your intellectual eyes wide open, without a bit of prejudice in your minds, and without a bit of fear. You must decide it like men. You must judge men as you know them. Was there a conspiracy between these defendants in December, 1878, when S. W. Dorsey came back here and found out the security for his money was gone, and when he had the quarrel with Mr. Vaile? Is there the slightest scintilla of testimony to show that Mr. Vaile came into this business through any improper motive? I challenge the prosecution to point to one line of testimony that any reasonable man can believe even tending to show that Mr. Vaile was actuated by an improper motive. I defy them to show a line tending to prove that John R. Miner was actuated by an improper motive when he asked Vaile to assist him in this business. I defy them to show that Brady was actuated by an improper motive when he told them, "You must put on that service or I will declare you all failing contractors." Was there a conspiracy then? I ask you, Mr. Foreman, and I ask each of you, Was there a conspiracy at that time? Have the prosecution introduced one particle of testimony to show that there was? In March was there a conspiracy? Will you call dividing a conspiracy? Will you call going apart coming together? If you will, then there must have been a conspiracy in March. A conspiracy to do what? A conspiracy to separate; a conspiracy to have nothing in common from that day forward. Mr. Vaile entered into a conspiracy then that he would have no more business relations with S. W. Dorsey. He swears that at that time nothing on earth would have tempted him to go on. That is what they call being in a conspiring frame of mind. Not another step would he go. In March they separated, and each one went his way. It was finally fixed up, and finally settled in May. John W. Dorsey was out with his \$10,000, and Peck was out with his \$10,000. S. W. Dorsey, for the first time, became the owner of thirty routes, or something more, and Miner and Vaile of the balance, I think about ninety-six. According to that contract of August 16 John W. Dorsey only had a third interest in the routes he had with Boone, and not another cent. There was a division. If there was a conspiracy of such a magnitude, why should Boone go out of it? Why should John W. Dorsey sell out for \$10,000? Why should John W. Dorsey offer Boone one-third of it? Why was Mr. A. W. Moore offered one-quarter of it—a gentleman who could be employed for \$150 a month? I ask you these questions, gentlemen. I ask you to answer them all in your own minds. Recollect, on the 16th of August there was a conspiracy involving hundreds of thousands of dollars. In that conspiracy was the Second Assistant Postmaster-General. They had the Post-Office Department by the throat. They had the Postmaster-General blindfolded. Yet Mr. Miner went to Vaile and said, "Now, just furnish a little money to put on these routes and you may have 40 per cent. of this conspiracy." He was giving him hundreds of thousands of dollars. Is that the way people talk that conspire together? Would not Miner have gone to Brady and said, "Look here, what is the use of acting like a fool? What do you want me to give 40 per cent. of this thing to Vaile for? I had better give 20 per cent. more to you. That would allow me to keep 20 per cent. more too, and then there will be one less to keep the secret." He never thought of that. I want you to think of these things, gentlemen, all of you, and see how they will strike your mind. What did they want of Boone? S. W. Dorsey they say was the prime mover. He hatched this conspiracy. Miner, his own brother, Peck, and everybody else were simply his instruments, his tools. What did he want Boone for? He had a magnificent conspiracy from which millions were to come. He told Boone, "I will give you a third of it." What for? He told Moore, "I will give you one-quarter." Seven-twelfths gone already. T. J. B. 33 $\frac{1}{3}$ per cent. That is about all. Then 65 per cent. more to the subcontractors. I want you to think about these things, gentlemen. If they had such a conspiracy what did they want of Mr. Moore?

Mr. DAVIDGE. Your honor, let me suggest that the hour of recess is at hand.

The COURT. I will consult Colonel Ingersoll about that.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I never refused to adjourn in my life.

The COURT. We will take a recess then, gentlemen.

Mr. WILSON. For how long?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Probably an hour, I suppose. Let us have an hour. I will speak faster for it.

At this point (12 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the court took a recess for one hour.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. INGERSOLL. [Resuming.] Gentlemen, was it natural for S. W. Dorsey to get the money back that he had advanced, or some security for it? Was that natural? When a man seeks to have a debt secured is that a suspicious circumstance? That is all he did. He was out several thousand dollars. He wanted to secure that debt and he took another debt of $20,000 upon him as a burden. If this had been a conspiracy he could have furnished this money that he had to pay to others to put the service on the route. I leave it to each one of you if that action to secure that debt was not perfectly natural. I will ask you another question. If he was the originator of the conspiracy would he have taken 30 per cent. burdened with a debt of $20,000? The way to find out whether there is sense in anything or not is to ask yourself questions. Put yourself in that place; you, the master of the situation; you, the author of the entire scheme. Would you take one-third of what you yourself had produced, and that third burdened with $20,000 worth of debt, and then make your debt out of the proceeds? I want every one of you to ask yourself the question, because you have got to decide this case with your brains and with your intelligence; not somebody else, but you yourself. We want your verdict; we want your individual opinion; not somebody else's. There is the safety of the jury trial. We are to have the opinions of twelve men, and those opinions agreeing. Where twelve honest men agree, if they are also independent men, the rule is that the verdict is right. The opinion of an honest man is always valuable, if he is only honest, and if it is his opinion it is valuable. It is valuable if he does not go to some mental second-hand store and buy cheap opinions from somebody else, or take cheap opinions. In this case I ask the individual opinion of each one of you. I want each one of you to pass upon this evidence; I want each one of you to say whether if Dorsey had been the author and finisher of this conspiracy he would have taken 30 per cent., burdened with $20,000 of debt to others and $15,000 of debt to himself? If you can answer that question in the affirmative you can do anything. After that nothing can be impossible to you, except a reasonable verdict. You cannot answer it that way. Why should he have cared so much about fifteen or sixteen thousand dollars with a conspiracy worth hundreds of thousands of dollars? Why run the risk of making the whole conspiracy public? Why run the risk of his detection and its destruction? You cannot answer it. Perhaps the prosecution can answer it. I hope they will try.

Mr. Ker, on page 4493, makes a very important admission.

After they—

Meaning the defendants—

had these contracts, there was a combination, an agreement between all these people, that they were to do certain things in order to get at the public Treasury and get more money.

What does that mean? That means that this conspiracy was entered into after the defendants obtained the contracts, so that Mr. Ker fixes the birth of this conspiracy after these contracts had been awarded to the defendants. That being so, all the bids, proposals, Clendenning letter, Haycock letter, proposals in blank, and bidders' names left out, fade away.

Mr. WILSON. And the Chico letter.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The Chico letter I will come to after a while. I will not be as afraid of it as were the counsel for the prosecution. I will not, like the Levite, pass by on the other side of the Chico letter. I will not treat it as if it were a leper, as if it had a contagious disease. When I get to it I will speak about it. All these things, then, under that admission, go for naught, and have nothing to do with the case, and consequently nobody need argue with regard to them any more, although incidentally I may allude to them again. There is no doubt, recollect, after this admission. There is no clause in the indictment saying that we endeavored to defraud this Government by bids, by proposals, by bonds, or by contracts. Not a word. That is all out; in my judgment it never should have been in the case at all. What is the next thing we did? It is alleged that the moment Dorsey got these contracts he laid the foundation to defraud the Government by a new form of subcontract. Let me answer that fully, and let that put an end to it from this time out. Until May 17, 1878, the Post-Office Department did not recognize subcontractors. After these contracts came into the possession of these defendants Congress passed a law recognizing subcontractors. Consequently the contracts of the subcontractors that were to be recognized by the Government had to be somewhere near the same form as the contracts with the original contractors. The moment the contract of the subcontractor was to be recognized by the Government then it was necessary and proper to put a clause in that subcontract for expedition and a clause in that subcontract for increase of service. Why? So that the Government should know, if the route was expedited, what percentage the subcontractor was entitled to. Instead of that clause in the subcontract being evidence that Mr. Dorsey was endeavoring to swindle the Government, the evidence is exactly the other way. It was put there for the purpose of protecting the subcontractor, so that if expedition was put upon the route the Government would know what per cent. of the expedition to pay to the subcontractor. If that clause had not been in that subcontract the Government could not have told how much money to pay the subcontractor, and as a consequence the subcontract would have been worthless as security for the subcontractor. And yet a clause put in for the protection of the subcontractor is referred to in your presence as evidence that the man who suggested it was a thief and a robber. What more? They say to these witnesses, "Did you ever see such a clause as that in a subcontract before?" No. "Why?" The Government never recognized a subcontractor before that time, and consequently there was no necessity for such a clause. Think how they have endeavored to torture every circumstance, no matter how honest, no matter how innocent, no matter how sensible; how they have endeavored to twist it and turn it against these defendants. Gentlemen, whenever you start out on the ground that a man is guilty, everything looks like it. If you hate a neighbor and anything happens to your lot you say he did it. If your horse is poisoned he is the man who did it. If your fence is torn down he is the fellow. You will go to work and get all the little circumstances that have nothing to do with the matter braided and woven into one string. Everything will be accounted for as coming from that enemy, and as something he has done.

They say another thing: That we defrauded the Government by filing subcontracts. You cannot do it. When this case is being closed I want somebody to explain to the jury how it is possible for a man to defraud this Government by filing a subcontract. I do not claim to have much ingenuity. I claim that I have not enough to decide that question or to answer it. I can lay down the proposition that it is an absolute, infinite, eternal impossibility to fraudulently file a subcontract as against the Government. It cannot be done. Oh, but they say, the subcontractor did not take the oath. There is no law that he should take an oath and there never was. There may be at some time, but there is not now. The law that everybody engaged in carrying the mail and every salaried officer of the department shall take an oath was passed before the law of the 17th of May, 1879, allowing a subcontractor to file his subcontract. Before that time the Government had nothing to do with the subcontractor. If he actually carried the mail; if he actually took possession of the mail, he had to take the oath of the carrier. But I defy these gentlemen to find in the law any oath for a subcontractor. There never was such an oath. If there is one, find it. The law that every salaried officer and every carrier of the mail shall take the oath was passed years and years and years before the law was passed allowing subcontracts to be filed. What of it? Suppose a man who is a subcontractor carries the mail and does not take any oath. That is as good as to take the oath and not carry the mail. What possible evidence is it of fraud? Suppose it should turn out that the carrier did not take the oath, but carried the mail honestly. What of it. Is it any evidence of fraud? If a man tells the truth without being sworn, is that evidence that he is a dishonest man? If a man carries the mail properly and in accordance with law without being sworn to do so, it seems to me that is evidence that he is an honest fellow, and you don't need to swear him. So when a subcontractor takes a subcontract and carries the mail according to law it does not make any difference whether he swears to do so or not. Is there any evidence in this case that the subcontractors stole any letters on account of not having taken the oath? When they answer, let them point to the law that the subcontractor is to take an oath. There is no such law and never was.

Now, according to this admission of Mr. Ker, the conspiracy commenced after they got the contract. Very well. I need not talk about anything back of that. I do not know whether the admission is binding upon the Government or not. I believe the court holds that the Government is not bound by the admission of any agent, and that the Government only authorizes an agent to admit facts. May be he is mistaken. The Government only authorizes an agent to admit the law. At any rate Mr. Ker did the very best he knew how, and he says this conspiracy commenced when they got the contracts, and so we need not go back of that unless the Government is now willing to say that Mr. Ker has made a mistake. I lay down the proposition, gentlemen, that you need not go back of the division of these routes. Then you must go forward. What was done after that? Recollect the exact position of Senator Dorsey and the exact position of these other people.

The next claim is, although there was no conspiracy until after they got the contracts, that Senator Dorsey was interested in these contracts while he was a Senator of the United States. If they could establish that fact it would not tend to establish a conspiracy. There is nothing in this indictment about it. I admit that if he were a Senator, and at the same time interested in mail contracts, he might be tried and his robes of office stripped from him, and that he could be rendered infamous. But that is not what he is being tried for. They say he was in the Senate, and he was anxious to keep it secret. Mr. Ker says he was so anxious to keep it secret that he sent all these communications out West in Senate envelopes, so they would think a Senator had something to do with it. Then it turned out that all the envelopes were in blank; just plain white envelopes, with nothing on them, and away went that theory. If he were in the Senate and engaged in these routes also, and wished to keep it a profound secret, because if known it would blast his reputation forever, do you think he would have had all these circulars sent out in Senate envelopes and on Senate paper? If he did allow that to be done, it is absolutely conclusive evidence that he was not interested. Suppose I was trying to keep it an absolute, profound, eternal, everlasting secret that I had anything to do with a certain matter, would I write letters about it? Would I use paper that had my name, the number of my office, and the character of my business printed upon it? Would I? To ask that question is to answer it. Another thing: They claim that he was in the Senate and infinitely anxious to keep it a secret, and yet he found Mr. Moore, a perfect stranger, and said to him in effect: "Yes, Mr. Moore; I don't know you, but I want you to know me. I am a rascal. I am a member of the Senate, but I am engaged in mail routes. I hope you will not tell anybody, because it would destroy me. I have great confidence in you, because I don't know you." That is the only way he could have had confidence in Moore. He would have to have it the first time he saw him or it never would have come. To this perfect stranger he said, "Here, I am in the Senate, but I am interested in these routes. I am in a conspiracy. I want you to go out and attend to this business. I want you to do all these things, and the reason I tell you is because I am a Senator and I want it kept a profound secret. That is the reason I tell you." That is what these gentlemen call probable. That is their idea of reasonability and of what is natural. That may be true in a world where water always runs up hill. It can never be true in this world. It is not in accordance with your experience. Not a man here has any experience in accordance with that testimony or that doctrine; not one. You never will have unless you become insane. If this trial lasts much longer you may have that experience. It is a wonder to me it has not happened already.

There is another queer circumstance connected with this case. While Dorsey told it all to Moore he kept it a profound secret from Boone. Boone, you know, was in at the first. Boone got up all this information. Boone was interested in these bids, and yet he never told Boone. He had known Boone, you see, for several weeks. He told Moore the first day, the first minute. He wished to relieve his stuffed bosom of that secret. Moore was the first empty thing he found, and he poured it into him. It is astonishing to me that he succeeded in keeping that secret from Boone, but he did. He even kept it from Rerdell. Rerdell never heard of it—a gentleman who picks up every scrap, who listens at the key-hole of an opportunity for the fragment of a sound. He never heard it. John W. Dorsey did not even know anything about it. Nobody but Moore. Now, I ask you, gentlemen, is there any sense in that story? I ask you. I ask you, also, if the testimony of Stephen W. Dorsey with regard to that transaction is not absolutely consistent with itself? Did he not in every one of those transactions act like a reasonable, sensible, good man? Oh, but they say it is not natural for a man to help his brother; certainly it is not natural for a man to help his brother-in-law, and nobody but a hardened scoundrel would help a friend, and Dorsey is not that kind of a man. Occasionally in a case an accident will happen, and from an unexpected quarter a side-light will be thrown upon the character of a man, sometimes for good, and sometimes for evil. Sometimes a little circumstance will come out that will cover a man with infamy, something that nobody expected to prove, and that leaps out of the dark. Then, again, sometimes by a similar accident a man will be covered with glory. In this case there was a little fact that came to the surface about Stephen W. Dorsey that made me proud that I was defending him. Oh, he is not the man to help his brother; he is not the man to help his brother-in-law; he is not the man to help a friend; and yet, when Torrey was upon the stand, he was asked if he was working for Dorsey, and he said no, and was asked if Dorsey paid him at a certain time, or if he owed him, and he said no. He was asked why, and he replied, "Because only a little while before, when I was not working for him, and my boy was dead, he gave me a thousand dollars to put him beneath the sod." That is the kind of a man Stephen W. Dorsey is. I like such people. A man capable of doing that is capable of helping his brother, of helping his brother-in-law, and of helping his friends. A man capable of doing that is capable of any great and splendid action. Is there any other man connected with this trial that ever did a more generous, nay, a more loving and lovely thing? How such a man can excite the hatred of the prosecution is more than I can understand.

Now we have got to the division, and the question arises, was there a division. Let us see. On page 5009 Mr. Bliss admits that Vaile, immediately upon Dorsey's coming out of the Senate, came here for the purpose of settling this business up; that he made up his mind to have no more to do with Dorsey. Then Mr. Bliss makes this important admission, and I do not want any attorney for the Government to deny it. Let me read it to you:

It was a division, gentlemen, as of the 1st of April, which was the end of a quarter. From the 1st of April they all agreed that those routes, respectively, should be set off by one for the others, and that thereafter they should be the absolute and uncontrolled property of the party to whom they were set off.

There is the admission. That is not all of it:

The assignment of the proportions of the indebtedness could not be made at once, because they could not tell what money they would get from the Post-Office Department on the 1st of April for the preceding quarter, not knowing what fines and deductions there might be.

That is on page 5009. He admits that in May there was a final division, and that that division was to take effect as from the 1st day of April, and that after that each party took the routes allotted to him, and they became the uncontrolled property of that person, no other person having the right to interfere. There is your admission, just as broad as it can be made. Mr. Bliss, after having made that admission, which virtually gives up the Government case, then threw a sheet-anchor to the windward and said, "But when they divided they made a bargain with each other that they would make the necessary papers." What for? To carry out the division. That is all. Now, the only cornerstone for this conspiracy, the only pebble left in the entire foundation is the agreement to make the necessary papers after the division. That is all that is left. The rest has been dissolved or dug up and carted away by this admission. Let us see what that agreement was. Mr. Bliss turned to the evidence of John W. Dorsey, on page 4105:

Q. At the time you sold out, was there any understanding about your making papers?—A. That was a part of the agreement. I was to sign all the necessary papers to carry on the business.

When he sold out he agreed to sign all the necessary papers. It is like this: Mr. Bliss says on such a day for instance, they divided. Suppose, instead of being routes it was all land. They divided the land and then they agreed to make the deeds? That was the conspiracy; not in the land; not in the agreement about the land; not in the bargain, but in the execution of the papers in consequence of the bargain. That was the conspiracy. They agreed to make all the necessary papers. That was the agreement. Then the court asked John W. Dorsey a question.

Q. You agreed to sign what?—A. All the necessary papers to carry on the business.

That is what he agreed to do. What else? What were those papers? First, they were to sign all the subcontracts that were necessary, all the Post-Office drafts necessary, and they were to sign letters like this:

The Post-Office Department, in regard to this route, will hereafter send all communications to the undersigned.

In other words the object was to let the person who fell heir to a given route in the division control that route. That was all. The man who was the contractor agreed that he would sign all the necessary papers. For what purpose? To allow each man who got a route to be the owner of it and control it and draw the money. That is all. And yet it is considered rascality.

Let me call your attention to another piece of evidence on this subject. On page 5016 Mr. Bliss is talking about all these papers and these letters that were written and apparently signed by Peck, but really signed by Miner, saying, "I want you to send all communications in reference to such a route to post-office box No. so-and-so, John M. Peck," sometimes with an M under it and sometimes without. He did that in consideration of the agreement at the time he got the routes that had been originally allotted to Peck. Mr. Bliss brought here a vast number of these papers, and then he continued, on page 5017:

All those, gentlemen, are orders, dated after the division, many of them coming away down into 1881, and all of them relating to routes with which Peck had no connection, because he severed his connection with all the routes prior to the 1st of April, or as of the 1st of April, 1879. John W. Dorsey tells you that he signed papers right along—

Of course he did. He agreed to—and I have here a series of them. Many of them are orders not in blank. There are among the papers orders signed in blank, but these are dated, and they are witnessed not always by the same person as indicating that they got together and signed a lot of orders at the time of the division. There is every indication that the dates are correct. The witnesses are different at different times.

The COURT. These same orders would have been made if the division had been perfectly honest.

That is what I say. That is what we all say, gentlemen.

Mr. BLISS. These same orders might have been made. I am only calling attention—

The COURT. [Interposing.] They have no tendency to prove a continuing conspiracy.

That is what I say. Then—

Mr. BLISS—

Not willing to be put down—

They have a tendency to prove that these parties having been, as we claim, in a conspiracy, they sold out and made a division. I am going to call your honor's attention after recess to some views that I entertain upon that subject.

Then the court hits him once more :

The COURT. What I mean to say is that these papers would have been entirely proper if the transaction had been honest.

If the transaction then had been perfectly honest the papers would have been precisely as they are. From the papers being precisely as they are, do they tend to show that the transaction was dishonest, when it is admitted by everybody and decided by the court that if the transaction had been perfectly honest the papers would have been just as they are? Recollect my text. Every fact when you are proving a circumstantial case has to point to the guilt of the defendants, and their guilt has to be found from all the facts in the case beyond a reasonable doubt. If there is one fact inconsistent with their guilt, the case is gone.

There is another little admission to which I call your attention. Nothing delights me as much as to have the prosecution in a moment of forgetfulness, or we will say on purpose, admit a fact. Mr. Bliss said, on page 5018 :

You will bear in mind that the division took place some eight months previous to that.

That was January 1st, 1880.

However that may be, these papers are all papers which on their faces might be innocent and fair and proper. They are papers which, under ordinary circumstances, might be executed to enable others than the contractor to draw the pay and to be filed with the department, though it appears, I think, by the evidence in this case that no draft could be filed except shortly prior to the quarter as to which it applied. As to these papers all that we have to say is this: they are papers on their face apparently innocent, papers calculated to go through in the ordinary practice as though there was nothing wrong about them. At the same time the evidence shows that they were papers executed by these several parties at the time of or in pursuance of the agreement of the division.

I do not want anything better. That settles the papers. They were made at the time they agreed to make them. It was the only way in which they could give the party who got the route absolute control of the route.

Now, gentlemen, apart from these papers, I believe they have three witnesses, at least they are called witnesses, in this case. The first witness that I will call your attention to, and who figures about as early as anybody, is A. W. Moore. I want to ask you a few questions about his testimony. I want you to understand exactly what he swears to and the circumstances. Let us see. He swears first that he had a conversation with Miner, in which he told Miner that he would work for him for \$150 a month and expenses, with permission to put on some of his own service, I think, in Oregon and California, and that Mr. Miner accepted his terms, and employed him as the agent of Miner, Peck & Co. Recollect that, Miner, Peck & Co. Second, that Miner told him to report at Dorsey's house to get instructions. Miner at that time was staying at Dorsey's house. I do not know whether it was to get instructions from Dorsey or from the house, or from Miner. I take it, from Miner. No matter. Mr. Moore then swears that he reported to Dorsey and Dorsey asked him his opinion about the service. Moore had never been there and did not know one of the routes, but Dorsey was anxious for his opinion. How did he know any more about the service than Dorsey? There is no evidence that Moore knew the price. There is no evidence that he knew the amount the Government was to pay on a single route. He was a stranger. Then he had another conversation with Dorsey in which Dorsey told him that they had bid on the long routes with slow time, because that was the way to make money. Not satisfied with that, Mr. Dorsey showed him the subcontracts with the blanks and with the changes, and then he explained to him the descending scale, and he explained to him the percentage of expedition. He said Dorsey told him 40 per cent. of the expedition. Boone swears it was 65 per cent. There is a little difference; not much. Moore swears that he himself was to have 25 per cent. of the stealings. Let us see how that is. Boone swears that the subcontractor was to have 65 per cent. Rerdell swears that Brady was to have $33\frac{1}{3}$ per cent. That leaves $1\frac{2}{3}$ per cent. for the contractor. Do you see? The subcontractor got \$65 out of \$100, and then Brady got \$33.33 $\frac{1}{3}$. That makes \$98.33 $\frac{1}{3}$, leaving the contractor \$1.66 $\frac{2}{3}$. That was all he got. Did you ever know of anybody on earth doing business at a smaller per cent. and paying for the trouble? Now, Mr. Moore comes in with his statement. He says the subcontractor got 40 per cent., and then he himself got 25 per cent. That makes 65. Then, according to Rerdell, Brady was to have $33\frac{1}{3}$ per cent. That makes 98 $\frac{1}{3}$. There is the most wonderful coincidence in this whole trial. Rerdell and Boone and Moore agree exactly that the contractor gave up 98 $\frac{1}{3}$ per cent. to others and took $1\frac{2}{3}$ himself. Did you ever know as much humanity in a conspiracy as that? Did you ever know such a streak of benevolence to strike anybody? It reminds me of a case of disinterested benevolence that happened in Southern Illinois. A young man there went to a lawyer and said to him, "I want to get a divorce. I was married at a time when I was drunk, and when I sobered up I didn't like the marriage. I want a divorce." The lawyer asked, "What do you want of a divorce?" "Well," he said, "do you know the widow Thompson?" "Yes." "She has been a widow there for about forty years. Do you know her boy? He is the biggest thief in this county. He went over the Ohio River the other day and stole a set of harness and a mule." "What has that to do with this divorce case?" "Well," he said, "I want to get a divorce and I want to marry that widow." "What for?" "I want to get control of that boy and see if I can't break him from stealing. I have got some humanity in me." Here are S. W. Dorsey, his brother, his brother-in-law, Miner, and Vaile starting a charity conspiracy, and out of every hundred dollars that they steal they offer \$98.33 upon the altar of disinterested friendship. You are asked to believe that. You will not do it.

Mr. Moore also swears that he received some money by a check, but he does not know whether the check was payable to him or payable to Miner, and that he got a power of attorney signed by Miner from John W. Dorsey and John M. Peck, and then he started, S. W. Dorsey assuring him in the meantime that he could tell the people out there that the service would be increased and expedited in a few days. Mr. Moore is a peculiar man. He says that that suited him exactly. He was willing to steal what little he could; he was willing to steal for $150 a month if he couldn't get any more, or he was willing to steal for a part of the stealing. If he could not get that he would take an ordinary salary. I should think he was a good man from what he says. You heard him. They were wonderfully anxious to prove by Moore that Dorsey was the head and front of this whole business. That was the object, and so he swore as to the instructions. He said he was instructed to get up petitions so that they could be torn off and the names pasted onto other petitions. He swore he carried out those instructions. He swore that Major agreed to do it, and I think a man by the name of McBean was going to do it. Yet, gentlemen, there never was such a petition gotten up. Major swore here that he never heard of it; that he never dreamed of it, and never agreed to it; that it was a lie; that it was never suggested to him. Moore went out West and came back as far as Denver, and at Denver met John R. Miner, and then came here and saw Dorsey. What did he do with Dorsey? He swears that he went to Stephen W. Dorsey and settled with him, and that Dorsey settled in a very generous and magnanimous way, and did not want to look at his account, and did not want to look at the book; had no anxiety or curiosity about the items. He just said, "How much is it?" It happened to be even dollars—$250. When a man goes out West and has hotel bills and all that sort of thing, when he comes to render his expense account it is always even dollars. Moore said $250. Dorsey gave it to him; never looked at the book at all. Moore swears that he made that settlement with Stephen W. Dorsey on the 11th day of July, 1878. Dorsey was then in the Senate.

Look at page 1417. You see that Moore had been smart; that is, what people call smart. You know it is never smart to tell a lie. Very few men have the brains to tell a good lie. It is an awfully awkward thing to deal with after you have told it. You see it will not fit anything else except another lie that you make, and you have to start a factory in a short time to make lies enough to support that poor little bantling that you left on the door-step of your honesty. A man that is going to tell a lie should be ingenious and he should have an excellent memory. That man swore that he settled with Dorsey to the 11th day of July, 1878; swore it for the purpose of convincing you that Dorsey employed him; that Dorsey gave him instructions; that Dorsey was the head and front of the conspiracy. I then handed him a little paper, and asked him, "Do you know anything about that? Did you ever sign that?" And here it is:

[Miner, Peck & Co., mail contractors John R. Miner, John M. Peck, John W. Dorsey. Branch office, Washington, D. C. Care of lock-box 714.]

DENVER, COLO.—

It was admitted by everybody, I believe, that that word "Denver" should have been Washington. It was printed Denver, but it happened in Washington—

July 24, 1878—

Not July 11. That is the day he got the money of Dorsey.

July 24, 1878.

Received of Miner, Peck & Co. $136, balance of salary and expenses in full to July 11, 1878.

A. W. MOORE.

To when? To July 24? No, sir; he settled with Dorsey to July 11, 1878. The gentleman had forgotten that he gave that. If he had only had a little more brains he would have avoided the $250, that even amount, and he would have said, "Dorsey did look over my books, and we had a little dispute about some items, and we just jumped at $250." But he swears that was the actual settlement, and then we bring in his receipt in writing, dated the 24th of July, 1878, saying that he received $166 that day, and that it was in full of his salary and expenses, not up to that date, but up to the 11th of July, 1878. If his testimony is true, he stole that $166. If his testimony is true, he settled with Dorsey in full for $250, and then he was mean enough to go and get $166 more for the same time. No, gentlemen, he was all right enough about it then; he told the falsehood here.

Now, what does Dorsey swear? Dorsey swears that he received an order from Miner to give this man $250. Miner swears that if Dorsey paid him anything it was on his, Miner's, request. That is a perfectly natural proceeding for Mr. Miner to request Dorsey to pay this man $250. The man came to Dorsey's house. Dorsey gave him $250 upon Miner's order. He was trusting John R. Miner for the money, and it was none of his business whether Miner owed it or not, and consequently he did not look at his book. Now, every fact is consistent with the truth of Mr. Dorsey's testimony; the fact is consistent with the truth of Miner's testimony; and the receipt of this man given to Miner on the 24th of July, 1878, demonstrates that he did not tell the truth, under oath, in this court before you.

That is the end of Mr. Moore; that is the end of him. You never need bother about him again as long as you live.

Why, they say, "Why didn't you impeach him?" He impeached himself. "Why didn't you call so-and-so?" Because we had that receipt; that is why. No need of killing a man that is dead. You need not give medicine to a corpse. When a thing is buried, let it go. When a man commits suicide, you need not murder him. When he destroys his own testimony, let it alone; it will not hurt you. I am not afraid of the testimony of Mr. Moore. If these gentlemen can galvanize it into the appearance of life, I should be very happy to see them do it. Everything that he swore upon this stand that in any way touched the defendants is shown not to be true.

Why should Dorsey have told him in 1878 to get up fraudulent petitions? Even Rerdell does not swear that in 1879 Dorsey instructed him to get up fraudulent petitions, and certainly he would go to the limit of the truth. After he made his story out of a piece of true cloth there would be very few scraps left. He would certainly go clear to the line. And yet, even he does not swear that when he went West to make contracts, to get up petitions, he was instructed by Mr. Dorsey to get up a fraudulent petition—not once. And yet Moore swears that in 1878, when Dorsey was in the Senate, he told him to get up these fraudulent petitions. It will not do.

Mr. Major swears that what he says about it is not true; Mr. McBean swears that what he says about it is not true; and then we have Moore's own receipt showing that it is not true.

On page 4757 Mr. Bliss tells you what kind of a man Moore is. He says, in effect, he is no account:

Then again, gentleman, when Mr. Moore was on the stand there was a great show of an intention to contradict him. On his cross-examination he was asked: Did you not tell Mr. Pelham so-and-so?

And did you not say so-and-so to Mr. Betts? And then we called Betts and the court thought we had not the right to contradict him, and that was the end of it.

They finally put Mr. Betts on the stand—but they were forced to take Betts. As if you would believe Betts as against Moore. * * * Moore stands before you, therefore, so far as all this testimony is concerned, wholly and absolutely uncontradicted.

Mr. Bliss says—

His testimony was that he was employed by Dorsey; his testimony was that he was settled with by Dorsey, and the testimony of the receipt that he signed is that he settled with Miner and not with Dorsey; the testimony of Miner is that he was settled with by Miner, and not with by Dorsey; the testimony of Dorsey is that he never had any conversation with him in the world except at the time he paid him the $250. They say Rerdell was present at the conversation. Why did they not prove it by Rerdell after Dorsey had sworn to the contrary? And yet Mr. Bliss tells you that he is not contradicted—"utterly uncontradicted."

Mr. Ker, it seems, has an opinion of this same witness, I believe. He says, at page 4511:

He says he started out and went to work, as these records show, and made the sub-contracts according to his instructions, and got up the petitions according to his instructions.

He swears he did not get up a petition at all, not one; he swears that he had not time. And yet these gentlemen say that he got up petitions according to his instructions, and he swears he did not. He swears he told Major to, and that Major signified his willingness to do it. Major swears that that is a falsehood. He swears the same with reference to McBean, and McBean swears that it is a falsehood. Now Mr. Ker goes on:

He fixed them up and changed the language a little in some and in some he did not take the trouble to change, but he fixed them all so that there was a space between the writing and the names, so that they could be cut off and pasted onto other papers.

He expressly denies that he ever fixed a petition in the world.

Mr. KER. What page?

Mr. INGERSOLL. You ask the page! Talk to the jury seven days! I say that this man never fixed up a petition, and he never says that he fixed up a petition. Where is the page on which he says it? He was willing to do it, but he had not the time. I will show you that language. There is what they say about this man. Then he says he got a note from Miner, and went to Denver and met Miner. That is right. Then Miner offered him a quarter interest in the routes in this vast conspiracy.

Let us find what Moore thinks of himself. We find that on page 1398. He is a good man, worthy of this case, according to the eternal fitness of things. I come to this quicker than I thought I would. It is page 1396:

Q. Were you to leave space enough to have that written on, or was it to be cut off?—A. I was to leave space enough between the petition and where the names were, so that when it was signed that space would be there.

Q. Did you get them up in that way?—A. Well, sir, I did not have but very little opportunity to get up petitions.

Q. Did you get up any in that way?—A. I didn't get up—

Q. [Interposing.] Did you not get up any in that way?—A. No, sir; I didn't have the time.

There it is. Now, of course, Mr. Ker forgot. I call your attention to this to show you how little weight such evidence is entitled to in reference to a conversation five years ago, when Mr. Ker could not remember this with the book before him.

Mr. KER. I asked you for the page on which Mr. McBean's testimony appears.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Mr. Moore is the witness. Mr. Moore swears that he never got up such a petition. Mr. Ker says he did. He and Mr. Ker will have to settle their own difficulty.

Now I come to another opinion as to what kind of a man this fellow Moore is. "Oh," Mr. Bliss says, "he is not a high style of man." I admit it. He says Mr. McBean did not agree to get up any petitions. That is so. But he agreed to get up petitions and circulate them.

Q. After you explained the matter in accordance with your instructions, he said he would go on and take the contract?—A. No, sir; after he had agreed to get them up I showed him how I would get them up.

Q. What did he say? Did he say he would not get them up in that way?—A. He did not say he would or he would not.

Mr. MERRICK. You did not give the page.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That commences on page 1397, and I am now reading on page 1398:

Q. Did you see anything wrong in that yourself—I mean, if you were getting $150 a month for it?—A. At that time I was not getting $150 a month.

That is a good, square answer.

Q. What were you getting then?

Then he thought he would be smart.

A. I was to get one-fourth of all the stealings.

Q. Were you to help steal? Do you now say to this jury under oath that you were to help steal?—A. I was to do what I agreed to do.

Q. Were you to help steal? Do you now swear to this jury that you were then a thief?—A. I understood when I signed that contract that I was entering into a conspiracy as much as any of them.

Q. That you were entering into a conspiracy to steal? Face the word. Don't hang over a word. Were you then under a contract to steal?—A. [No answer.]

Q. Answer the question?—A. Well, it might as well be called in plain English stealing, because it was stealing any way. It was robbing the Government.

Q. What do you call it?—A. We generally call it robbery. It is the same thing.

Q. Were you at that time under a contract to rob the Government?—A. I was, sir.

Q. You so understood it?—A. I did, sir.

Q. Do you so understand it now?—A. I so understand it now, sir.

Q. And you were to have one-fourth of what might be stolen?—A. One-fourth of the profits after paying certain expenses.

Q. One-fourth of the stealings. Do not call it profits. STEALINGS. Were you to have one-fourth of the stealings?—A. That is what I was to have, sir.

Now, we will end Mr. Moore right there, and if the court is willing I will let the court adjourn until Monday morning.

The COURT. It is rather early.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I shall be all the shorter.

Mr. CRANE (foreman of the jury). Do we adjourn to 11 o'clock Monday morning?

Mr. MERRICK. Oh, yes; let it be till 11 o'clock.

The COURT. I understand, Colonel Ingersoll, that you are making the closing argument for the defense?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Well, I do not know that I can say that entirely, but I do not think we will have any trouble about it.

Mr. MERRICK. I do not know that the counsel for the Government have any right to make any inquiry in regard to that—

The COURT. [Interposing.] I asked the question because I wanted to have some regard for the time.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will take pains to give the Government counsel ample notice, so that they will not be taken by any surprise.

The COURT. For this once we will adjourn at this early hour, and until Monday morning at 11 o'clock.

Thereupon (at 2 o'clock and 13 minutes p. m.) the further hearing of this case was adjourned until Monday morning, May 21, 1883, at 11 o'clock.

MONDAY, MAY 21, 1883.

The court met at 11 o'clock.

Present, counsel for the Government and for the defendants.

Mr. INGERSOLL. [Resuming.] If it please the court and gentlemen of the jury, on last Friday, in reply, I think, to a question of Mr. Kerr, I stated that I thought McBean swore that Mr. Moore did not make any arrangement with him to get up false petitions. In that I was mistaken. Mr. Moore swore that he made an arrangement with McBean to get up petitions. He did not quite swear that McBean agreed to get up false and fraudulent petitions. He just came to the edge of it and did not quite swear to it. Afterwards McBean was recalled by the Government and the Government did not ask McBean whether he had ever agreed to get up any petitions or whether he had ever made any such arrangement with Moore. They did not ask him and we did not ask him. I do not know why they did not ask him. They probably know.

I also stated that Moore swore that he got his instructions about these petitions from Dorsey. The evidence is that he got his instructions not from Dorsey but from Miner; that Miner so instructed him, and that thereupon he made the bargain to get up such petitions with a man by the name of Major on the Redding and Alturas route. I make this correction because I do not want you or any one else to think that I wish any misstatement made in our favor. We do not need it and consequently there is no need of making it. You will remember that after Moore swore that he made a bargain with Major to get up false petitions, Major swore that it was untrue. You will also remember that Judge Carpenter called for the petitions that were gotten up upon the routes that Moore had something to do with, and I think he showed you on one route eleven or twelve petitions. Mr. Major swears that every petition was honest, that the statements in each petition were true, and that the signatures were genuine. All those petitions were shown to you. So that the result of the Moore testimony is this: Moore swears that Miner told him to get up such petitions. He then swears that he made that bargain with Major. Major says it is not true. Moore almost swears that he made the same bargain with McBean. McBean says nothing on the subject. Then we bring here the petitions upon those very routes, and especially upon the Redding and Alturas route, and we find no such petitions as are described by Moore. That is enough in regard to Mr. Moore upon that one point.

There is one little piece of testimony to which I failed to call your attention on Friday, and to which I will call your attention now. Moore was the friend of Boone. Boone recommended him to Miner. It was through Boone that Moore was employed? Now, I ask you if it is not wonderful that Moore never told Boone that there was a conspiracy on foot? Is it not wonderful that Moore did not tell Boone, his friend, the man to whom he was indebted for the employment, "There is a conspiracy in this case. Senator Dorsey as good as told me so. I know all about it." The fact is he never said one word, and the reason we know it, is that Boone swears that when he went out on the 7th or 8th of August he never even suspected it. I cannot, it seems to me, make this point too plain. Boone had been known by Dorsey for a long time. They were very good friends. Dorsey had enough confidence in him to select him as the man to get the necessary information after he had been requested so to do in the letter. Boone was the man who attended to this business more than anybody else. Boone was interested with John W. Dorsey. Boone had every reason to find out exactly what was happening. He was at Dorsey's house, where Miner was. He talked with Miner day after day. He helped get up the bids. He did a great deal of mechanical work. He had the subcontracts printed. Yet during all that time Dorsey never let fall a chance expression that gave Boone even the dimmest dawn of a hint that there was a conspiracy. Nobody told Boone. Moore, his friend, never spoke of it.

Now, there is one other point with regard to Mr. Moore. Mr. Moore swears, on page 1371, that Miner offered him a fourth interest in these routes. That was the conversation in which he said Mr. Miner told him they were good affidavit men. According to Moore's testimony he then knew there was a conspiracy, and he understood that he was part and parcel of it. Let me ask you right here, is it probable that Moore would have been offered a quarter interest at that time if a conspiracy existed, and if they had their plans laid to make hundreds of thousands of dollars, and if the profits had depended upon the affidavits alone? I ask you, as sensible, reasonable men, if he would have been offered a quarter interest under those circumstances? Now comes in what I believe to be the falsehood. Mr. Moore says that the interest was offered to him by Miner, but Miner said it would have to be ratified by Stephen W. Dorsey. That is brought in for the purpose of having some evidence against Dorsey. You must recollect, gentlemen, that this evidence was all purchased. This evidence was all bargained for in the open shamble. You must recollect that there are upon the records of this court some seven or ten indictments against A. E. Boone. You must remember that Moore was Boone's friend. You must remember that Moore was a part of the consideration that Boone was giving to the Government for immunity.

Mr. MERRICK. Is there any proof of that?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I think there is. Mr. Moore swears as to the number of indictments against Boone. He was his friend. I ask you gentlemen now if it is not a fact that Mr. Moore refused to go upon the stand until a bargain was made for the immunity of Albert E. Boone?

Mr. MERRICK. I know nothing of any such bargain.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Very well.

Mr. MERRICK. If there is any proof of a contract by which Mr. Moore's testimony was to be given in consideration of Boone's immunity, I will ask the counsel to point it out to me that I may have the opportunity of commenting upon it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will say this: That according to the testimony of Moore there are some seven or ten—I think that was his expression—indictments against Boone. Moore was the friend of Boone. The jury have a right to infer what motive prompts a witness. Moore wished to swear enough, so that Mr. Boone would not be troubled. In my judgment, Mr. Boone, being under indictment, gave evidence in this case in order that the Government would take its clutch from his throat. He swore under pressure. That is the system, gentlemen, that is dangerous in any country. Whenever a Government advertises for witnesses; whenever a Government says to a guilty man, or to a man who is indicted, "All we ask of you is to help us convict somebody else;" whenever they advertise for a villain, they get him. That is the result of what they call the informer system—an infamous system. A court of justice, where justice is done between man and man, is the holiest place on earth. The informer system turns it into a den, into a cavern, into a dungeon, where crawl the slimy monsters of perjury and treachery. That is the informer system. It makes a court a den of wild beasts. What else does it do? Under its brood and hatch come spies; spies to watch witnesses, spies to watch counsel, spies to follow jurymen, so that a juror cannot leave his house without the shadow of the spy falling upon his door-step. That is not the proper attitude of a Government. The business of a Government is to protect its citizens, not to spread nets. The business of a Government is to throw its shield of power in front of the rights of every citizen. I hold in utter, infinite, and absolute contempt any Government that calls for informers and spies. Every trial should be in the free air. All the work should be done openly. These sinister motions in the dark, the crawling of these abnormal and slimy things, I abhor.

Now, to come back to this witness, Moore. Upon my word I think he was trying to help his friend. After Mr. Miner had offered him a quarter interest, then he came back to Washington. He arrived here according to his evidence about the 11th day of July, I think. He went immediately to see Stephen W. Dorsey. Recollect that. That was the time Dorsey settled with him without looking at his books. After he settled with him and gave him $250 he asked him to telegraph to see if the service had been put on The Dalles and Baker City route. He waited here until he received an answer, and after that he talked with Dorsey not only about that matter, but in that conversation Dorsey said, according to Moore, that it took a good deal of money to keep up their influence in the department. When I asked him when that conversation was, he said two or three days after the first conversation. According to the evidence in this case Stephen W. Dorsey left this city on the 12th of July. This man Moore arrived on the 11th, and he says two or three days after his arrival Dorsey said it took money to keep up their influence here. When he swears that Dorsey told him that, Dorsey was in the city of Oberlin, Ohio. Recollect these things. Whoever tells stories of this character should have a most excellent memory.

Now, there is another thing. When did Miner get back? He got back by the 24th of July, because on the 24th of July he settled with Moore, and I believe then Moore went West again. Now, remember there was a contract made as, Moore swears. He has not got it. Nobody sees it. He says there was a contract made by which he had a fourth interest in something. He got back here I believe some time in November, and on the 20th of November he and Miner settled. I will now look on page 1430 for that settlement. I want you to see how everything was situated at that time. [To the stenographer.] I want to say right here, Mr. Reporter, that in looking over the report of my remarks on Friday, I find several things that I did not say. I find one word at least that I did not use, "reasonability." It was either reasonableness or probability; because there was no "reasonability" in my argument nor is there such a word as "reasonability." [To the jury.] Now, gentlemen, I do not blame the reporter. It is not only hard to remember what is said, but it is hard to put it down. Mistakes are made even in these reports when the gentleman who makes them does his level best to have them correct. If mistakes are made of that character, I ask you how much reliance you can place upon the testimony of a gentleman who details a conversation that happened five years ago, a conversation about a subject in which that gentleman at that time had no interest. I find on page 1430 that Mr. Miner settled for everybody with Mr. A. W. Moore. Remember the situation. Moore knew there was a conspiracy. All the service was on. You see, this was November 20, 1880. Vaile was in. They had got a man who was close to Brady. Everything was running in magnificent style. Mr. Moore understood that there was a conspiracy. What more did he understand? That he had the claw of his avarice in the flesh of a United States Senator and in the flesh of a Second Assistant Postmaster-General. Hundreds of thousands of dollars were to be made. He came back here and settled up and sold out his interest for how much? Six hundred and eighty-two dollars. Do you believe that? Credulity would not believe it. Nobody believes it, that is, if the rest of the story is true. Why did he settle with him for so little? He said Mr. Miner told him he hadn't a dollar. He did not reply to him, "When this conspiracy is completed you will have plenty. I can wait." No. Miner said he hadn't anything and so Moore settled for $682. Then I asked him, "You had a contract with Dorsey, did you?" "Yes; verbally." "Did you ever say anything to Dorsey about it?" "No." "Did you ever claim anything from Dorsey?" "No." "Did you ever write to him?" "No." "Did you ever say anything to anybody that you had any claim against Dorsey?" "No." You saw Mr. Moore, gentlemen, here upon the stand. Do you think he is the kind of man who would let such a chance slip? It is for you to judge. In my judgment that is the eternal end of Moore's testimony. We can call him buried. We can put the sod over his grave. We can raise a stone to the memory of A. W. Moore. Let him rest in peace, or to use the initials only, let him R. I. P. That is the end of him. If the Government wishes to dig up the corpse hereafter let them dig.

Mr. KER. I would like——

Mr. INGERSOLL. [Interposing.] I don't want to hear from you.

Mr. KER. I am not talking to you.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I don't want to be interrupted.

The COURT. You do not know what he is going to say.

Mr. INGERSOLL. He may be intending to make a motion that the jury be instructed to find a verdict of not guilty.

Mr. KER. I have a question to ask which I want answered properly.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will answer you properly.

Mr. KER. When I address you. If your honor please, I would like to have the page to which the counsel referred when he said that Moore met Dorsey subsequent to the 11th of July. I simply want to get the page upon which Moore made that statement.

The COURT. He says Dorsey left town.

Mr. KER. As Mr. Merrick will have to answer, he simply wants to know the page.

Mr. INGERSOLL. If Mr. Merrick wants to know the page he shall have the page, or anybody that wishes to answer. If counsel had simply asked me for the page, without getting up in such a solemn manner, I would have told him.

Mr. KER. The easiest way is the best.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is right.

Mr. KER. I propose to be treated properly. I do not want to be treated in that way, and do not propose to stand it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. You need not stand it. If there is anything you want to do, do it. There will be no trouble about not standing it.

Mr. KER. We might as well have it out first as last.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Oh, yes; I think better.

On page 1406, Mr. Moore says that he went to Dorsey and got the money, and that then Dorsey requested him to telegraph to The Dalles, and that he did not see Dorsey after he got the answer to his dispatch, I think, for two or three days. He reached Washington, he says, about the 11th. On page 1372, he speaks of telegraphing to The Dalles by instructions from Dorsey.

Now I wish to say one word, if the court please, on the subject of withholding documents. Mr. Bliss admits that they would have had the right to go only to a particular page and point as to which they had asked the production of the books. That was in reply to the reason given by us why we did not wish to produce the books and papers.

As showing, or endeavoring to show, that the reason was not a good one, Mr. Bliss says that they would have had the right to go only to the particular point as to which they asked the production of the books. They asked for the letter-books, and I understood your honor to rule that the letter-books themselves were secondary evidence, and that under a notice to produce letter-books, letter-books need not be produced, because they in themselves were only secondary evidence; that the notice should be to produce primary evidence, and not secondary. Their notice was too general, I believe your honor decided; not specific enough.

As to the presumption arising from that, I make the point, may it please your honor, that there is such a thing as a presumption of law, and also a presumption of fact, and that all presumptions of fact are to be decided by the jury; that while the court may decide presumptions of law, the jury must decide presumptions of fact. So that if we did refuse to produce a check or a book it is for the jury to say what that presumption is, if there is any presumption. I insist that there is no presumption; that the only consequence that follows is that they may prove the contents of the book or paper by secondary evidence; and upon that subject I will read from a little monograph, published by Seymour D. Thompson, called Charging the Jury. I read from page 64:

A presumption of fact differs from a presumption of law in this: A presumption of law is a conclusive or indisputable inference which the law, by a settled rule, draws from a given fact. Such an inference is therefore made by the judge, and not by the jury. But a presumption of fact is simply an inference or conclusion of the existence of a fact from some other fact. It is always drawn by the jury, who are the triers of questions of fact. It is, therefore, merely a repetition of what has already been said to say that it is for the jury, and not for the judge, to draw presumptions of fact; and that for the judge to tell the jury what presumptions of fact they ought to draw from a given fact or series of facts is a usurpation of their functions. Thus, in an action for assault and battery it was proved that the defendant came to the house of the plaintiff, with whom he had been on friendly terms, and said to him, "How dare you send a letter to my house?" and immediately assaulted him. The court charged the jury that there was no evidence that the letter was offensive or insulting, and that they could not infer that it was so. This was held error. It was for the jury, and not for the judge, to draw inferences or presumptions of fact from the evidence.

This writer refers to the following cases: Bond vs. Warren, 8 Jones, 191; Easterling vs. State, 30 Ala., 46; Williams vs. Cannon, 9 Ala., 348; Knight vs. Vardeman, 25 Ala., 262; White vs. Hass, 32 Ala., 430;

I do not know whether your honor will take the ground that if we have been notified to produce, say, a check, and have failed to produce it, we cannot after that time produce it.

The COURT. There is no such fact as that in the case, is there?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I did not know but what that would be applied to the check upon which the money is said to have been drawn.

The COURT. You produced no check in contradiction of the evidence of the witness.

Mr. INGERSOLL. It may be said to be in contradiction. The witness, in his statement to MacVeagh and James, called it $7,000. We were notified to produce, as I understood it, these checks. We refused to do it, until after the testimony of the witness was closed. Then we did produce a check for $7,500, together with other checks.

The COURT. That evidence is in without objection, and it is in at the instance of the other side, and why should a question be made about it now? You produced it and the other side did not object to it. The evidence is before the jury for what it is worth.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Do I understand the court still to hold that if a notice is given to us to produce a paper, and we refuse, and they go on and prove the contents of the paper, we are not afterwards allowed to introduce the paper?

The COURT. You have not made any such offer as that.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I simply want to show that the position we took on that subject is upheld by authority.

Now, gentlemen, I am going to call your attention for a little while to another witness, Mr. Rerdell. And in the commencement, I need not refresh your minds with regard to the part he has played. I need not, in the first instance, tell you about his affidavit of June, 1881, nor his affidavit of July 13, 1882, nor his pencil memorandum, nor his Chico letter, nor his offer to pack the jury on behalf of the Government, nor the signals he had agreed upon, nor the reports he made from day to day, nor the affidavit of September that he made for the Government, nor of November nor of February. All these things you remember and remember perfectly. I will speak of them as I reach them, but I want you to keep in your minds who he is.

I need not call any names. Epithets would glance from his reputation like bird-shot from the turret of a monitor. The worst thing I can say about him is to call him Mr. Rerdell. All epithets become meaningless in comparison. The worst thing I can say after that would have the taint of flattery in it. You will remember that when Enobarbus was speaking to Agrippa about Cæsar, he says, "Would you praise Cæsar, say Cæsar. Go no further." And I can say, "If you wish to abuse this witness, say Mr. Rerdell. Go no further." That is as far as I shall go.

You will remember that Mr. Rerdell was in the employ of Stephen W. Dorsey, and had been for several years. He does not pretend that he was ever badly used; he does not say before you that Mr. Dorsey ever did to him an unkind act, ever said an unkind word. In all the record of the years that he was with him he finds no page blotted with an unjust act, not one. He has no complaint to make. Under those circumstances he voluntarily goes to see a man by the name of Clayton, I think an ex-Senator from Arkansas, known by him at that time to be an enemy of Stephen W. Dorsey, an enemy of his employer, an enemy of his friend—his friend, whose bread this witness had eaten for years, whose roof had protected him, who had trusted and treated him like a human being. Yet he goes to this man Clayton, and he says, in substance, "I want to sell out my friend to the Government." He was not actuated exactly by patriotism, although he says he was. The promptings of virtue may have started him, but after he got started he said to himself, "I do not see that it hurts virtue to be rewarded." So he said, "I want some pay for this; I want a steamboat route reinstated; I want the Jennings claim allowed. Of course I am disinterested in what I am doing, but I might as well have something, if it is going." "What else do you want?" The disinterested patriot suggested that he would like to have a clerkship for his father-in-law. "Anything else?" If you will read his letter of July 5, 1882, which I will read to you before I get through, you will see that he says, "If I had remained with the Government I have every reason to believe I would have had a good position by this time." So he must have demanded a clerkship for himself—good, honest man. At that time he did not know, but swore it afterwards and swore it here upon the stand, that Dorsey had never done anything wrong; and yet he was willing to sell him to the Government, believing that he had never done anything wrong. So he went and saw the Postmaster-General. The Postmaster-General did not appear to take any great interest in the matter. He turned him over to the Attorney-General. He showed the Postmaster-General what he had, and read him, I believe, or showed him some memoranda. Then he went and he saw the Attorney-General. The Postmaster-General did not seem to give him encouragement. Then when he went to see MacVeagh he took with him a letter-book—I do not know but more than one—but we will say a letter-book. Now, what was in that letter-book? And, gentlemen, the only way to find whether a man tells the truth is to take all the circumstances into consideration. What did he want to do? What was his object? And what were the means at his command? For instance, it is said that a man left his house with the intention of murdering another, and that he had on his table a loaded revolver, and also had on his table a small walking-stick, and he took with him the walking-stick. You would say he did not intend to commit the murder; that if he had so intended he would have taken the deadly weapon. In other words, you must believe that men, acting for the accomplishment of a certain object, use the natural means within their power.

Now, what did he have in that letter-book? He swears now that in that letter-book there was a copy of a letter from Stephen W. Dorsey to James W. Bosler; that the original letter was written by Stephen W. Dorsey. That press-copy, of course, would show that the original letter was in the handwriting of S. W. Dorsey. What does he swear was in that letter? He swears that Dorsey made a proposition to Bosler to go into the business; told him the profits, and told him that he had to give $33\frac{1}{3}$ per cent. to T. J. B.; that he had already paid him, I think, \$20,000, and had more to pay him. According to the testimony of Mr. Rerdell, that was in the letter-book that he took to Mr. MacVeagh. Now, recollect that. Why did he not show it? He had forgotten it. He showed him what he had. Recollect now, that he had a tabular statement. I think the letter showed so much money to T. J. B., and the tabular statement $33\frac{1}{3}$ per cent. to T. J. B. He had that tabular statement, and that was in Dorsey's handwriting. He says he had it. Well, after that, the Attorney-General must have told him, "That is not enough; I want some more." "Well," he says, "I can let you have some more." "What more can you let us have?" Well, then he told him about the red books; I do not know that he said they were red, but he told him about the books, and that those books were in New York, and he would go over there and get them; that he was going to steal them; he says he went over to get them, and afterwards admitted, I believe, that he was stealing them.

Now, we must remember the position that Rerdell was in. He had been to Clayton, to the Postmaster-General in company with Mr. Woodward, and to the Attorney-General in company with Mr. Woodward, and yet there was not enough. Well, it was all he had. What more could he do? He suddenly found himself caught in his own trap. He had furnished enough to trouble him, but not enough to convict Dorsey, and not enough to be promised immunity. Now, what had he to do? He did exactly as he did with Mr. Woodward in September, when he made that affidavit, and when Woodward said it was not enough; he said, "Very well, I will make another," the same as he did when he made the affidavit of seventy pages in November and found it was a little weak. He made another, and he would have made them right along. He had a factory running night and day. Now, he tells you that while he was talking with MacVeagh, just towards the last of the conversation, the idea flashed into his brain that he might save Dorsey too. Don't you remember that testimony? And as quick as he thought of that, he agreed to go to New York and steal the books. The very last thing that MacVeagh said to him, according to MacVeagh's testimony, and I believe according to his own, was to be sure and get the books; that they were all-important. So he went, as he claims. Now, did it occur to him that he would save Dorsey in that way? Did he think of saving Dorsey by going and getting these books? That was the last thing, and he was going to get the books to be used as evidence against Dorsey.

In a few days he says he started for New York, and the question arises, why did Rerdell go to New York at all? Why did he want to see that the books were in New York? Why did he pretend that he had any more evidence unless he had it? You see you have got to get at the philosophy of this man; you have got to find what actuated him; and although in many respects he is abnormal, unnatural, monstrous, and morally deformed, still it may be that we can find the philosophy upon which he acted. Why did he say he was going to New York? Because the Attorney-General told him—he must have told him—that the evidence he then had was not sufficient. Rerdell could not break down right there and say, "That is all I have got." That would give up the fight; that would tell him that he had endeavored to sell out his friend and nobody would buy the evidence; that would tell him that he had tried this and had failed; that he had simply succeeded in showing his own treachery without involving his friend. He could not stop there. You must recollect the evidence he had, and the evidence he wanted.

Let us see what he had. Mr. Bliss says "Why did he say the books were in New York? Why did he not say they were in Washington?" That would not have given him time, gentlemen. He would have been told, "Go and get them." Then he could not have produced them. Consequently he put them in the possession of somebody else, so that if he failed to get them, then he could say that the other man destroyed them or had hid them; he could have said, "I have done my best; they exist; but they have been destroyed, or they have been hidden, or they have been put out of the way." He wanted time, and knowing that no such books existed, he could not say "I have them in Washington," because then he could give no excuse for their non-production. He must state it in such a way that he could reasonably fail; that is to say, that he could give a reason for his failure. He could not say "I have them in my house," because he would have been told to go and get them. So he put them in the possession of another man, so that, failing to get them, as fail he must, he could give a reasonable excuse for the failure.

Why did he go to New York? I will tell you what my philosophy is: He found that the Government did not wish to purchase the evidence that he had. He found that, in the judgment of the expert of the Department of Justice, it was not sufficient. The next thing was to retrace his steps. He did not want to jump off of one boat into the sea and find no other boat to rescue him. He said: "I have been too hasty; I will go to New York." Why? To find out whether Dorsey had heard of this or not. That is what he went there for. The inferior man always imagines that the superior knows what he is doing, and knows what he has done. He found that he was about to fail with the Government, and then the important question to him was: Has Dorsey found this out? Can I go back to Dorsey? Or must I go on and be cast away by him and be refused by the Government?

Now let me call another thing to your minds. I will come to it again, but it forces itself upon me at this place, and it seems to me it ought to be absolutely conclusive. He swears that on the day after he went to MacVeagh with that letter-book, in looking it over he found the press-copy of the original letter that Dorsey wrote to Bosler on the 13th of July, 1879. He says that the next day he found that copy in that copy-book. Why did he not steal the book? Conscientious scruples, gentlemen! You see he was going to New York to steal another. Why not steal one that he already had possession of? And how much better that book would have been than the other that he was going to get. This was a copy of a letter in Dorsey's handwriting, in which he admitted that he had paid $20,000 to T. J. B., and was going to pay him some more, while that book in New York was not in Dorsey's handwriting—admitting, for the sake of the argument, that there was a book—but was in the handwriting of Donnelly or Rerdell. See? And right there he had the evidence, absolutely conclusive, in the handwriting of S. W. Dorsey himself, and he did not even keep it, he did not even steal it, but he gave it back and went to New York to steal a book that Dorsey did not write. He threw away primary evidence to get secondary evidence. He threw away that which would have convicted Dorsey beyond a doubt, which would have made him a welcome recruit to the Government. He threw that away and went to New York to get another, a line of which Dorsey never wrote; and then he would have to establish, after he got that book, that "William Smith" stood for Thomas J. Brady; he would have to prove after they got that book that "John Smith" or "Samuel Jones" stood for Turner. Now, gentlemen, do you believe that that man, with his ideas of honor, with the kind of a conscience he has in his bosom, with the copy of a letter in Dorsey's handwriting in his possession admitting that Dorsey gave $20,000 to T. J. B., would give that up and then go to the city of New York to steal a book not in Dorsey's handwriting and that did not prove that Dorsey had ever paid a cent to Thomas J. Brady, in which there was one charge to "William Smith," and that would have to be eked out by the testimony of Rerdell himself, when he had right there in his own grasp and clutch the press-copy of the original letter written by Dorsey himself? Do you believe it? There is not a man on that jury believes it; there is not a lawyer prosecuting this case who believes it.

What else did he have? He had a letter that he himself, as he claims, wrote to Bosler on the 22d of May, 1880, after he, Rerdell, had been summoned to appear before a committee of Congress. He had, he says, those three sheets.

What else did he have the morning after he was talking with Mac-Veagh? He had the tabular statement in the handwriting of Stephen W. Dorsey, and over the Brady column, "T. J. B., 33½ per cent."

What more did that man have? He had the balance-sheets made out, as he swears, by Donnelly, of those books. Were the balance-sheets just as good as the books?

Now, just think what he had, according to his own testimony: A copy of the original letter, written by Dorsey to Bosler, in which he admitted his guilt; a copy of the tabular statement, written by Dorsey, in which he put down 33½ per cent. to T. J. B. What more? Copy of the letter that he had written to Bosler on the 22d of May, 1880. He had all that, and he must have had this memorandum, though I will show you that he had not, and I think I will show you when he made it. And yet he was going to New York to get some more evidence. He was going to steal another book in New York that would simply create a suspicion, while he gave up a book that was absolute certainty. That is the theory. But they say, "Oh, he did not do that quite." What did he do? He went and had that copied. He swears that he had copied that letter of May 13, 1879, that Dorsey wrote to Bosler, in which he admitted that he gave $20,000 to Brady. Now, a copy would not show in whose handwriting the press-copy was, would it? That is a very important point. Who copied it? I think he said Miss Nettie L. White copied it. We never hear of Miss Nettie L. White again, though. These gentlemen admit that you are not to believe Mr. Rerdell on any point that is not corroborated, and when he swears that Miss Nettie L. White copied the letter you are not bound to believe there was such a letter unless they bring Miss White or account for her absence. They did not bring her. That is an extremely important point in their case, infinitely more important than whether the red books ever existed. Did Dorsey write a letter to Bosler in which he admitted his guilt? This man says that he had complete and perfect evidence of it in his own hand; that he gave that up; that he had that copied by Miss White. And they did not bring Miss White. Certainly he had no scruples about tearing it out. He says he tore out his letter to Bosler of the 22d of May, 1880. He had no scruples about that. He did not refuse to keep the book because it touched his honor, because in a day or two he was going to steal another not half as good as that one, not one-tenth part as good. Just think. He gave up evidence that was absolute and complete, and went to steal evidence that was secondary and of the poorest character. You do not believe it. He would have kept that book if he had kept any. If he was going to steal any evidence, and had the best, he would have kept it. The trouble was that there was no such letter in that book. There was his letter of May 22, 1880; no doubt about that; and that man tore it out, and then he made up one in his own mind, and had it of that date; that is all.

So he went to New York, and he swears that he went right up to the Albemarle Hotel; that it was early in the morning; that Dorsey was not then up; and that he had a conversation with Dorsey, in which Dorsey charged him with having had something to do with the Government, with having gone over to the Government. Dorsey had heard that there was something going on about that time, and I suppose he asked Mr. Rerdell about it. Rerdell denied it; said there was no truth in it; that nothing of the kind, character, or sort had ever happened.

Now let us just see whether I can demonstrate to you that Rerdell, in the conversation he had with Dorsey at the Albemarle Hotel, denied that he had gone over to the Government, or that he had done anything that was not perfectly honest, straightforward, and upright. I refer to it now, although I may come to it again.

And, gentlemen, I am sorry for you; I pity every one of you, that you have to hear all that has to be said in this case. But you must put yourselves, for the moment, in our places. You must remember that these defendants have borne this agony, have been roofed and surrounded with disorder for two years. You must remember that the agents of the Government have pursued them, they have watched over them and spied them night and day. You must remember that they have been slandered for years in the public press, although the tone of the public press is now changing, and changing in such a marked degree that one of the attorneys here for the prosecution claimed that we had bought up the correspondents. When you take into consideration what my clients have suffered, the position they are now in, fighting this great and powerful Government, I know you will excuse us for inflicting upon you every thought and every argument that we think may be for our defense. I am doing for my clients what I would do for you, or any of you, if you were defendants, and I am doing for them what I would want them to do for me were I a defendant and they my counsel.

Now I am going to demonstrate this. When Mr. Rerdell got to Jersey City he telegraphed back, according to the evidence of Mr. Dorsey:

Up to this moment I have been faithful to every trust.

I believe Rerdell swears that he did not send that. He had a memorandum-book which he took out of his pocket. I think a leaf was torn from it, and he ran his pencil through this line on the page on which he had taken a copy of this dispatch, "Up to this moment I have been faithful to every trust," and says he did not send it. Why did he put his pencil through that? Because that line would not agree with the testimony he had given upon the stand. "Up to this moment I have been faithful to every trust" was in that dispatch. I believe that little leaf from his memorandum-book was filed among the papers, and I would like to see it. [The paper was handed to Mr. Ingersoll by the clerk.] I want to ask you if you believe that Rerdell could have sent that dispatch to a man to whom he had admitted that very morning that he had gone over to the Government? Do you believe it? How perfectly natural it would have been for him to send a dispatch from Jersey City that harmonized and accorded with his denial of that morning.

Up to this moment I have been faithful to every trust.

Just look at that [handing the paper to the foreman of the jury]. Just read it. I want the jury to look at it. He rubbed it out of his memorandum-book. When? At the time? No, sir; when he found that he wanted something to harmonize with his evidence here. Even he had not the brazen effrontery to swear that he had told Dorsey that very morning that he (Rerdell) had gone over to the Government, and then that very afternoon to telegraph him—

Up to this moment I have been faithful to every trust.

Why, in comparison with that cheek brass is a liquid.

Up to this moment I have been faithful to every trust.

What is the next sentence?

The affidavit story is a lie.

Why did he leave that in? Because technically that was true. He had not then made an affidavit, and there is nothing so pleases a man who has made up his mind to tell a lie as to have mixed with the mortar of that lie one hair of truth. It is delightful to smell the perfume of a fact in the hell-broth of his perjury. Just look at that. These two things show that he had not admitted to Dorsey that he had told the Government anything against Dorsey. He wanted Dorsey to understand that he, Rerdell, had not communicated with the Government. Now, if you admit his evidence to be true, at the time he sent that dispatch he had the stolen book under his arm, and you, gentlemen of the jury, are asked to believe a man who would do that thing. I would not. I would not convict the meanest, lowest wretch that ever crawled between heaven and earth upon such testimony. Never. Neither can you do it. A verdict must rest upon a fact. The fact must rest upon the testimony of a witness. That witness must be, or seem to be, an honest man. And unless a verdict is based upon the bed-rock of honesty, it is infinitely rotten, and the jury that will give a verdict not based upon honesty is corrupt.

Mr. CRANE (foreman of the jury). I notice that this dispatch seems to have been written with different pencils at different times.

Mr. INGERSOLL—

Up to this moment I have been faithful to every trust—

Is written very dimly.

The affidavit story is a lie, but confidence between us is gone—

Is in still a different hand.

I resign my position and will turn everything over to any one you designate—

Is still another hand. Three hands, three pencils, in the one memorandum. Just look at that, Mr. Greene [handing the paper to Mr. Greene, a juror]. These papers have been manufactured, and when the Government said "This is not enough," another paragraph has been added.

How hard it is to perpetrate a piece of rascality and do it well. There are an infinite number of things in this universe, and everything that is in it is related to everything else; and when you get a falsehood in it that does not belong to the family, it has not the family likeness; and when anybody sees it who is acquainted with the family, he says "That is an adopted young one." [Laughter.]

Mr. Rerdell now says, I believe, that he did not send that line, "Up to this moment," &c. Dorsey swears that he did. Rerdell then produces this book and this paper which I have shown to you.

Now, let us follow Mr. Rerdell from the Albemarle Hotel. He tells us where he went, I believe to get his breakfast.

The COURT. He got his breakfast before he went to Dorsey's.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I think he got a lunch afterwards.

The COURT. No.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Here, gentlemen, is another illustration of what I said before. Now, my memory was this: That after he was at Dorsey's he went and got a lunch; that he got breakfast, perhaps, before; that after he was there he got lunch, and then went down-town. Anyway he got down to Mr. Dorsey's office about 12 o'clock; that is his testimony; no doubt about that.

The COURT. From 11 to 12.

Mr. INGERSOLL. There is another instance in point; the court may be right, but my memory is 12 o'clock. I think the court got the 11 o'clock from what Mr. Bliss stated when he was going to try to prove that his own witness had sworn falsely by saying that he went there may be nearer 11 than 10. But I may be mistaken about that.

The COURT. You may be right about it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do not say that I am, but I simply want to call the attention of the jury to it in order that they may see how hard it is to remember; and, then, I want them, by this standard, to measure those gentlemen who come from the vast plains of the West, the womb of the cyclone, and weigh their testimony and fix its value.

Now, here it is, and the court is nearer right than I am. I read from page 2443:

Then I went and got my breakfast.

That is after the talk with Dorsey. Your honor is right:

Q. What time was it when you left Dorsey?—A. I think about 10 o'clock.

Q. And then you went and got your breakfast?—A. Then I went and got my breakfast.

Q. How long did it take you to get your breakfast?—A. Oh, it took half or three-quarters of an hour.

Q. That would make it about 11 o'clock?—A. About 11 o'clock.

Q. And then it took you three hours to go down to Torrey's office?

The WITNESS. From 11 to 12?

Now, the court is right:

Mr. INGERSOLL. Was it 12?

The WITNESS. I said about 12 o'clock.

Q. Did you go to any other office or any other place after breakfast before you got to Dorsey's office?—A. I don't remember whether I did or not. I may have had some other business to transact and attended to it, but I don't remember what it was.

Q. Do you remember any other business?—A. I said I did not remember.

Q. Do you remember seeing any other person with whom you talked after you got your breakfast and before you got to Dorsey's office?—A. No, I do not; that is, nobody that I knew.

Now, I will go a little further:

Q. After you got the book and walked up and down with it under your arm for about an hour, where did you then go?—A. Then I went to Jersey City.

Q. Did you see anybody with whom you talked about this mail business or anything connected with it after you left Torrey's office?—A. I did not.

They tried to prove to you that he went to Torrey's office immediately after he got off the ferry-boat on the New York side, when he went from Jersey City.

Mr. MERRICK. No.

The COURT. The court refused to admit that evidence.

Mr. INGERSOLL. They offered to prove it.

Mr. MERRICK. No.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Well, we will see; I will come to that in a moment.

Mr. MERRICK. Mr. Ingersoll will probably recollect that he stated that he was under the impression that he went from the ferry-boat to Mr. Torrey's office, and the Government replied that its purpose was to prove that he went to Torrey's office along about 9 o'clock; between 9 and 10.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will come to that in a little while. I understood the Government to offer to prove that he went to Torrey's office before he went to Dorsey's.

The COURT. That evidence was excluded.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I understand that; but have I not the right to say they offered to prove it? Is not that part of the record?

The COURT. No; that was a matter for the court and not for the jury.

Mr. INGERSOLL. But did they not offer to prove it?

The COURT. They did.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Very well; then I think I have the right. If I have not, I do not want to say a word about it.

The COURT. It is not evidence in the case, because it was not admitted.

Mr. MERRICK. If counsel comment upon it the right will follow to me to do so also.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do not know whether he ever went there or not; but it seems to me, if the court please, that I have the right to say that the prosecution proposed to prove a certain thing by a certain witness.

Mr. MERRICK. I have no objection to giving you the privilege of commenting upon the offer, if I have it.

The COURT. It opens the door to retaliation, and I think it ought not to be done.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I have no objection to Mr. Merrick's answering every word that I say, and I hope he will not understand that I have.

Mr. MERRICK. I do not understand that you have.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I am endeavoring to give the best reasons I can in favor of my clients and against the testimony introduced by the prosecution.

Mr. MERRICK. I hope the counsel will understand that my object was simply to correct the impression created by him. I would like to have full comment upon the subject.

The COURT. Before we leave this point I want to refer to the testimony of Rerdell on page 2281:

Q. Where did you go when you reached New York on Monday morning?—A. After getting my breakfast I went to the room of Stephen W. Dorsey, in the Albemarle Hotel.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes.

The COURT. That is my recollection.

Mr. CARPENTER. It is both ways.

Mr. INGERSOLL. He was hungrier than he thought when he first started. On cross-examination he remembered the appetite that he had forgotten on his direct examination. I am much obliged to the court for pointing out that contradiction. It is one that had escaped me.

The COURT. Further down on the same page:

Q. What did you take with you when you left his room?—A. I did not take anything.

Q. Where did you go when you left his room?—A. I went down to his office and took this book.

Q. What book?—A. The original journal. After getting a lunch I left for Jersey City.

He got his lunch after he got the book, then.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes, in that case. That I have got. He afterwards swears that he did not.

The COURT. I do not know about that.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will show that he crosses himself on almost every fact that he endeavors to swear to. Just take this case. He swears that he went to Dorsey's; that from Dorsey's he went immediately to Torrey's office; that he then went and got lunch and then went to Jersey City. He also swears that he got his breakfast before he went to Dorsey's. In the next examination he swears that he got his breakfast after he went to Dorsey's, and after he got the book he went to Jersey City, first walking up and down Broadway for about an hour. He had forgotten about the lunch. There is nothing in it but a mass of contradiction. He swears that he went down to Torrey's office. Why did he not make it earlier, as soon as he got off the boat? Because he did not have any key to the office. It would not do to swear that he broke into the office and that nobody ever heard of it, and so he had to put the time after the office would naturally be open. Well, now we have got him as far as the office. He swears that he went in there and saw Mr. Torrey. As he went into the door Torrey's desk was right there [illustrating]. He had a very pleasant chat with Mr. Torrey. Right over there [illustrating] was Mr. Mullins's desk, and right there [illustrating] was the door leading into the next room. After chatting a little with Torrey, and telling him the object of his visit, Torrey took him into the next room and took these books from a shelf or desk, or something of that kind, and handed them both to him, and he looked them over at his leisure, while Mr. Torrey went back to his business. He finally took the journal and left the ledger. Why did he leave the ledger? I will tell you after a while. Every lie, as well as every truth, has its philosophy. He took the journal and came along out with it under his arm, not wrapped up, not concealed. Then he had another chat with Torrey about the weather or something, and then he went on. Why did he swear that he had a conversation with Torrey in that office? I will tell you. When he was giving that testimony Torrey was in mid-ocean, between New York and Liverpool. I guess Mr. Rerdell had heard that the man was away. He thought he would be absolutely and perfectly safe, and so he said he had a conversation with Torrey. The moment he repeated that conversation with Torrey I said, "Where is Torrey?" We telegraphed to New York and we found that Torrey had left for the old country. We sent a cablegram to Queenstown and we intercepted him. I think he staid a day in the old country, and took the next ship and came back, arriving here in time to swear that Rerdell never visited that office, that he never had that conversation with him, and that he never got that book from that office; more than that, that that book never was in that office. Who are you going to believe, Torrey or Rerdell?

Another man was there on that very day, Mr. Mullins. He never had any recollection of seeing Rerdell until he saw him here. All the books were kept in the safe except the books that Torrey had in his desk. No such books were in the safe and no such books were in Torrey's desk. Gentlemen, no such books existed, and I will demonstrate it to you before I get through. No doubt the man had some little expense-books of his own. He has widened them, he has lengthened them, he has thickened them, he has colored them. He has refreshed other people. When the Government tells a man, "You have got an office, haven't you?" "Yes." "Well, we want you to remember this." Then he is refreshed on the subject. The words the Government speaks are rain and dew and sunlight upon the dry grass of his memory and it springs up green. He says he has been-refreshed. Before I get through I will show you that these things were proved only by gentlemen who had been refreshed.

Now, why did Rerdell say he took the journal and left the ledger? I will tell you. There is more in the shirt theory than you would think. He had a shirt in a paper, folded up just once over the bosom. Unexpectedly he met Mr. James on the train. He was very much surprised to meet him, because James swears he was very much surprised to meet Rerdell. James knew that he had gone over to New York to get those books, and he asked him, "Did you get the books?" Rerdell had that beggarly little package. He could not call that "books," because it was not large enough, and so he had to say he had a book. That was the reason he said journal and not ledger. He had too small a package for "books," and consequently he told James he had the "book," and he is sticking to it; only one book. Another reason: He said to James, and it was very smart of him, "I don't want to show you what I have got in this package, because there is a fellow looking," and so the shirt, in conscious innocence, reposed unseen. Who was the fellow who was looking? Chase Andrews. You recollect him. He came into the depot at Jersey City at the time Rerdell was writing this virtuous dispatch, this certificate of his honor and of his faithfulness. He shook hands with Rerdell. Rerdell said he had a carpet-sack, but it was not big enough to get one of these books in. He wanted the jury to think it was a pretty big book. He hated to lose a chance of adding to the size of the book, and so he swore that it was too big to put in the carpet-sack. If he had only had sense enough to put it in the carpet-sack, and let it alone, we never could have proven anything about it by Chase Andrews. Andrews would not have sworn that he looked through the carpet-sack. But Rerdell in his anxiety to have that book a big book said he could not get it into the carpet sack, and consequently must have held it in his hand. Chase Andrews saw him in the depot at Jersey City, and rode in the next seat in the Pullman car from Jersey City to Washington, and Rerdell had no book. Who will you believe, Chase Andrews or Mr. Rerdell?

Now, gentlemen, one other point. This is a wonderful case for points. When he sent that dispatch from Jersey City to Dorsey, if Rerdell's evidence is true, Rerdell knew Dorsey would know it was a lie the moment he got it. If Rerdell had told him in the morning of what he had done, and then telegraphed from Jersey City that he had been faithful up to that moment, he sent a dispatch to Dorsey that Dorsey must have known was false the moment he received it. That was not a very smart piece of business.

There is one other thing to which I wish to call your attention, and I will ask the court first whether I have the right to do it. Mr. Bliss proposed to prove a certain thing by Mr. Newcomb, who was a post-office clerk or perhaps a detective in New York. The court will remember him. Have I a right to call attention to anything that Mr. Bliss left out of his proposition?

The COURT. I understand the case to be this: An offer was made by counsel to prove certain facts by a witness, and the offer was refused by the court.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes.

The COURT. I do not think the offer itself or anything contained in the offer is a subject of comment to the jury, and for this reason: You may comment upon the offer and find fault with the offer, and yet if the witness had been examined and cross-examined, his testimony might possibly have explained the very point you make against the offer.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I am not making a point against the offer. I want to call attention to what they did not offer to prove by that man.

The COURT. You have a right to comment upon the failure of the Government to prove any fact.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Very well.

The COURT. But not upon an offer that was made and refused.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The point I want to call attention to is that the Government failed by any witness to prove that Rerdell brought anything away from that office that morning either at 10 or 11 or 12 o'clock. In addition to that, I think I have the right to show that the prosecution did not offer to prove by anybody that he got a book or a package or anything that morning.

Mr. MERRICK. I suppose I shall have the right to reply to that, covering the same broad latitude.

The COURT. Either side have the right to comment upon the omission of the other to prove facts.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I want to call your attention to the fact of their omission, then. Let me read their offer, from page 4376:

We expect to prove that this witness followed Mr. Rerdell, and saw him actually go into Mr. Torrey's room at about 10 o'clock that day—not very far, I apprehend, from 10 o'clock of that day. I should think more likely it would be a little after than before, but it probably cannot be definitely fixed, although not far from that.

The COURT. About 10 o'clock.

Mr. BLISS. Yes, sir.

What I want to call your attention to is that they did not propose to prove by that witness, who saw Rerdell go in that office and come out of that office, that Mr. Rerdell had a book or package, or anything presumptively a book. That is what I want to call your attention to.

Mr. MERRICK. If your honor will allow me, perhaps I had better explain the matter now. Mr. Newcomb, when he went into the office, left another man in his place, by whom, if the testimony of Newcomb had been admitted, we would have proved the fact complained of as left out of the offer.

The COURT. That shows the impropriety of commenting upon it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. It simply shows that I would have proved by another man that the second man did not exist.

The COURT. That strengthens my objection.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I asked the permission of the court before I said what I did.

Mr. MERRICK. And I asked the court that I might have the same breadth of latitude.

At this point (1 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m.) the court took its usual recess.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. INGERSOLL. [Resuming.] May it please the court and gentlemen of the jury: It is also claimed by the prosecution that on the evening of the day on which Rerdell was in New York and sent the telegram from Jersey City, Dorsey wrote a letter to Rerdell in which he begged him for the sake of his family, for the sake of his children, and everything, to go no further. I believe it is claimed that after Mr. Rerdell got back here to Washington he showed that letter to his brother. It struck me as extremely wonderful that he did not show his brother the book; that was such an important thing, it being the thing that he went after, being something that was to decide his fate with the Government. There was nothing about that. Let me say right there: Suppose his story is true that he told Dorsey that he had been to the Government. Would Dorsey write to that man a letter begging him for God's sake not to go further? Would he not rather have sent some man to see him? He knew at that time that he was utterly dishonest, having received that very afternoon, according to Rerdell's testimony, a telegram from Rerdell, in which Rerdell admitted that he had told a falsehood. Would he have then put himself upon paper? Would he have put himself in the power of that same man? I ask you, because you know there is about as much human nature in one person as in another on the average, and the only way you can tell what another man will do is by thinking "What would I do under the circumstances?"

I am going to demonstrate to you now that there were no such books just with one point. When Rerdell came to make the affidavit of June 20, 1881, Dorsey knew that Rerdell had talked with MacVeagh, James, and Clayton. He also knew that Rerdell, according to his statement, had promised to go to New York and get the red book. Rerdell swears in the affidavit of June, 1881, that he promised MacVeagh to go to New York and get those books. Dorsey knew at that time whether such books existed or not. If he knew they did exist then he knew that Rerdell went after them. Why did not Dorsey ask Rerdell at the time he made that affidavit "Did you get a book in New York?" Admitting, for the sake of the argument, that Rerdell's story is true that the books were there and that Dorsey knew it, would not Dorsey have asked him, when he was making the affidavit of June 20, 1881, "Did you get a book in New York? What did you do with it, if you did?" Rerdell swears that Dorsey did not mention that subject; that it was not talked of between them. Why? Because both knew that no such books existed. That is the reason he did not ask him if he got it. He knew he did not get it. Why? Because the book was not there to be obtained. Can you explain that on any other hypothesis? Dorsey knew at this time, according to the testimony of Rerdell, that Rerdell was dishonest; knew that Rerdell had tried to sell him out to the Government; knew that Rerdell had promised MacVeagh he would go to New York and get those books; knew that Rerdell had been to New York; knew that Rerdell had gotten back, and yet did not ask him, "Did you get a book?" Would not he have naturally said "I want that book that you got in New York. I want it now." It also appears in evidence that on the very day that Rerdell was in New York and says he was in Torrey's office, Torrey in the afternoon went to the Albemarle Hotel to do some writing for Mr. Dorsey. Is it conceivable that Torrey would not in that conversation have told Dorsey, "Your clerk, Rerdell, came to the office to-day and I gave him the mail book or one of those books?" Not a word. That affidavit was made in June, 1881, and was the affidavit in which Rerdell disclosed what he had done with the Government, and that he had agreed to get that very book, and yet Dorsey did not take interest enough in the matter to ask him if he got a book.

Mr. MERRICK. Is there any evidence of the conversation between Torrey and Dorsey?

Mr. INGERSOLL. No. The evidence is that Torrey went there that evening. You claim that that was the topic of conversation, and that Dorsey sent dispatches to Rerdell that night and wrote a letter to Rerdell. So I say, under the circumstances, and with the excitement then prevailing, it is inconceivable that Torrey should not have said, "Your man Rerdell has been at my office to-day, and got one of the books."

Mr. MERRICK. I ask the question whether there is any evidence as to what he did tell Dorsey, or did not tell Dorsey?

Mr. INGERSOLL. No, sir; not that I know of.

Mr. MERRICK. Then we do not know.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I say it is inconceivable that he did not tell him, and therefore Dorsey must have known it had it been a fact, and had it been a fact when Rerdell made the affidavit of 1881, Dorsey would have said, "I want that book. I want the book you stole from my office." He did not even mention it. It was not the subject of conversation. Yet, in that same affidavit, he said that he agreed to go and get it, and in that same affidavit he said that no such book ever existed. He swore to that affidavit from friendship. You see, gentlemen, about how much friendship that man is capable of. He swore for friendship that no such book existed; he now swears that it did. What is that for? You want to consider these things. Nobody asked about that book. The matter drifted along. The summer wore away. Autumn touched the woods with gold. Nobody ever mentioned the book. Winter came. That book was in a little carpet-sack hanging in a woodshed. A magnificent place to secrete property. The snows descended; the winds howled around that woodshed. The carpet-sack hung there with the book in it. Nobody touched it. I think the next year, may be that summer, he wrote or telegraphed to Mrs. Cushman to get the book. It suddenly occurred to him that a woodshed was not a safe place for it. She got a book. She looked into it enough to find out it was about the mail business. She put it away; finally that book was brought from its hiding-place on the 13th of July, 1882, when Rerdell says he handed it over to Dorsey, and there is not one syllable of evidence going to show that it was ever spoken of from the time he visited New York until he brought it to Dorsey, as he claimed, at Willard's Hotel. What made him give it to him? Dorsey was mad. Dorsey threatened that he would have Rerdell arrested for perjury, because Rerdell had sworn that he, Dorsey, was innocent. That is enough to excite the wrath of an ordinary man. Dorsey was then on trial. The first trial was then going on. We were right in the midst of it. The year before that Rerdell had solemnly taken his oath that Dorsey was an innocent man, and here Dorsey was in a court insisting that he was innocent. Yet he threatened to have Rerdell then and there punished for perjury because he had sworn that he was innocent. That frightened Rerdell. I think it was calculated to frighten any man.

Why did Dorsey allow Rerdell to keep that book? There is only one possible explanation: The book never existed. That is all. Torrey would have told about it if it had been taken from his office, because I believe the evidence shows that that affidavit was shortly afterwards published. Nobody seemed to have taken any interest in that book. All interest faded away. Now, Mr. Rerdell made that affidavit on the 20th of June, 1881. I believe, on page 2468, Rerdell swears that when he made the affidavit of June 20, 1881, he had the copies of the original journal and ledger at Dorsey's office. Afterwards he swears he had not. He swears that he then gave them to Dorsey. Afterwards he says they were sent to New York the year before. I will come to that after awhile. Now, let us see what the position of affairs was on June 20, 1881. At this time Rerdell had furnished the Government all the information he had, except the book. Then they had said to him substantially, "The evidence is insufficient. We want more." Rerdell agreed to furnish them the books, and went to New York to get the books. Now, he had Dorsey absolutely in his power, according to his account. What did he do? He had, according to his testimony, the copy of the letter Dorsey had written to Bosler on the 13th of May, 1879, the copy having been made by Miss Nettie L. White. He had the tabular statement in Dorsey's own handwriting, showing 33 $\frac{1}{3}$ per cent. to T. J. B. He had the letter that he himself wrote to Bosler on the 22d of May, 1880. He had the red book. According to his statement, on that day he had Dorsey in his power. All he had to do was to take the next step and secure absolute safety for himself and crush his employer. What did he do? He then said, "I went to the Government and played the detective." He retreated. He voluntarily put himself in a position a thousand times as perilous as he had been in before. He put himself in a place where he had to swear that what he told the Government was a lie, and that he was simply endeavoring to find out the Government's case and was acting as a detective. You must recollect that Rerdell is a man who does nothing for money. He will make an affidavit for unadulterated friendship. He will make it also from fright. He will make it also, he says, in the interest of truth. At that time he made an affidavit, as he says, for friendship, and it is for the jury to determine how much a man like Rerdell—because you know what he is just as well as I do—would do for friendship. You have seen him here day after day. You saw him sitting right at the door when Mr. Ker and Mr. Bliss were demonstrating to you that he was a guilty wretch, and you saw his face beaming with pleasure. He was absolutely delighted. Yet when Mr. Wilson stood here and endeavored to show that the man was not as bad as he said he was, endeavored to show that his plea of guilty was absolutely false, he slunk away, covered with the shame of innocence. He did not want to hear that. He wanted it understood that he was guilty, and that it was the proudest moment of his life. Now, it is for you to determine how much such a man would do for friendship. It is for you to determine how you can take advantage of his finer nature. He had Dorsey in his power, according to his story, but instead of carrying out his original design he turned against the Government. Why did he do that? Because of patriotism? No. Why? He did it for his own benefit, gentlemen. He never acted from any other motive. Why did he not stay with the Government? Because they would not give him his price for his evidence. Why would they not give him his price for his evidence? Because his evidence was not worth it. If he had had the copy of the letter from Dorsey to Bosler they would have given him his price. They would have followed him all over the United States to have given him his price. There was the absolute evidence against Dorsey. There was the evidence against the man whom Mr. MacVeagh wished to drag down. Why did they not buy it? Because the man did not have it. Why did he desert the Government? Because the Government would not give him his price. Again I ask why would not the Government give him his price? Because he had not the goods; he had not the evidence. Then what did he do? He sneaked back and asked protection of the man he had endeavored to betray. That is what he did. He again asked Dorsey to stand by him. Dorsey did not need this man. This man needed him, and he instantly deserted the Government and went back to Dorsey. For the sake of saving Dorsey? No. For the purpose of saving himself. He had not the evidence. Yet, according to this testimony of his, he had what I told you. What else did he have? He had the route-book. What was the route-book, gentlemen? From the evidence it appears that this man kept a route-book, and that in it he had the name of each route, the number of the route, where it started from, and where it went to, the name of the contractor, the amount per year, the name of the subcontractor, the amount per year, and then a column showing whether it had been increased, and, if so, how much, and whether it had been expedited, and, if so, how much. He had that book. He says he was subpoenaed to appear before the Congressional committee. What book would that committee want? They would want the book that showed the original contracts, the subcontracts, the description of the routes, how much the Government paid to the contractor, and how much the contractor paid to the subcontractor. That was the book they wanted, and that was the book to hide if any hiding was to be done. That was the book to have copied. That was the book in which figures should have been changed, if in any. And yet he never said one word about that route-book. He had it in his possession. Why would he not expect the committee of Congress to call for that book? He did not tell you. He did not have that book copied, and yet that was the book that had in it every particle of information that the Congressional committee wanted. Not a word on that subject.

It appears, too, in the evidence, that Mr. Rerdell had in his possession certain notes that passed between him and Mr. Steele about the red books. Why were not those notes produced in evidence? Mr. Steele was here on the subpoena of the Government. Why were not those notes produced in evidence? Not a word about that. Is it possible that those notes were about the route-book? Why were they not produced? Rerdell went before that Congressional committee. He did not take any route-book. What did he take? He said that he had these books made up to take. Did they contain the accounts of the subcontractors? No. Donnelly swears there were not more than twelve accounts in the book. What was the use of taking that book, or those books, before the committee? Another thing: He says that he went immediately and got those books copied. Would he try to palm off the copies as originals? Would not the committee ask him the very first thing, "In whose handwriting are these books?" He could not say, "They are in mine," because then he would be caught. He would have to say, "They are in Mr. Donnelly's handwriting." The next question would be, "Where is Mr. Donnelly?" And the answer would be, "Here in town." The committee would send for him and would ask, "Mr. Donnelly, did you write in those books?" "Yes." "Did you make the entries at the time they purport to have been made?" "No, sir; I copied them from another set of books that Mr. Rerdell gave to me." He would either say that or swear to a lie. Then they would say, "Mr. Rerdell, we want the original books," and then he would be caught. You cannot imagine a more shallow device. More than that, the books would not have any information that the committee wanted, nothing about these contracts, and nothing about the amount paid the subcontractors. If the committee wanted anything they wanted to show that the Government was paying a large price and the contractors were paying to the subcontractors a small price. Rerdell says that when he was subpoenaed to bring his books he never thought of the route-book. He thought of the red books, and yet the route-book was the only book that had any information that the committee wanted. How was he to palm that off? Is it possible to think of a reason having in it less probability, less weight, less human nature than the reason he gives for having those books copied? There is another question. If Rerdell expected to palm off the copies as the originals, why did he keep the originals? For instance, I have a book here that I don't want Congress to see and so I have it copied. I am going to swear that that copy is the original; otherwise the device is good for nothing. Why keep the original and run the perpetual danger of discovery? Why not burn the original? Why keep the evidence of my own guilt, liable to be found at any moment by accident, by a servant, by a stranger? That is not human nature, gentlemen. Then there is another question: If he were going to have a book copied and then swear that the copy was the original, he would have copied it himself. If a man intends to swear to a lie the first thing he does is not to take somebody into the secret. Why should he have put himself in the power of Donnelly? He was the man to be the witness before the committee, and if his device worked he intended to swear before the committee that the copies were the originals; and yet, by going to Donnelly to have the work done, he manufactured a witness that would always stand ready to prove that he, Rerdell, had sworn to a falsehood. What men work in that way? When a man makes up his mind to swear to a lie does he take pains to go to one of his neighbors and say, "I am going to swear to a lie to-morrow and I want to give you the evidence of it. I am going to swear that a copy is an original. I want you to make the copy so that I can swear to it." Would not the neighbor then say, "I will be a witness against you in that case. You had better copy it yourself." Just see what he did. He took pains to have a witness so that if he swore falsely he could be contradicted and convicted. Why did he not copy the books himself? After he got the originals copied why did he not burn up the originals so that nobody could ever find them in his possession?

Let us take another step. Finally, he got before the committee. When he got before the committee what did he swear? He swore that he kept some expense-books showing how he stood with the contractors. I think that was the truth. I think that is what he did keep. He did not tell the committee about the route-book. Not a word. That was the only book that he concealed in his testimony. He said he kept some expense-books and those were all that he kept. He did not tell about the route-book. That is the only book that he failed to mention. Consequently, it seems to me, that was the only book he did not want to show. Why? Because he thought at that time they were going to make a great outcry about what was paid to the subcontractor and to the contractor and he had no advices from anybody, except from whom? Except from Mr. Bosler. What did Bosler tell him? Bosler told him, "I see no reason why you should not exhibit your books and papers." Now, according to Rerdell's testimony, on the 13th of May the year before, Dorsey had written a letter to Bosler informing him that he had given $20,000 to T. J. B. Bosler knew, if the testimony of Rerdell is true, that that letter had been written, and Bosler had that information. He knew if the letter had been copied, too, because every letter that one receives gives evidence whether it has been copied or not. And yet, knowing of that letter, he wrote to Rerdell or telegraphed him that he saw no reason why he should not show all his books and papers. Nobody believes that. Nobody ever will believe it! The earth may revolve in its orbit for millions of years, and generations may come and go, countless as the leaves of all the forests, and there never will be found a man of average intelligence to believe that story. Just think of it. Bosler, according to the testimony of Rerdell, had gone into partnership with Dorsey knowing there was a conspiracy, knowing Dorsey was paying to Brady 33½ per cent. of the profits, and thereupon the clerk who attended to the business writes or telegraphs to him, and says he has been subpoenaed to appear before the Congressional committee with the books and papers, and Mr. Bosler knowing of the existence of the conspiracy, and knowing that Brady is getting 33½ per cent., writes or telegraphs back that he sees no reason why all the books and papers should not be presented to the committee. Gentlemen, that is impossible; it never happened and it never will.

Ah, but they say these books did exist. Why? Because Mr. Donnelly copied them. Let us see whether he did or not. There is nothing like examining these questions. Mr. Rerdell says that in his interview with Brady, Brady suggested to him that he had better have them copied. This, I believe, was on the 21st of May, 1880. Now he swears that in accordance with that view or suggestion that he received from Brady he had the books copied by Donnelly. When did he have it done? He had it done after the 21st day of May, 1880. On page 2638 Donnelly swears that he copied these books in the latter part of April or the forepart of May. On page 2636, where he was asked if he had anything to do with copying a book of accounts for Rerdell, he says that he had; and on being asked what kind of books they were, says they were a small set of books. Donnelly swears that they related to the mail business, and seemed to be the books of a firm. At that time nobody was interested in the matter except S. W. Dorsey. How did they appear to be the books of a firm? Donnelly swears, on page 2640, "there were not more than a dozen accounts in the book." Let us see if these were mail the books. He says there was an account against S. W. Dorsey; that is one. An account against John W. Dorsey; that is two. Against Donnelly himself; that is three. M. C. Rerdell; that is four. Interest account; five. A mail account; six. An expense account; seven. A profit and loss account, eight; and an account with William Smith, nine. That is all he gives. But he says they were not to exceed a dozen. On page 2644 Gibbs says there was an account against Colonel Steele and Mrs. Steele. I take it they would be in one account. That makes ten. Then there was an account against Jennings, making eleven; and an account against Perkins, making twelve. Let us see if we can go a little further. Mr. Rerdell swears to a cash account; that is thirteen. Also an account against J. H. Mitchell; that is fourteen; and one against Belford, making fifteen. You can deduct your Jones and your Smith and have one more account in the book than Donnelly swears was in it. He swears they were not to exceed a dozen. That was the book with all this mail business. We will follow it up a little. Rerdell says he opened the books according to the memorandum, and swears consequently that there was a cash account and an account with J. H. Mitchell. J. B. Belford I believe he afterwards mentioned. Now, according to Gibbs's testimony there was an account with Perkins. Understand I say that the only book he had, if he had any, was a private book in which he kept his own expense accounts and his own matters, and it was not a book with which Stephen W. Dorsey had any connection. I say that the William Smith and Samuel Jones account he has added for the purpose of having something to sell to the Government. That is my claim. I say they were his private books. There was an account with Perkins. You have heard all the testimony, gentlemen. You know all the contracts in this case. You know all the subcontracts. There is not a single solitary account in this book with any subcontractor mentioned in any of these subcontracts except Perkins and possibly Jennings. Who was Perkins? Perkins was a subcontractor on the route from Rawlins to White River. That is the route that Rerdell had an interest in himself. Rerdell made the subcontract with Perkins himself, and consequently he had an account with Perkins in his own private book, and had not any account with the rest of the subcontractors. We also find, according to Gibbs, that there was an account against Jennings. Who was Jennings? That brings us to the Jennings claim. That is the claim that he told Mr. Woodward about when he wanted to sell out in the first place, and that is the claim that he told MacVeagh and the Postmaster-General about. Strangely enough and wonderfully enough we find that claim in this very book. That shows whether it was a private book or whether it was a book kept for the accounts of Dorsey. Now, on page 2489, Rerdell happened to tell what kind of a book he kept. I think I was cross-examining the young man at that time:

Q. Did you have anything at all to do with the Vaile and Miner routes?—A. Not anything.

Q. What did you do with the drafts that were not payable to you?—A. I would send them to the contractors or to the persons to whom they were payable. That was the general rule.

I was trying to get at what he did with the drafts on the Toquerville and Adairville route.

Q. Will you state specifically what routes you received money on from the Post-Office Department?—A. I received some of the money on route 38152.

Q. What other routes?—A. I received some money on one of the California routes or the Oregon routes. Let me refer to my book.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I have no objection. I want to know as a fact.

The WITNESS. Probably I can find one or two items here. [Referring to book.]

He kept two sets of books, don't you see.

I see on September 12, 1879, that I received $400 from Lewis Johnson & Co., which was for drafts hypothecated on mail service.

Received by him.

That was on one of those specific routes that you mentioned?—A. It was on some of the Dorsey routes. I do not know which ones. I see on November 13 there was a Post-Office draft for $208. I do not know what routes it was for.

Q. Let me ask you right there, did you get the proceeds of those drafts personally?—A. This was deposited to M. C. Rerdell as agent. Those that I read off just now, $400 and $208.64, I received Post-Office drafts for. I do not know what routes.

Q. Now go to the specific routes, if you can?—A. This does not give it. Then I see another place: Post-Office draft, $31.40. I see in another place, Post-Office draft, $87.

He was still looking on his book.

Q. Can you tell from your book what route that is on?—A. This I know is on route 38152.

Q. How did you come to get that?—A. If I remember right, I got two orders on that route, one by reason of filing a draft, and the other by sending it to John W. Dorsey and getting his indorsement and then charging it up to myself.

Q. That was a warrant indorsed to you?—A. One of them was. I don't know which it was. I got $87 twice.

Q. There was not anything due you personally on that route?—A. Not anything.

Q. Now go to the specific routes where something was due to you by virtue of your being subcontractor or contractor.—A. I do not know that it ever came into my hands, but it came through me. There was an amount paid to Jennings of $994.

Q. Were you contractor or subcontractor then?—A. I was then the subcontractor of record.

Q. What was the number of the route?—A. 40104.

Q. That was paid to you in April, 1880, was it?—A. I do not remember the date when it was paid. Yes, it was paid in 1880.

Q. And you turned that over to Jennings?—A. It went to him. I think I turned it over to his lawyer.

Now, by looking at the Post-Office reports I find that $994 was paid to Rerdell for Jennings on the 14th day of April, 1880, and the question I ask is did he keep two sets of books at that time? He produced in court a book of his own kept at that time with the Jennings account in it. The book that was copied had the Perkins account, and why? Because it was a special account in which Rerdell was interested. They have failed to prove that there was in that other book any account in which Dorsey was necessarily interested, except the account kept with Rerdell showing Rerdell's transactions with Dorsey.

By referring to the first volume of this trial, page 733, I find that $944 was paid to Rerdell on the 14th day of April, 1880. We now come to the testimony of Mr. Gibbs. Mr. Gibbs says his wife copied a journal between Christmas, 1879, and the 1st of March, 1880. Rerdell says that she copied the journal and ledger both. The witness, Gibbs, gives the color of the book. He says it was not red; it was either brown or black. Mr. Gibbs remembers nothing about the Smith account, whether it was large or whether it was small. He finally swears that he does not really recollect anything about it, except that Rerdell brought the book there and said he wanted to get a copy made to send to Dorsey in New York, and that he returned the book and the copy to Rerdell. He swears that he remembers as names in this book Smith, Jones, and S. W. Dorsey, and M. C. Rerdell. Those were all he could think of. He does not remember the name of John H. Mitchell. On page 2646, he says he believes that Rerdell came to him and asked him during the trial if he recollected the name of William Smith, and he swears that when Rerdell asked him if he recollected the name of William Smith, he distinctly told him that he did not. Then he asked him if he recollected the name of Jones, and he swears that he told Rerdell when he asked him that question that he did not. I read from page 2646:

Q. Did he ask you if you recollected the name of William Smith?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did he tell you anything about Samuel Jones or Jones?—A. He asked me if I remembered the name of Jones.

Q. At the time he came to you did you tell him first that you recollected those names, or did he first tell you the names and then ask you if you did not recollect?—A. He asked me the names, and asked me if I did not recollect them, and I told him I did not.

Q. When he first came to you he asked you if you remembered the names and you said you did not?—A. Yes; and I have always told him so.

Q. Then he told you the names that he remembered, did he?—A. No, sir.

Q. How did he call your attention to Smith and Jones?—A. He came up and asked me if I could remember any names in the book, and I told him I could remember one or two, or a few of them, and I went over them to him; then he asked me if I remembered the name of Smith, and I said, "No, sir;" then he asked me if I remembered the name of Jones, and I said, "No, sir;" neither did I at that time.

Q. As a matter of fact have you not told a number of persons that you did not remember the names in that book?—A. Possibly so, sir.

* * * * *

By Mr. MERRICK:

Q. Your memory being now refreshed, have you any doubt about your recollection of the name of Smith?—A. Not the slightest.

Q. Or Jones?—A. No, sir.

By the COURT:

Q. How do these things come into your mind so recently?—A. Your honor, I tried not to remember anything of this.

How can a man try not to remember? What mental muscle is it that he contracts when he tries not to remember? That is a metaphysical question that interested me greatly when the man was testifying, for he said he tried not to remember. Why did he try not to remember?

I didn't want to be called into court if I could possibly help it, and for quite a long time did not mention the fact that I knew anything of the books. But when I was called into court, I thought of all the circumstances connected with the time that I copied the books; and a few days ago, or a week or so ago, in going home one night, and thinking this thing over in my mind, and thinking of everything I could think of, my mind reverted to a conversation I had had at the time, laughing and looking over the books.

It was not only one book, then.

And I wrote a great many letters, and read a great many names—

They must have been in the letter-books—and was laughing about the peculiarity of the names, and even made the remark, "There is even Smith and Jones in it."

What a wonderful circumstance! In copying the books and making an index of the three letter-books he found Smith and Jones. The difficulty would have been not to find Smith or Jones. Then I say:

Let me understand the last part of that answer. * * *

By Mr. INGERSOLL:

Q. You made that remark when; at the time the books were copied?—A. After they were finished; before they were turned over to Rerdell.

By the COURT:

Q. These are the circumstances that brought to your mind—

A. [Interposing.] The fact.

Q. The names of Jones and Smith?—A. Yes, sir.

By Mr. INGERSOLL:

Q. Now let me understand; when he first came to you you did not remember anything about Smith and Jones?—A. No, sir.

Q. And for a long time afterwards, or for several weeks afterwards?—A. It has not been such a great while since it came to my mind.

Q. How long?—A. Probably a week.

Q. Then, all at once, you remembered that at the time you copied the books you saw that there were the names of Smith and Jones in the book and were astonished?—No, sir; I was not astonished.

Q. You would have been astonished if Jones had not been in the book?

The WITNESS. If it had been?

Mr. INGERSOLL. If it had not been?—A. No, sir; I would not.

Q. Were you astonished to find Jones in that book?—A. No, sir.

Q. Were you astonished to find Smith in the book?—A. No, sir.

Q. If you were not astonished, how did it happen that you made that remark?—A. We all know there is a peculiarity about the combination of the names of Smith, Brown, Jones, and Robinson.

Q. And you were astonished that Brown and Robinson were not in?—A. I was not astonished. Simply looking over the books and speaking about them, and making remarks in regard to them, and the great number of peculiar names, I said, "Why, there is even Smith and Jones in it."

Q. Did you say that because Smith and Jones were so peculiar?—A. I don't know that they were peculiar.

Q. You said there were lots of peculiar names in that book, "And there is even Smith and Jones in it?"—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you mean by that that they were exceedingly peculiar?—A. No, sir; just coupling the names.

Q. Such funny names?—A. I didn't say that.

Q. Was J. W. Steele a strange name?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You consider that rather a strange name?—A. Yes, sir.

The COURT. It depends upon how you spell it, I suppose? [Laughter.]

Mr. MERRICK. A very common name in that book.

Q. Did you think at that time of what the judge has just said; was that the reason you thought it was such a funny name?—A. I suppose I thought of the metal.

Q. Did you regard Dorsey as a strange name?—A. No; I don't know that I did.

Q. Then, there was profit and loss. What other names of individuals were there?—A. Mr. Perkins, and there was Mrs. Steele.

Q. That would not be strange, as Steele was the name of her husband?—A. No, sir; I don't know that I can place any others just now. If I heard the names I could tell you in a minute.

Q. At that time you thought they were so peculiar?—A. Yes, sir.

The COURT. [To the witness.] Was not this the idea that struck you—

Mr. INGERSOLL—

I will not read that. Then the testimony goes on:

Q. What name was it struck you as being so peculiar?—A. I can't place any particular name now, but there were quite a number of them.

Q. Where were you walking along when you thought about this?—A. Going home from the hotel.

Q. About when was that?—A. It was within a week.

Q. Whereabouts were you at the time you thought of this?—A. I was on Eleventh, between F and G.

Q. About the middle of the block?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. It suddenly came into your mind what you had said?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was that the first time that you remembered it?—A. That was the first time that I remembered it.

Q. To whom did you make that remark?—A. To my wife.

Q. Just a little fun amongst yourselves?—A. Exactly.

Then I ask him another question:

Mr. MERRICK. Let me ask a question.

Mr. INGERSOLL. One more question, which my associate wishes me to ask.

Q. How long before that struck you on that block had you talked to Rerdell?—A. I think a few days before that. I was trying all along, connecting the different circumstances, from the time I first met Rerdell up to the time the books came.

Q. At that time, had you read in the testimony anything about William Smith or Sam. Jones?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You already knew that Rerdell had sworn to that, did you?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. But it never struck you like it did that evening?—A. No, sir.

That is the evidence of that man. When Rerdell first went to him, he told Rerdell distinctly, "I remember no name of Smith; I remember no name of Jones." And then he waited until Rerdell went on the stand and swore that he copied those books, and that the names of Smith and Jones were in them, and then his memory was refreshed, and he came here and swore that the names of Smith and Jones were there. All of a sudden it came to him, like a flash, and he subsequently had the conversation with his wife. Gentlemen, you may believe it; I do not; not a word of it. He is mistaken. He has mistaken imagination for memory; he has mistaken what Mr. Rerdell told him now for something he thinks happened long ago. He took the letter-books, too. May be there is where he found some of his strange names.

Rerdell says, in swearing to the letter which he says was written by Dorsey to Bosler on the 13th of May, 1879, that he (S. W. Dorsey) took that book, all his own books that were not used for the mail business, and boxed them up. When? In 1879. Mr. Kellogg swears that after they were boxed up they were sent to New York. When? In 1879. And yet Rerdell swears that between Christmas and New Year's, 1879, those books were at the house of Mr. Gibbs to be indexed. It will not do. And Rerdell swears that he had the letter-book containing the letter of May 13, here in 1881, when he went to MacVeagh, and yet, according to his own testimony, that book was sent to New York in 1879. And he swears that the three letter-books—and I will call your attention to them after a while—that he had here, commenced on the 15th of May, and ended, I think, in April or May, 1882. He swears that the letter written by Dorsey to Bosler was written on the 13th of May, 1879, and then he swears that the first letter in the three letter-books was dated the 15th of May, two days afterward. So he had not the book here. I knew he did not have it, because if he had had such a book with such a letter, he never would have gone to New York to steal a book; he would have stolen that one.

Torrey took charge of the books January 27, 1880, and he kept them until the 1st of May, 1880, in the Boreel Building, and then at that time moved to 145 Broadway, and kept them there until the last of April, 1882.

Now, gentlemen, I will come to those red books again in a moment, perhaps. Here is a little piece of evidence about the books. You know it was the hardest thing in the world to find out how many books this man had, how many times they were copied, who copied them, and what he did with the copies; and he got us all mixed up—counsel for the prosecution, the court, counsel for the defense—none of us could understand it. “How many books did you have? What did you do with them?” “Well, I took them to New York. No, I did not; I had some of them here.” Finally I manufactured out of my imagination a carpet-sack for him. I said, “Didn’t you take these books over to New York in a carpet-sack?” He said “Yes,” he did. He jumped at that carpet-sack like a trout at a fly. Let me call your attention to some other evidence, on page 2637, near the bottom. Donnelly is testifying:

Q. Was it an exact copy of the book?—A. It was not.

Q. In what did it differ from the book you were keeping?—A. There were some items left out.

Q. How did you come to leave out those items?—A. I left them out by direction of Rerdell.

Q. Were there any marks to indicate what was to be left out?—A. There was a pencil-mark drawn through.

Q. What accounts did you leave out?—A. That I don’t remember.

Q. Can you name any one?—A. Yes, sir; I left the William Smith account out.

Q. What was the amount of the account?—A. I don’t remember the exact amount.

Q. Come as near as you can.—A. Well, I should judge it was something about $30,000.

Q. What did you do with that amount in order to balance the books?

Now, I want you to pay particular attention to this answer.

A. My recollection is that I carried it to profit and loss.

Q. On the books or on the balance sheet?—A. On both.

Now, remember, these were the books made out to fool the committee. I suppose there are some book-keepers on this jury. I suppose Mr. Greene knows something about book-keeping, and Mr. Evans, and Mr. Crane, and Mr. Gill. I do not know but you all do. And you know that when you carry an amount to profit and loss you do not throw the name away; you keep the name. If you have charged against Robert G. Ingersoll $5,000, which you never expect to get, and you want to charge it to profit and loss, you make the charge and you put my name against that. You put profit and loss against Robert G. Ingersoll’s debt. Everybody that ever kept a book knows that. If you carry an amount to profit and loss you rewrite the name of the person who owes the debt. So that when he says, “My recollection is that I carried it to profit and loss,” there would be a name twice in the book instead of once. If it was simply in the book once it would be, “William Smith, debtor, $18,000.” But if you carry that to profit and loss you must credit profit and loss by this William Smith amount, and consequently get the name in the book twice instead of once. And that is what they call covering it up. They were so afraid that somebody would see an account against William Smith in one part of the book that they opened another account in the profit and loss business and put it in again. That would be twice. Now, let us go on a little:

Q. Were there any other accounts transferred in the same way?—A. I rather think there were, but I am not certain. I can’t tell what accounts there were. I don’t know.

Another refreshed fellow:

Q. How many were there so transferred?—A. There might have been two or three amounts, and might have been only two; I am not certain.

Q. Two or three accounts?—A. Two or three accounts or amounts; I am not certain.

There might be two amounts in one account, but not very well two accounts in one amount.

Q. Did you make the books balance on your copy?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How long were you working on that copy?—A. I was working on it two evenings and all of one night.

Now recollect, in the copy that he made, he carried the account of William Smith—and may be Jones, he does not remember—to profit and loss.

Now, let us take the next step. Let us go to page 2269. This is as good as a play. Now, we come to Mr. Rerdell's testimony, and this is after he had had the conversation with General Brady—such a natural conversation, too. Brady was afraid that Rerdell would not know that he (Brady) had conspired with Dorsey. Brady, you know, had a great deal of confidence in Rerdell. He liked his appearance:

Q. Very well; what did you then do, acting upon the suggestion of General Brady, in reference to having the books copied?

Now, recollect, this was in the latter part of May, 1880.

A. I then put a man at work upon them; gave him the books, designating such entries as should be left out by drawing a pencil through them in that way (making a X mark), and told him to make up a new set of books leaving out those entries, but to leave the books so that they would balance, taking the entries that were stricken out, also the same amount that had been carried to profit and loss. There is where Mr. MacVeagh's evidence was mixed. The items that had heretofore been charged to William Smith had, in the mean time, when the books were balanced, been carried to profit and loss.

They carried this amount to profit and loss. Donnelly swears that when he made the first copies of the books, he, Donnelly, carried those amounts to profit and loss. Consequently, when Donnelly got through, there were four books. But before that time, Gibbs had made a copy of one (according to Rerdell, of both), so that at that time there were six books. See?

Also the same amount that had been carried to profit and loss.

Rerdell says:

There is where Mr. MacVeagh's evidence was mixed.

And I call the attention of the court to this testimony:

The items that had been heretofore charged to William Smith had, in the mean time, when the books were balanced, been carried to profit and loss.

Now, Donnelly swears that when he made the first copy he carried the William Smith account and some other to profit and loss. Rerdell swears that acting upon the hint of General Brady he got a man to do—what? To make another copy and leave out the items that had heretofore been charged to profit and loss. Donnelly swears that he balanced the books, and he is the only man that ever did balance the books, according to the testimony. After Rerdell had been subpoenaed to appear before the Congressional committee, he got another man, whom he swears he put to work on the books, designating the entries to be left out by drawing a pencil mark through them; that he told him to make up a new set of books, leaving out those entries, but to leave the books so that they would balance, taking the entries that were stricken out, and also the same amount that had been carried to profit and loss, and leave them entirely out. Rerdell swears that prior to that time these accounts had been carried to profit and loss, and that he struck out the credits to Dorsey. This occurs at page 2363, at the bottom of the page:

The COURT. Go on.

Q. You drew the cross marks against what?—A. Against all the charges made against William Smith, and the credits of course to Stephen W. Dorsey, which would be the same thing, and also indicated the same amounts where they had been carried prior to that time to profit and loss.

There it is. You charge William Smith with $18,000 and credit S. W. Dorsey with $18,000, and in order to carry it to profit and loss you have to again write the name of William Smith and again write the name of S. W. Dorsey. So that instead of covering it up, it would simply make it twice as apparent.

Then the evidence as it stands is this: Rerdell swears that Mrs. Gibbs copied the journal and ledger. Gibbs does not swear it, but Rerdell does. That made four books. Then he got Donnelly to make another set of books with the William Smith and Dorsey accounts carried to profit and loss. That is six books. After he had been subpoenaed by the committee he got another man to make a new set of books and leave out the William Smith and Dorsey accounts and the profit and loss account, and that makes eight books. And there we are, so far as that is concerned.

Now, gentlemen, I have come to one other view of this case. I hope that you will not forget—because I do not want to speak of it all the time—that this man Rerdell swears that he had the original letter-press copy of that letter which he says Dorsey wrote to Bosler. Do not forget that. He says he had that before he went to New York to steal the red books; do not forget that. And that he gave that testimony away; do not forget that. That he says he had it copied by Miss White, and they do not introduce Miss White to show that she copied it; do not forget that. Do not forget, too, that he had when he was there the tabular statement in the handwriting of S. W. Dorsey.

Now, I would like to call your attention to the pencil memorandum, but I am afraid it is too dark for that purpose. [The court-room at this time being very dark on account of a severe storm.]

I call your attention now, gentlemen, to the affidavit of June 20, 1881. That is after the return of Rerdell from New York. It is really too dark to read anything.

The COURT. You can omit that for the present.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will throw off half an hour from my speech if the court will adjourn now.

The COURT. How are you to get home in this storm? We may as well stay here.

Mr. MERRICK. I cannot work here. I cannot see.

The COURT. Wait a few moments.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I would like to have the court adjourn.

Mr. MERRICK. It is really too dark for me to take notes, and I can readily appreciate the difficulty of referring to papers under these circumstances.

Mr. INGERSOLL. It is pretty hard to read print.

Mr. MERRICK. I can appreciate that.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I would like, if the court please, to have the court adjourn now, because I am proposing to take up the pencil memorandum, and that cannot be very well argued without a comparison of handwritings.

The COURT. You want to adjourn now?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I guess so; it is half past 3.

Mr. MERRICK. I would certainly desire an adjournment if I were speaking myself.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I am obliged to you, Mr. Merrick.

The COURT. Adjourn the court.

Thereupon (at 3 o'clock and 26 minutes p. m.) the court adjourned until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock .

T U E S D A Y, M A Y 22, 1883.

The court met at 11 o'clock.

Present, counsel for the Government and for the defendants.

Mr. INGERSOLL. [Resuming.] Gentlemen, on page 2286 Mr. Rerdell gives the contents of a letter which he says Dorsey wrote to him the night he, Rerdell, left New York, and when he says he had the book with him. He swears, you remember, that afterwards Dorsey tore the letter up. Let me read you the letter as he says it was written :

The letter started out by stating that he did not believe the report that had been brought to him in reference to myself, and that he also believed the affidavit story to be a lie. He plead in the letter for the sake of his wife and children and himself, and his social and business relations, and the friendship that had long existed between us not to do anything for his injury ; for God's sake to reconsider everything that I had done and take no steps further until he could see me. It was in that strain, simply begging me not to do anything further until he could see me.

Now, let us analyze that letter, keeping in our minds what Rerdell has sworn. Rerdell has sworn that when he went to the Albemarle Hotel he told Dorsey what he had done; that he had had the conversations with MacVeagh and James. Let me call your attention to the dispatch from Jersey City. First, Dorsey wrote to Rerdell that he did not believe the report that had been brought to him ; that had been brought to him. He could not have used that word "brought" if Rerdell had been the bringer. If Rerdell had made the report to him in person he could not have written to Rerdell, "I do not believe the report that has been brought to me." The use of the word "brought" shows that somebody else told him ; not the person to whom he wrote. "The report." What report? There is only one answer. The report that Rerdell had been in consultation with the Government. He writes to Rerdell, "I don't believe that report that has been brought to me," and yet when he wrote it, if Rerdell's testimony is true, he knew that Rerdell had given him that very report and he knew that Rerdell would know that he, Rerdell, had told Dorsey that very thing. Second, that he, Dorsey, believed the affidavit story to be a lie. There is again in this horizon of falsehood one little cloud of truth. Rerdell had not made an affidavit. He had told James, MacVeagh, Woodward, and Clayton what you know, but he had not made any affidavit, and when he was charged, if he was, with having made an affidavit, it delighted him to have one little speck of truth, just one thing that he could honestly deny. That was the one thing. He had not yet made an affidavit. Third, Dorsey plead with him in the letter for the sake of his wife, his children, himself, his social and business relations, and the friendship that had long existed between them, not to do what? Not to do anything further. According to Rerdell, he told him in the letter he did not believe he had done anything. Rerdell swears that he wrote to him in the letter that he did not believe the report; that is, that he had yet done anything, and then wound up the letter by begging him, for God's sake, not to do anything further. How came he to use the word "further?" "Don't take any further steps. I know that you have not taken any step at all, but do not, I pray you, take any further steps." That letter will not hang together. Dorsey swears he never wrote it. Finally, the letter comes down to this: "I don't believe the report. I do not believe you have done anything. But, for God's sake, do not do anything more." It is like the old Scotch verdict when a man was tried for larceny. The jury found him not guilty, but stated at the end of the verdict, "We hope the defendant will never do so again." The first part of this letter shows that Dorsey did not believe that he had done anything. The last part of it shows that he did believe he had done something and that he must not go further. No one can tell why he introduced the word "further" into this letter upon any other hypothesis. Now, I read to you, from page 2287, what Rerdell says happened at the Albemarle Hotel:

After speaking to him, and taking a seat in the front room—there were two rooms—he was in bed, and he got up and came out in his night clothes. As soon as he got out he charged me with holding interviews with Mr. James, the Postmaster-General, and the Attorney-General, saying at the same time that he was well posted as to everything that was going on in Washington; that he knew the very day and time that I had the interviews, and asked me what I meant by it. I told him my action was in his behalf; that I had been keeping up with the newspapers, and knowing the facts in regard to this mail business, what I had done was done in his behalf.

If he told him that at that time, is it possible that Dorsey afterwards wrote to him that he did not believe it?

I told him my action was in his behalf.

That is, he did not deny that he had these conversations, did not deny the report, did not deny that he had met the Attorney-General and the Postmaster-General, but said:

My action was in your behalf.

And then, according to Rerdell, after that Dorsey wrote him a letter, in which he said, "I do not believe the report," although Rerdell had made the report to him himself. May be that is the reason he did not believe it.

Now, let me read to you the conversation on his return from New York and see how it gibes with the letter. It is on page 2288:

Mr. Dorsey came to the door; he shook me by the hand and says, "Come downstairs." We walked down in the office together, when he immediately brought up the conversation that we had had over in New York, and what I had done by going to Mr. MacVeagh, and asked me if I intended to ruin him. I said no, I did not; it was not my intention to ruin him; it was my intention to help him out of what I thought to be a bad difficulty.

Q. What did he say?—A. He then asked me if I had done anything further since I had left him.

Yet in the letter that he wrote him from the Albemarle Hotel he said that he did not believe the report and did not believe that he had done anything against him. The first thing he asked him when he got here was, "Have you done anything further against me?"

I said no, I had not; I had not been near Mr. MacVeagh. He then says, "Well, how shall we get out of this?" I says, "Mr. Dorsey, I will do anything that I can except to commit perjury."

A very natural remark for Mr. Rerdell to make. He would do anything but that. That testimony shows that Dorsey never wrote the letter which Rerdell says he did write from New York. That testimony shows that they did not have the conversation in New York that Rerdell says they had. That testimony shows that they did have exactly the conversation which Mr. Dorsey swears they had.

Now I come, gentlemen, to the affidavit of June 20, 1881. I would like the letter of July 5, 1882, which is on page 3733. You understand this affidavit was made in consequence of the conversation, as he says, that he had with Dorsey after Dorsey came back from New York, in which he said he would do anything except commit perjury, and when Dorsey told him, "Damn it, what does that amount to when a friend is involved? I would not hesitate a moment." Consequently he swears that he made up his mind for the sake of friendship to swear to a lie for Mr. Dorsey. That is what he says now. On the 5th of July, 1882, while we were in the midst of the other trial, and when Mr. Rerdell, as he says, contemplated going over to the Government, and when he would not put evidence in our hands against himself, he wrote this letter:

JULY 5, 1882.

SENATOR: What I am going to say here may surprise you, while, judging from certain circumstances that to me are easily to be seen, you may not be taken by surprise.

I believe there is no claim that Dorsey wrote this letter. I will call your attention to the similarity of style and the similarity of expression in this letter to that of the affidavit of June 20, 1881:

To commence with this, it will be necessary to go back about a year to the time when, looking forward to the inevitable result of the star-route matters—

Matters—

I started to put myself in accord with the Government. At that time I had no thought of being included in any prosecution or indictment, supposing that as an agent I could not be held criminally responsible. Had I for one moment thought it possible nothing could have changed my mind, even anxious as I was to benefit you. The consequence was, I listened to Bosler and did what I will ever regret.

He comes upon this stand and swears that he made that affidavit because S. W. Dorsey begged him for the sake of his wife and children to make it. On the 5th of July, 1882, speaking of this affidavit, he says:

The consequence was, I listened to Bosler and did what I will ever regret. First, because of the unenviable notoriety given me in consequence of doing what he persuaded me to do.

Who persuaded him? Mr. Bosler. He writes that on the 5th of July, 1882, when, as he said, he had made up his mind to go over to the Government, and when he would not willingly put a club in our hands with which to dash out his brains.

Second, because, let this case go as it may, I am still left under a cloud—

That is a pitiable statement. That man under a cloud!—

both with your friends and acquaintances, and the public generally.

Here comes, gentlemen, the blossom and flower of this paragraph:

And that, too, almost penniless.

Then the letter goes on:

These are stern facts, and cannot be ignored, while had I continued acting with the Government my reputation would have been clear, and no doubt been appointed to a good position.

The Government must have promised the gentleman an office when he went, in June, 1881, to Woodward and to Clayton and to the Attorney-General and to the Postmaster-General. According to this letter, among other things he was to have an office, the steamboat route was to be reinstated, the Jennings claim was to be allowed, his father-in-law was to get a clerkship, and according to this letter he also was to have a position. That is civil service reform! What does he say?

At least I have every reason to believe such would have been the result.

He would have had an office, he has every reason to believe. Why? They must have promised it to him.

This now brings us to the present time. I have an opportunity to redeem myself, and think it best to do so, as by so doing I can be entirely relieved of the indictment.

The Government then must have promised him in 1882 that the indictment should be dismissed as against him. Is it possible that he would tell a lie, gentlemen? Is it possible the prosecution will say that he lied on the 13th of July, 1882, but in 1883, having met with a change of heart, he told the truth? No.

In taking this step let me say this: It is the result of much thought and also of preparation.

I think so. The preparation of several papers.

I have realized the fact that all you and Bosler desired was to use me, and when no longer needed I could go to the devil.

Well, I think that is where he has gone.

Therefore I have concluded to be used no longer, and propose to look out for myself.

To-day I am putting things in order, so as to commence right to-morrow. I regret this on your family's account, but I too have a family, and owe it to them to put myself right.

You see, gentlemen, he wanted to leave an unspotted reputation to his children.

I deem it as being due to you that I should give you notice of my intention.

Very truly,

M. C. RERDELL.

Now, gentlemen, he comes on the stand and swears that he made this affidavit, not being overpersuaded by Bosler, but because Dorsey with tears and groans besought him to make it. Yet on the 5th of July, 1882, he says he made it because he was overpersuaded by Bosler, and he says, too, "Had I remained with the Government my reputation would have been clear, and I have every reason to believe I would have had a good position." He says, "I have another opportunity to be entirely relieved from the indictment." These gentlemen say he never was promised immunity. That simply shows you cannot believe Mr. Rerdell when he is not under oath, and what he has sworn to here shows you cannot believe him when he is under oath.

Now I come to the affidavit. I will not spend a great deal of time upon it. Mr. Rerdell with extreme ease, without the slightest hesitation, went through that entire affidavit, picking out with all the facility imaginable, every paragraph written by Dorsey and every paragraph written by himself. I was astonished at his exhibition of memory. I finally asked to look at the copy of the paper he had, and when I got that in my hand I found that every word that he swore was written by Dorsey had been underscored with a blue pencil. That accounted for the facility with which he testified. I found afterwards that that paper had been given him by Mr. Woodward and that he had gone through and had marked such portions as Mr. Dorsey wrote, according to his testimony, or had marked those that he wrote, leaving the others unmarked, so that at a glance he could tell which way to swear. Before I get through with the papers in this case there is another thing to which I want to call your attention. All the papers as to which witnesses were called on the subject of handwriting are marked. I will show you that every one has a little secret mark upon it, so that the man who swore might know which way to swear simply by looking at the signature and at no other part. There has been a great deal of preparation in this case.

Now, Rerdell swears as to the parts of the affidavit that Dorsey wrote and the parts that he wrote. His object in swearing was to entirely relieve Messrs. James and MacVeagh from having made any bargain with him to steal Mr. Dorsey's books, and to entirely relieve them from any suspicion, as well as to relieve every other official of the Government from any suspicion of having promised him any pay in any shape or manner for the making of this affidavit. He swears, in the first place, that Dorsey wrote this :

My story captured them completely, and I took occasion to refer to the steamboat route and the Jennings claim. Mr. James remarked that he knew all about the Jennings matter, that Jennings had been badly treated, and he ought to get the money, and should ; that he would investigate the steamboat route and see if anything could be done ; that that was the worst part, and his special agents had reported it ; nevertheless he would see if something couldn't be done.

On page 2506, in his cross-examination, Mr. Rerdell swears that the words—were not written by Dorsey, but were written by himself. On the same page he swears that the words—

Mr. James remarked—

That Jennings had been badly treated—were not written by Mr. Dorsey, but were written by himself. On his examination-in-chief he swore that those words were written by Dorsey.

On his examination-in-chief he swore that Dorsey wrote this :

And to further deceive them and learn their plans, carried the letter-book containing—

And then he wrote—the much-talked of Oregon correspondence.

Afterward, when cross-examined, he swears, I think upon the same page, 2506, that he himself wrote the words :

Carried the letter-book containing.

That Dorsey did not write them. He also swears in his examination-in-chief that Dorsey wrote these words :

Making only one mistake, or rather slip, by which Mr. MacVeagh could, as a good lawyer, have detected me, and that was by stating that I had kept a set of books.

On his examination-in-chief he swears that Mr. Dorsey wrote those words. On cross-examination he admits that Dorsey did not write them and that he wrote them.

On his examination-in-chief he swears that he wrote this himself:

He said, " Well, Mr. Rerdell, I am in a position where I cannot make promises, but if you will place yourself in full accord with the Government, you shall not lose by it, and I would advise you not to receive any salary from Dorsey this month. It will be all right."

On cross-examination he takes it back, and swears, on page 2503, that Dorsey wrote the words :

It will be all right.

He was afraid those words might be given too wide a significance and might in some way touch the Attorney-General, and consequently he swore that he swore wrong when he swore that he wrote them, and that as a matter of fact Dorsey wrote them. Then, on his examination-in-chief, with the marked paper before him, and having plenty of time to manufacture his testimony, he swore that he wrote the words:

He asked me—

In his own handwriting, and that Dorsey wrote these words—when I was going to New York to get those books. I replied, "On Sunday night." He said, "Don't put it off too long, as they are all-important."

On his examination-in-chief he swore that Dorsey wrote those words, and on cross examination he admitted that he wrote every one of those words himself. When he was cross-examined he had not the paper before him. His memory was not refreshed by the blue pencil mark. So on his examination-in-chief he swore that he wrote these words:

As I was about leaving he—

Meaning the Attorney-General—said, "Mr. Rerdell, you have put yourself in full accord with us, and I have this to say, you shall be well taken care of and your matters shall be attended to."

On cross-examination, on page 2500, he swears that Dorsey wrote the words:

Your matters shall be attended to.

But he still admitted that he, Rerdell, wrote the words and put them in the mouth of the Attorney-General:

You shall be well taken care of.

He says in his letter of July 5, 1882:

If I had remained with the Government I have every reason to believe I would have a good position.

What next? Mr. Rerdell, in his examination-in-chief, swears that he himself wrote these words:

The next evening I called on Mr. Woodward to see if he had anything more to say, and he told me a place had been found for my father-in-law, and to give the application to Senator Clayton; to make the application for the Interior Department, as it was best not to put him into the Post-Office Department for fear of criticism; that the appointment should be made at once. It was all arranged. The next day I saw Clayton, who said the same thing.

On cross-examination, at page 2505, he swears that Dorsey wrote a part of this; that Dorsey wrote the following words:

As it was best not to put him into the Post-Office Department for fear of criticism.

When he testified on direct examination he had this marked paper before him; in the absence of the paper, on the cross-examination, he takes his solemn oath that he did not write it, but that Senator Dorsey did. What confidence can you put in that kind of testimony? I would like to have you, gentlemen, some time, or I would like to have anybody who has the slightest interest in the thing, read this affidavit and see whether it is the work of two or the work of one. You let two men write, one writing one paragraph and the other another paragraph, and then you read it; there is no man in the world accustomed to read books that cannot instantly detect the difference in style, the different mode of expression, the different use of language. But this affidavit emanated from one brain—was written by one hand. Let me read to show you how they run together in the same style. We will commence at—

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 20, 1881.

MR. PRESIDENT: I think it is my duty to you, the Administration, and common fairness that I should make to you the following statement under oath:

On or about the 8th day of June, 1881, I met ex-Senator Clayton on Fifteenth street, near the Riggs House, who, after a minute's conversation, invited me to visit him at his rooms, 1334 G street, and fixed the time at 7 o'clock that afternoon.

Knowing he was taking an active part against Senator Dorsey in the star-route investigation, I conceived the idea of acting the part of a detective in order to learn why ex-Senator Dorsey was attacked so savagely by the newspapers of the country, and also to ascertain if there were any real grounds for such abuse, and what part Clayton was taking in the matter.

During our interview I intimated that I knew of a great many things in connection with the so-called "star-route frauds," and that I would be a damaging witness against Dorsey, Brady, and others, and if called upon and put on the witness-stand I would tell all.

This statement of mine resulted in a request from Clayton that I meet Mr. James, the Postmaster-General, and go over the matter with him. This I assented to, but remarked that there were certain things I wanted done in consideration of furnishing the evidence he desired to convict Dorsey.

First. I wanted a steamboat route on Savannah River, No. 15099, re-established, this route having been discontinued by the Postmaster-General, and in which I had a profitable interest.

Second. I represented to him that I had a large interest in a claim one Isaac Jennings had against the Post-Office Department. That this claim was a just one and ought to be paid.

Third. That I was supporting my father-in-law and his wife, and I wanted a position for him in some of the departments. To all of which he (Clayton) assented and said he would do what he could for me, and would speak to the Postmaster-General.

On the next day I received a card from Clayton stating that an interview had been arranged for Mr. James and myself at the Arlington Hotel, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

At the appointed time I went there and met Clayton, when we went up to the room of Mr. James. Immediately after entering his room Mr. Woodward came in. I objected to his being present, as I knew he was a detective, and I was afraid I could not cope with him in that line, but, on the repeated request of Mr. James, I consented to his being present.

Having started out in the role of a detective, I of course had prepared my story, and to give effect to it pretended to have in my possession certain memoranda of Mr. Dorsey's, as well as a letter from him to me. These I exhibited to Mr. James as confirmation of my story.

I desire to say here that, from long association and connection with Mr. Dorsey as his stenographer and business agent, I have learned to imitate his handwriting, and can sign his name so near like he does that he himself cannot tell it, and I have signed checks that passed the bank.

All of these memoranda and the letter I exhibited were written in pencil, with the exception of a statement Mr. Dorsey made showing the pay of each route after it was increased. I wrote them in pencil so that I could more easily pass them off as genuine.

Now, gentlemen, I have read to you fifteen paragraphs, and of these fifteen paragraphs Mr. Rerdell has sworn that seven were written by Mr. Dorsey. Nobody can see any difference in the writing; nobody can see the slightest difference in the mode of expression; the sharpest verbal mechanic that ever lived cannot see a joint between these paragraphs. They emanated from the same brain; they were written by the same hand; and if any man, who has ever read one book clear through, will read that he will see that one person wrote it all. But Mr. Bliss tells you that here is a passage that shows the handiwork of S. W. Dorsey, because Dorsey was a politician:

He also said that you, Mr. President, had told Mr. Dorsey you could not interfere in this investigation and prosecution; that if you did, the public would say that the President and a Secretary, who shall be nameless, but whose name I could guess, had taken the money of the star-route ring while they were in Congress, or the Postmaster-General and Attorney-General had taken it since, and therefore he (Dorsey) must look to the courts for vindication.

That is the passage upon which Mr. Bliss relies, among others, to show that this was formed in the brain of S. W. Dorsey; and yet Rerdell swears that that passage he wrote himself. It will not do, gentlemen.

Now, in order that you may know just about how much force to give to that, let me read you a little from page 2379; and I read this for the purpose of letting you know the ideas that this man Rerdell entertains of right and wrong. He is asked whether he thought it was wrong to fill up these affidavits and change petitions:

The WITNESS. I did not draw any inference at all that anything was wrong either about writing in a petition—in fact, I had forgotten all about it—I did not think it was wrong, and would not have hesitated at the time to have done it.

He did not think it was wrong.

The same thing about these blank affidavits. I did not think they were wrong; it never crossed my mind, not having a legal mind; and a great many things I see now that I did not see then and had not seen up to that time.

Q. Up to the 13th of July, when you made this affidavit, it had not occurred to you that there was anything really wrong?—A. Yes, sir; it had up to that time; there had been a great many things that had occurred to me, but I did not know at the time that I signed that.

That is, on the 13th of July, 1882, when we were in the midst of the other trial; when he knew that it was claimed by the prosecution that these petitions had been interlined, and that these affidavits about the number of men and horses had been made in blank and filled up; and yet he swears that on the 13th of July, 1882, it had not occurred to him that that was wrong.

I had forgotten the fact, and it was only recalled to my mind by seeing the papers, what particular things S. W. Dorsey had done, as, for instance, filling out some of these affidavits. I don't think I knew it at that time—that is, I had forgotten it; it passed out of mind; the paper refreshes my mind upon that.

July 13, 1882—

Q. At the time, then, that this statement was made, you did not remember that S. W. Dorsey had given you directions about filling up these affidavits or writing in those petitions; it had escaped your mind?

He found he was getting in a hard place, and he said:

A. Oh, no; that had not escaped my mind, and the fact that he had given me those instructions; but, as I say, I had forgotten that in one or two instances he himself had filled them in.

Q. That he had written them?—A. Yes, sir; and then I hadn't forgotten that he had told me to fill them in, not at all, but I didn't think of the wrong.

Q. Now, let me get at your exact idea: You remembered then that he had told you to fill them up, but it did not occur to you then that he personally had filled up any?—A. I had forgotten that fact.

Q. And in your then state of mind, remembering that he had told you to do it, and not remembering that he had done it, it did not occur to you that what he had done was wrong; is that right?

He says:

I don't catch your idea.

Q. Perhaps you do not. Here is the idea: At the time you made this affidavit—you did remember that Dorsey had told you to fill out some affidavits and write in some petitions, but you did not remember that he had personally done that himself; is that right?—A. That is it.

July 13, 1882—

Q. And so, remembering that he had told you, it did not occur to your mind at that time that what he did was wrong; that is, it did not occur to you that it was wrong in him to tell you to fill up the affidavits?—A. It had not occurred to me at that time that it was wrong, if I remember now.

Q. And the reason you swore that he had not done any wrong was because you did not at that time recollect that he had personally filled up any of these himself; is that right?—A. Yes, sir; that is right; and then there is another thing—that is, I never knew of my own personal knowledge—in other words, I did not see—the word “inference” is in there, I admit that, but I did not see S. W. Dorsey pay Thomas J. Brady any money, nor did I ever know Mr. Bosler to do it, nor did I ever see Mr. Bosler pay any money to Brady for remissions.

We will come to that in a little while :

Q. On the 13th of July, when you made the affidavit that Dorsey had done nothing wrong, although you then remembered that he had told you to fill up certain affidavits and write in certain petitions it did not occur to you at that time that it was wrong in him to have done that?—A. I did not regard it at that time as being wrong—that is, an offense; an offense is what I want to say, and I did not believe it up to almost the end of the trial.

Q. At that time you remembered that he had told you to do this and that you had done it?—A. Oh, yes; I hadn't forgotten it.

Q. But you did not consider that you had done wrong in doing it?—A. I did not.

Q. Neither did you consider that he had done wrong in doing it?—A. I did not.

Q. If you had at that time remembered that he personally did it, then would you have thought it wrong?

Mr. MERRICK. Wait a moment.

Finally, after a little talk, we come down to this :

Q. And do you now say that you did not, at that time, regard that as wrong?

The WITNESS. As wrong for him to suggest it, do you mean?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes.

A. No, I did not; I did not regard that as particularly wrong.

Now, I want you to get at the moral nature of this man; I want you to thoroughly understand him. When you examine these affidavits, when you think of his testimony, I want you to know exactly the kind of nature he has, and I want you to remember that he came here upon this stand and swore in this case that he did not consider that it was wrong to interline petitions; that he did not think it was wrong to fill up affidavits; and that is the reason he made the affidavit of July 13, 1882. Although he then knew that these things had been done, still he did not regard them as wrong. You see it is worth something to get at a man, to get at his philosophy of right and wrong; it is worth something to know how he thinks; why he acts; and when you have found that out about a man, then you know whether to believe him or not.

I believe the jury did look at this paper and saw all the parts that had been marked by blue pencil, and those parts, I believe, he said Dorsey wrote. That is the paper he had before him at the time he testified in chief (exhibiting the paper to the jury). But when he came to be cross-examined, not having the paper then before his eyes, he swore in very many important things exactly the other way. You see how he had it fixed, Mr. Greene. We were all astonished at the facility with which he remembered, he pretending to know what parts he wrote and what parts Mr. Dorsey wrote. I want you to understand this man, and before I get through with him you will. I want you to know him.

Now, we come to an exceedingly important thing in this case, in the eyes of the prosecution. It is the principal pillar supporting the testimony of Mr. Rerdell. Without that pillar absolutely nothing is left, everything falls into perjured ruin.

The first question that arises with regard to the pencil memorandum (31 X) is who wrote it, and in order to ascertain who wrote it we must take into consideration all the facts and circumstances that have been established in this case. It is already in evidence, as you remember it, that Rerdell kept a route-book in which were entered all the routes in which Dorsey had any interest, the number of the route, the names of the termini, the amount received by the contractor and the amount to be paid to the subcontractor; all that was upon that route-book. You will also remember that Mr. Dorsey had books of his own; that he had a book-keeper of his own, Mr. Kellogg; that Mr. Kellogg swears that he kept those books and that nobody else ever made a scratch of the pen in them; that he kept them up till the fall of 1879; they were then sent to New York; that Mr. Torrey took possession of those books on the 27th of January, 1880, and kept them continuously to the last of April, 1882, and that nobody else ever put a mark in them. That is the evidence. The evidence also is that there was in those books a complete mail account. The evidence is also that in those books kept by Mr. Kellogg were the charges and credits growing out of the purchase of John W. Dorsey's interest and Peck's interest in the mail routes.

Mr. MERRICK. Pardon me; point me to that evidence.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will, sir.

Mr. MERRICK. My impression is that the court excluded all evidence of what the books contained.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will find it before I get through.

Mr. MERRICK. I want to understand now, before we go further, if that is so.

The COURT. He has a right to interrupt you.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Certainly, and I have the right to say to him that I will furnish it to him before I get through. I do not propose to stop now and wait an hour to look that up.

The COURT. You made a statement as to what the evidence was.

Mr. INGERSOLL. And I will show what it is before I get through, but I want to go on now with the pencil memorandum.

Mr. MERRICK. I wish to ask the court at this time whether your honor did not exclude all evidence of the contents of any books not produced?

The COURT. There is no such evidence now before the jury, and this statement of the evidence I understand to be substantially retracted for the time, because Mr. Ingersoll says he will produce the evidence when he comes to it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. My recollection of the evidence—and I presume I will find a reference to it before I get through with this branch of the case—is that Mr. Kellogg swears that he was the book-keeper, kept the books, and that these identical charges or credits on the top of this memorandum appeared in those books. That is my recollection.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Or rather that he got instructions to enter them.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will refer to it hereafter.

The COURT. It passes for nothing for the present, then.

Mr. MERRICK. We will understand that it passes for nothing for the moment.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will find it. I do not wonder, gentlemen, that they dislike this pencil memorandum.

Mr. MERRICK. No, sir; I only want to keep you within correct limits.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I understand that. I do not blame anybody for disliking that pencil memorandum.

Mr. MERRICK. You can convict Rerdell as much as you like.

Mr. INGERSOLL. When you come to show that he is guilty his countenance will light up with the transfiguration of joy. There will be no more delighted auditor than Mr. Rerdell when his crimes are painted blackest. It shows you the moral nature of the man.

Now, as I say, the evidence is that there was a route-book kept; that that route-book contained all the information that Mr. Dorsey or any one else would want about the routes themselves; consequently, that there was no propriety in keeping any other set of books. Mr. Rerdell could keep books for himself, but not for S. W. Dorsey. Dorsey had a set of books, and had another book-keeper. Why should he have another set opened by Rerdell? Rerdell kept a route-book that gave him all the information that he could possibly desire.

Mr. WILSON. Rerdell did not handle the money.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Of course not ; there was no money at that time to handle ; they had not got as far as the handle.

Now, there is another little point : Why should Dorsey voluntarily put himself in the power of Rerdell by saying, "I have paid money to Brady?" What was the necessity of it? What was the sense of it? Rerdell was his clerk. Why should he take pains to put himself, the employer, absolutely in the power of his clerk? Why should he take pains to make himself the slave of the man he was hiring by the month? Why did he wish not only to make Mr. Rerdell acquainted with his crime, but to put in the hands of Rerdell evidence written by himself? See, gentlemen, you have got to look at everything from a natural stand-point. Of what use was it to Mr. Dorsey to keep that account? Dorsey at that time had no partner. Dorsey at that time did not have to respond to anybody. Of what use was it to him to put down in a book "I paid Brady $18,000?" Was he afraid Brady would forget it? Was he afraid he would forget it? Did he want his clerk to help him keep the secret, knowing that if the secret got wings it would render him infamous? Let us have some sense. The Government introduced it. They also introduced a witness to prove that it was in Dorsey's writing. Rerdell swore that it was. Their next witness, Boone, thought part of it might be and part might not be; it did not look right to him; he rather intimated that Mr. Rerdell wrote part of it. And right there the Government dropped. No expert was brought. There were plenty of experts right over here at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, plenty of experts in Philadelphia and New York, plenty of judges of handwriting. Right up here in Congress were twenty or thirty Senators who sat for six years in the Senate with Stephen W. Dorsey, served on the same committees with him and had seen him write every day; clerks of those committees who had copied page after page of his writing. Not one of them was called. The Government, with its almost infinite power, with everything at its command, brought no expert. That was the most important piece of paper in their case. And yet they allowed their own witness to discredit it; their own witness swore, in fact, that Rerdell had manufactured the incriminating part of it. And yet they sent for no expert to swear to this writing. Don't you believe that they talked with somebody? Has not each one of you in his mind a reason why they did not bring the ones that they talked with. They left it right there without another word. Now, why? Simply because they could get no man to swear, except Rerdell, that this is in the handwriting of S. W. Dorsey. That is the reason.

You know that Rerdell "kept this as a voucher." What for? Was any money paid out on it? No. Was it a receipt for any money? No. But he "kept it as a voucher." You see he was in a difficulty. How did he come to keep it all this time? It would hardly do for him to say that he did not try to keep it, that it had just been in the waste-basket of forgetfulness, and had suddenly come to life by a conspiracy of chance and awkwardness. It would not do for him to say that he made it. So that he had to say that he kept it, and then he had to give a reason for keeping it. What was the reason? He said he "kept it for a voucher." I suppose you [addressing Mr. Greene, a juror] have kept books. Is that what you would call a voucher? Yet that is the reason the poor man had to give. I pitied the man when he got to the point. I am of such a nature that I cannot entirely, absolutely, and perfectly hate anybody, and when I see the worst man in trouble I do not enjoy it much; at least I am soon satisfied, and would like to see him out of it. Here he was swearing that he had this for a voucher.

Now, there are some little things about this to which I will call your attention. Here is the name of J. H. Mitchell. An account was opened with Mitchell, but he does not tell him to charge Mitchell with anything; there is nothing opposite Mitchell's name. How would he open an account with Mitchell without anything to be charged against him or to be credited? He put in the index of the book, "J. H. Mitchell, page 21." You turn over to page 21, and you find Mitchell debtor to nothing, creditor the same—silence. [Laughter.] Not a cent opposite the name on either side. Mitchell was not an employé. Mitchell was not a fellow that they were to have an account with by the day. Then John Smith is rubbed out and Samuel Jones written under it. Rerdell says he wrote Samuel Jones. I say he did not. I want you to look at it after awhile and see whether he wrote it or not.

Now, gentlemen, it so happened that when this pencil memorandum was introduced it struck me that the M. C. R. looked a great deal like Rerdell's handwriting, and you will remember that I suggested it instantly, and said to the jury, "Look at the M. C. R." Now, gentlemen of the jury, I want you to look at that M. C. R.; I want you to see how the first line of the M is brought around to the middle of the letter, and then I want you to see exactly how the C and the R are made. Take it, Mr. Foreman, and look at it carefully. And, in connection with that pencil memorandum (31 X), I will ask the jury also to look at this settlement with John W. Dorsey, made in 1879 (87 X), and compare the initials M. C. R. where they occur on both papers. M. C. R. occurs twice, I believe, on this 87 X. Now look at the formation of the M. C. R. on both papers, Mr. Lowery, and do a good job of looking, too. [The two papers were exhibited to the jurors, Mr. Ingersoll calling attention to the similarity on the two papers of the initials M. C. R.]

The COURT. Let me look at the papers.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes, sir; I will show them to you. [The papers were then handed to the court.]

Now, gentlemen, this is one of the most valuable pieces of paper I have ever had in this case, and it is as good luck as ever happened. I want you to look at the J. W. D. on that paper, and then compare it with the J. W. D. on this paper; you cannot spend your time better.

I did not suppose I would ever find one paper that would have everything on it. But, as if there had been a conspiracy as to this paper, there is an S. W. D. on this paper which is substantially the same as the S. W. D. on the other. The M. C. R., the S. W. D., and the J. W. D. on both these papers are all substantially the same, and I think when the jury have looked at it they will say they were written by the same hand. Before I get through with this branch of the case I shall probably show you some more papers on the same subject.

Now, gentlemen, there was the testimony of Mr. Boone that he thinks the upper portion of this pencil memorandum (31 X) was written by S. W. Dorsey; that it looks like his handwriting down to and including "profit and loss," I believe; I may be mistaken; it may be down to "cash;" and then after "profit and loss" come the names of J. H. Mitchell and J. W. D., exactly the same J. W. D. that appears on 87 X.

Now, what paper is that 87 X? That is an account of John W. Dorsey against S. W. Dorsey in 1879. He had been out West to take care of some of the routes, and when he came back he settled, and Mr. Rerdell wrote up the account. That is 87 X, and I proved that it was made in 1879. I believe the prosecution thought at first that it was 1878.

The COURT. Is that paper in evidence?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes, sir.

The COURT. How did it get in?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I introduced it when John W. Dorsey was on the stand, and proved that he settled by no book; that he just came here and had some little memoranda, and he and Rerdell made out and settled that account.

Mr. BLISS. I objected to its introduction at first, and then withdrew my objection.

Mr. INGERSOLL. They imagined at first that it was in 1878, but Mr. John W. Dorsey swore that the settlement was in 1879. That paper shows that it was manufactured by the one who wrote this paper, and by nobody else.

Now, as I said before, there is no account against J. H. Mitchell. Opposite William Smith there are the figures 18,000. And Rerdell says that he wrote Samuel Jones himself at the suggestion of Mr. Dorsey. Again I ask you, gentlemen, why would Mr. Dorsey give such a paper to Rerdell? Why would he give him this false name? Why would he put himself in his power? It is very natural that he should give the amounts $10,500, $10,000 for John W. Dorsey and $10,000 for Peck, because the evidence shows that those transactions actually occurred. The evidence shows, not only in one place but in many, that the $10,000 was paid to John W. Dorsey, the $10,000 was paid to Peck, and that the $10,500 was advanced at that time by S. W. Dorsey. Consequently that is natural; it is proper. But my opinion is that he never wrote one word, one line of the pencil memorandum. It was all made, every mark upon it, by Mr. Rerdell. He is the man that made it. Did he have it when he went to MacVeagh? No, sir. Did he have it when he went to the Postmaster-General? No. Did he have it when he went to Woodward? No. Did he have it when he made his affidavit in July, 1882? No; or he would not have made it. Did he have it when he went to Mr. Woodward in September? No; or else Mr. Woodward would have taken the stand and sworn to it. Did he have it when he made his affidavit in November? I say no. Who made it? Rerdell manufactured it for this purpose: That he might have something to dispose of to this Government; that he might have something to swap for immunity. He "kept it as a voucher."

Why did not these gentlemen bring Senator Mitchell to show that he had some account with Senator Dorsey in May, 1879? Why did not the Government bring Mr. Mitchell? They knew that their witness had to be corroborated. They knew that the law distinctly says that such a witness cannot be believed unless he is corroborated. They also know that the law is that unless such a witness is wholly corroborated he cannot be believed; that you are not allowed to pick the raisins of truth out of the pudding of his perjury. You must believe him all or not at all. He must be received entire by the jury, or with the foot of indignation he must be kicked from the threshold of belief. They know it. Why did they not bring Senator Mitchell to show that he had some account with S. W. Dorsey in 1879? But we heard not a word from them.

What more? Rerdell says that was either in April, before he went West, or in May, after his return; and at that time, according to his testimony—that is, according to this memorandum—$18,000 had been paid to Mr. Brady for expedition. And then following, in the month of June, before the quarter ended, $18,000 more. That makes $36,000 paid to Brady. What else? $10,000 to John W. Dorsey; $46,000 that makes. $10,000 paid to Peck; $56,000 that makes. He had also advanced himself $10,500; that makes $66,500 advanced, and not a dollar yet received from the Government. And that by a man who gave away 70 per cent. of a magnificent conspiracy because he had not the money to go on. All you have to do is to think about this. Just think of the situation of the parties at the time. I tell you I am going to stick to this subject until you understand it.

Mr. Gibbs swears that the name of Mitchell was not in the books when he saw them, and yet those books were opened from this memorandum. Gibbs is the man who has such a control over his mind that he can "try not to remember." When I was a boy I used to hear a story of a man going around saying that nobody could control his mind for a minute; that nobody could think of one thing for a minute without thinking of something else. But there was one fellow who said, "I can; I can think of a thing a minute and not think of anything else." He was told, "If you do it, I will give you my horse, and he is the best riding-horse in the country; if you can say the first verse of "Mary had a little lamb," and not think of anything else, I will give you my horse, and he is the best riding-horse in the country." The fellow says, "How will you tell?" "Oh, I will take your word for it." So the fellow shut up his eyes and said:

Mary had a little lamb,
Its fleece was white as snow,
And everywhere that—

"I suppose you will throw in the saddle and bridle?" [Laughter.]

Mr. Gibbs is the man who had such control of his mind, and he tells you that the name of J. H. Mitchell was not in the book.

Mr. BLISS. I do not think he says so.

Mr. INGERSOLL. He said "I do not remember it."

Mr. BLISS. Ah, that is another thing. He says he does not remember seeing it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. You wait until I get to your speech.

Mr. BLISS. You are at liberty to attack my speech, but do not misrepresent the evidence.

The COURT. There must be order in the court-room, or I will clear out the whole crowd. I see one man there [pointing] who is continually laughing, and another here making a noise, and I will point them out distinctly if it is repeated.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Now, Mr. Gibbs says that he does not remember of any such name in the book as J. H. Mitchell; Mr. Donnelly says he does not remember any such name as J. H. Mitchell, and yet he holds an office. He has the poorest memory for any one under the present Administration I ever saw. He does not remember the name of J. H. Mitchell. Who does remember it? Mr. Rerdell. But Mr. Rerdell does not say what he had charged to J. H. Mitchell; he does not say what was in the book as against J. H. Mitchell; he fights clear of that charge. And why? He was afraid that John H. Mitchell might testify. According, I think, to Mr. Rerdell, there was a charge against Belford on those books. I do not know why Belford's name did not appear on the memorandum, but I will come to Belford afterwards.

Mr. BLISS. Mr. Ingersoll, Mr. Donnelly does not mention in any way and is not asked on the subject of Mr. Mitchell.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I think he is.

Mr. BLISS. I have the evidence before me, and I have not found it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do not care which side you have the evidence upon. I will find it after awhile if I can, and if I cannot I will admit that you are right. I do not know where it is.

Mr. BLISS. Mr. Donnelly's evidence is at page——

Mr. INGERSOLL. [Interposing.] I do not wish to be interrupted.

Mr. BLISS. I claim the right.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do not wish to be interrupted.

Mr. BLISS. Your honor——

Mr. INGERSOLL. [Interposing.] You are to have the close, gentlemen.

Mr. BLISS. I claim the right.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Well, go on; the poor man only had seven days in which to make his speech.

Mr. BLISS. I have before me Mr. Donnelly's evidence, and he does not mention the name of Mitchell in any manner, and is not asked about it, so far as I can see. I think when the statement is persisted in there should be some reference given to the page.

The COURT. Yes; only counsel of course cannot always bear in mind the exact amount or character of evidence; but when he is challenged as to any statement in regard to the evidence the burden is on him to show the evidence.

Mr. MERRICK. As a matter of course, and there will be no interruption whatever not made in perfect good faith.

Mr. BLISS. I made no interruption until after I had turned to the testimony in order to be sure.

Mr. CARPENTER. He is asked what accounts there are, and he undertakes to tell.

Mr. INGERSOLL. It is on page 2637.

Q. Whose name?—

That is, whose name was on those books?

A. Mr. Dorsey's——

Q. [Interposing.] What Dorsey?—A. S. W. Dorsey, Mr. Rerdell, an account called mail account, an account called expense account, several accounts of the kind.

Q. Name over some more accounts—A. There was a profit and a loss account.

Q. Name over some more.—A. There was a William Smith account.

Q. Name another one.—A. J. W. Dorsey; there was an account of my own.

Q. Any Joneses in there?—A. I can't remember; I don't remember any Jones.

Q. Did you ever keep those books?—A. I did.

Mr. DAVIDGE. And at page 2639, about two inches from the top.

Mr. INGERSOLL. [Reading:]

Q. Be kind enough to give all the names of accounts that you can that were on that book.—A. There was mail account, profit and loss account, S. W. Dorsey's account, J. W. Dorsey's account, my own account, Mr. Rerdell's account, William Smith account, interest account; I think there was some small interest account.

Q. What other names?—A. That I don't remember; I remember these names, Dorsey's and my own and the Smith account, but I don't remember any others.

Now, I stated that Donnelly did not remember (and said he did not) the account of J. H. Mitchell. He says here that he has all the accounts, and that name is not included, and distinctly swears that he does not remember any other account. Now, let us see what next:

Q. You do not recollect any more?—A. No, sir.

Now, I think I was certainly justified in saying that Donnelly remembers no J. H. Mitchell account.

Mr. MERRICK. Mr. Ingersoll, from your statement that he said he did not recollect the J. H. Mitchell account, you left the impression that he had been interrogated.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes, and that was my recollection, that I had asked him. I know that I asked somebody, and I thought I asked Gibbs. Let me on with this; may be I will find more than I thought:

Q. Was there any account there against James B. Belford?—A. No, sir.

Q. Any account against James N. Tyner?—A. No, sir.

Q. Any against A. M. Gibson?—A. No, sir.

Q. Any against Fred. Lilley?—A. No, sir; I think not.

Q. Any against James McGrew?—A. No, sir.

Q. Was there any account in the name of J. B. B.?—A. No, sir.

It shows how easily we are mistaken. I was absolutely certain that I asked that man that question, "Was there any J. H. Mitchell account?" Well, gentlemen, it is sufficient for my purpose, which is this: That he gave the names of all the accounts he could remember, and in that list of names he did not give the name of J. H. Mitchell. So I think I can fairly say to you that that man did not remember any account against J. H. Mitchell. Mr. Gibbs was asked directly whether there was any account against J. H. Mitchell, and he did not remember any such. Now, the only person that swears to it at all is Mr. Rerdell. Then you come across this contradiction: Why should the name of J. H. Mitchell be there with nothing opposite to it? I do not know. The prosecution, of course, will be able to find writing of S. W. Dorsey that will resemble some of the writing on this pencil memorandum. There is no doubt about that. If it was written by Rerdell in imitation of Dorsey's writing, it is not surprising that writing really written by Dorsey can be found that looks like it. Why? Because it was written in imitation of his writing, and therefore you can find writing of Dorsey's that looks like it; otherwise it would not be an imitation. The next question arises, Can you find writing of Rerdell's that looks like it? Yes; 87 X. The M. C. R., the S. W. D., and the J. W. D. are all exactly like it. Now, is it not infinitely surprising that Dorsey should imitate Rerdell without trying and without an object? Is it not perfectly wonderful that this memorandum should be in imitation of Rerdell's writing, when it was written by Dorsey? But if it was forged by Rerdell, it is not wonderful that it looks like Dorsey's writing. If Dorsey wrote it without thinking of Rerdell, I say the accident is infinitely wonderful that he imitated Rerdell. Which is the more probable—that Dorsey imitated Rerdell without design and without trying, or that Rerdell imitated Dorsey with a design, and when trying to do so? That is the way to put this argument, and I hope the gentlemen will answer it. The ingenuity that would be displayed in the answer would a thousand times pay me for the loss of the point. I want them to account for this, how Dorsey's natural handwriting comes to look like Rerdell's, and how it is that this looks precisely like Rerdell's in many instances. Why is it, gentlemen? I will tell you. Mr. Rerdell had written the initials J. W. D., S. W. D., and M. C. R. so often that when he came to put them upon this memorandum he forgot to disguise his hand. That is the reason. You find on 87 X the J. W. D. precisely as it is on the pencil memorandum. You find the M. C. R. precisely as it is on the pencil memorandum. You see if you have done the same thing many times with your hand, the hand gets a mind of its own. It is in that way that you learn to play upon the piano. The hand becomes educated and follows the keys through all the mazes of melody without asking one question of the mind. You can write a name so often, you can make initials so often, that when you come to write them, no matter what your object is, the hand, educated with a mind of its own, pursues the old accustomed motions and paths. That is the reason that J. W. D. and S. W. D. and M. C. R. are exactly in the handwriting of Rerdell in this pencil memorandum. According to that, Dorsey had paid out in all, I think, about $65,000, or something like that. There is no truth in it, gentlemen.

Now, in order to prepare your mind for the next point I am going to make, and in order that you may know something about this man Rerdell, I will give you some further information about him. I do not think you are sufficiently acquainted with his character, and any little points that I have I want to give to you. I want to paint his portrait in every lineament, every mark. I want to give you every hair in his head. Remember that this witness is to be corroborated. He is to be propped and indorsed. Everybody admits that he is the pewter of perjury and has to be plated with the silver of respectability gotten from somebody else. They all admit that. He is an empty bag. Somebody has to fill him up before he can stand upright. They admit that. I want to call your attention to a few things as to which he lacked corroboration.

On page 2215 Rerdell swears that Miner told him that the amounts in the bids were filled in by S. W. Dorsey. On page 4177 Miner denies this, and says that he filled in the bids with only two exceptions.

On page 2216 Rerdell swears that the mail matter for J. W. Dorsey, Peck, and Miner was handed him by S. W. Dorsey, and that Dorsey said that he was going to take the business out of Boone's hands. On page 3766 Dorsey swears that he had no such conversation with Rerdell.

On page 2217 Rerdell swears that S. W. Dorsey applied to him to go West. On page 3768 Dorsey swears that he did not employ him to go West.

On page 2218 Rerdell swears that he received instructions from S. W. Dorsey as to what to do on the Bismarck route. On page 3769 S. W. Dorsey swears that that is utterly untrue.

On page 2219 Rerdell says that he was instructed to establish a paper post-office sixty miles north of the route. What was that for? According to his testimony there was a mistake in the advertisement, and the route was too long, and this was a device to shorten it by adding sixty miles to it to make a post-office thirty miles off the route, or sixty altogether, so as to get pay for the increase of distance. If it was to be a fraud, why put the post-office off the route? Why not have it on the route? Where would the fraud be if they traveled the sixty miles except in having a post-office where none was needed? They certainly would make nothing from the Government by traveling the sixty miles. If they traveled the sixty miles they would be paid for that sixty miles, but if they wanted pay for the sixty miles without traveling that sixty miles, they would not have put the post-office so far off the route. They would have put it on the route, or very near to it, and pretended that it was off the route.

Gentlemen, it is infinitely absurd to suppose that Stephen W. Dorsey would have instructed that man to go out in that country and get up a false post-office. How long would a fraud like that last and live? How long could the money be drawn for that service in that country? They say no human being lived there. Who was to be postmaster? Who was to make the reports? How long, in your judgment, would it be before the department would find out that there was no such post-office, no postmaster, and no mail? No one could think of a more shallow device than that. Stephen W. Dorsey, a man who is blest with as much brain as any man it is my pleasure to know, would never dream of such an idiotic device. And yet, that is the testimony of Mr. Rerdell.

It may be that Mr. Rerdell when he got out there thought he could start a town and make money in some other way. But it will not do to say that Stephen W. Dorsey told him to get up a false and fraudulent post-office when Mr. Dorsey must have known that the mail could not have been carried to it but a few days before it would have become known that there was no such office. They would have to appoint a postmaster and he would have to live there in his loneliness a hermit of the plain, and would have to make a report like that from Agate that gave such delight to Mr. Bliss, to read. There was not a letter sent to that place; not one, nor would there be. Mr. Dorsey knew if there was a postmaster appointed he would have to report, and in three months from that time he would have to report, first, that there was no post-office; second, that there had never been any mail; and third, that he did not expect any. You see it is utterly absurd to lay such a charge at the door of Stephen W. Dorsey.

On page 3769 Dorsey swears that the statement is a falsehood—that he never did any such thing. He also denies it on page 3924.

On page 2220 Rerdell swears that he gave Pennell a petition for a post-office. On page 2156 Joseph Pennell swears that he never saw the petition; and on page 2171 that he never signed it, and that none was sent.

On page 2221 Rerdell swears that he was instructed by S. W. Dorsey to build stations fifteen or sixteen miles apart, and use every third station. On page 3769 S. W. Dorsey swears that no such instructions were given. On page 4092 J. W. Dorsey swears that they started to build the stations about thirty miles apart, and that after he saw General Miles and was told by that officer that there would be, and must be a daily mail, then he concluded to build stations between the stations that he had built going over.

That is a sensible, straight story. When he went out they built the stations some thirty-odd miles apart, and when he talked with General Miles, General Miles told him that there must be a daily service, and then he determined to build intermediate stations as he went back. What was that testimony sworn to by Rerdell for? To make you believe, gentlemen, that Stephen W. Dorsey when he sent Rerdell out knew that there was to be expedition, and knew it because he was in conspiracy with the Second Assistant Postmaster-General. The testimony of John W. Dorsey lets the light in upon that story. The sun rises, and the mist goes. What is his story? "I went there and built the stations about thirty miles apart, and when I talked with General Miles he assured me that there must be expedition and a daily mail, and then I built stations at the intermediate points as we went back." That is the story. It is consistent with itself.

Is it not wonderful that the Government did not also prove by Pennell that Rerdell gave him instructions to build the ranches, and told him that he had been so instructed by S. W. Dorsey?

On page 2233 Rerdell swears that Miner told him that Vaile was close to Brady. On page 4177, Miner swears that it is not true; that he never had any such conversation. Why did they want a man close to Brady? As I explained to you before, gentlemen, they had already, according to their testimony, as they claim, proved that Miner had conspired with Brady, and yet he was going around trying to find a man close to Brady. Being a coconspirator was not close enough. So Mr. Rerdell is corroborated there again by Mr. Miner who swears that what Rerdell swears is a lie.

On page 2224 Rerdell swears that in November, 1878, Miner asked him to write certain words in a line on petition 40104. On page 4178, Miner swears that he never asked him to interline any petition.

On page 2225 Rerdell swears he had a conversation with Vaile and Miner on the 20th of December, 1878, at the National Hotel about his employment, and that he had a great many conversations there. On page 4020, Vaile swears that there never was any such conversation. On page 4021, Vaile also swears that he has no recollection of such a conversation then or at any time. On page 4178, Miner swears that the talk was between Rerdell and himself, and that Vaile was not there.

On page 2225 Rerdell swears that Vaile told him that the mail service they had ought to reach $600,000 or $700,000. On page 4021, Vaile swears that he does not think he ever said any such thing—does not think it was possible that he ever said any such thing. On page 4179 Miner swears that Vaile never made any such statement in his presence.

On page 2226 Rerdell swears that at the instance of Vaile and Miner he went West January 4, 1879, to put service on the Rawlins route. On 4022 Vaile swears that Rerdell did not go West at his instance; that Miner gave him, Rerdell, a subcontract for the entire pay, for the whole term, and that Rerdell undertook it on his own behalf. On 4179 Miner swears that he made the arrangements with Rerdell himself.

On page 2227 Rerdell says that Vaile and Miner both told him that the service would be increased right away, and to make subcontracts with that in view. On page 4180 Miner swears that he gave him no such directions, and that Rerdell did all he did on his own responsibility, and that Vaile did not give him any such authority. It is for you to say, gentlemen, which of these men you will believe.

On page 2228 Rerdell swears that in March, 1879, he had a conversation with Vaile about an affidavit, and received instructions from Vaile or Miner. On page 4024 Vaile swears that he recollects no such conversation and does not think he ever had it.

On page 2228 Rerdell swears that Vaile said in the presence of Miner that he could get Brady to accept an affidavit from a subcontractor. On page 4024 Vaile swears that he is very sure that he did not say so, and that he never asked Brady any such question. On page 4182 Miner swears that he never made any such statement in Vaile's presence.

On page 2228 Rerdell swears that a day or two after Vaile says he had seen Brady, and that Brady had agreed to accept an affidavit from a subcontractor. On page 4024 Vaile denies this.

On the same page, 2228, Rerdell swears that he was instructed by Vaile and Miner to write to Perkins and get him to send his affidavit. On page 4024 Vaile swears, "Never!"—that he did not know Perkins was a subcontractor. On page 4182 Miner swears that he has no recollection of it, and that he never instructed Rerdell to send any form of affidavit to Mr. Perkins.

On page 2230 Rerdell swears that Miner wrote a form of affidavit. On page 4182 Miner swears that he has no recollection of it, and that he never instructed Rerdell to send any form to Perkins. As a matter of fact the Perkins affidavit is in the handwriting of Rerdell. Yet he tells you that Miner wrote the form. It will not do.

On page 2231 Rerdell swears that he filled in blanks under the direction of S. W. Dorsey—that is, of the Perkins affidavit—and filed it under the direction of S. W. Dorsey. On page 3793 Dorsey swears that he never knew there was such an affidavit, and that he never gave such instructions; and more than that, that he never at any time or place gave Rerdell authority to change any affidavit or any petition that was to be filed.

On page 2233 Rerdell swears he was instructed to make the subcontract without any reference to expedition, and that he, Dorsey, would guarantee the payments if they were not filed. On page 3771 S. W. Dorsey swears that he gave him no such instructions.

On page 2234 Rerdell swears that affidavits of Peck and Dorsey were acknowledged in blank. On page 4189 Miner swears that so far as he remembers they were filled in before they were signed.

Again, it may be proper for me to say here: Why did not the Government call J. S. Taylor, the notary of New Mexico, to prove that the affidavits were in blank when they were sworn to by John M. Peck? Why did they not? The law presumes that every officer has done his duty, and when we find at the foot of an affidavit the certificate of a notary public the law presumes that the paper above it was in the precise condition at the time the certificate was placed there in which it is then. That is the presumption of law, and there is only one way to overcome that presumption. You must prove to the contrary. One of the easiest ways on earth to do that is to bring the officer. They did not bring J. S. Taylor here from New Mexico, the man before whom Peck acknowledged the affidavit in this case. It would have been easy to have him come, and to have asked him whether Peck did not swear to all these affidavits in blank. They did not call him. They had him here once and that was enough. They did not call him this time. They did not call Rufus Wainwright, of Middlebury, Vermont. He is the officer before whom John W. Dorsey swore to these affidavits. The gentlemen of the prosecution say the affidavits were in blank, and yet they dared not put upon the stand the notary before whom they were sworn to. It was not because they did not think of it. It was not because they had not the money. The Government had money by the million and agents by the thousand. You recollect how they tried to prove the destruction of those dispatches in the Western Union office. You recollect how they brought here the superintendent, how they brought here agent after agent, how they brought here the man that went around and collected the dispatches, and the man that drove the wagon and the man that owned the wagon, and the boys that received the dispatches on the street, and the man in the cellar that received them after they got there, and the man that bought them, and the book-keeper that made out the check to pay for them. They brought the man that receipted for them at the railroad, and they followed them from the railroad to Holyoke, Massachusetts, and brought the superintendent of the factory and the books of the railroad to show they had arrived. They followed those dispatches from paper to pulp and yet it never occurred to them to send to Middlebury and get Rufus Wainwright. They never thought to have J. S. Taylor subpoenaed from New Mexico. They had all the conveniences of modern civilization at their command and yet they never thought of getting Wainwright or Taylor.

On page 3771 S. W. Dorsey swears that he never instructed Rerdell to get any affidavits in blank. On pages 4126, and 4107, J. W. Dorsey swears that he made none in blank; that he has no recollection of any such thing. On page 2240, Rerdell swears that he had a conversation with S. W. Dorsey about getting blank affidavits. On page 3771 S. W. Dorsey denies it. On page 2241 Rerdell swears that S. W. Dorsey instructed him to make up the affidavit on route 41119 and gave him the per cent. of the increase of pay. What does he say there? From 150 to 200 per cent.

Mr. MERRICK. That was afterwards corrected.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I thank you for the suggestion. That happened on Friday. We adjourned until the next Monday morning. He came in the next Monday morning, and he said that he had made a mistake, and that it ought to be from 150 to 250 per cent. I immediately went and got the affidavit on the Toquerville route, because I said the percentage must be over 200 per cent. in that affidavit or he would not have changed. I found in the affidavit that it was 255 per cent., and I found that was why he changed. I followed that out, and I found that was the same route upon which Mr. Rerdell stole nearly $5,000, according to the testimony of S. W. Dorsey, and Rerdell did not deny it. So much for Toquerville and Adairville. We will come to it again perhaps.

Let me give the pages where all these matters are found. On page 3772 Dorsey denies the conversation about the affidavits, and also on page 3773. Rerdell's change of his evidence will be found on page 2277.

Now if the court will take a recess I will be glad.

At this point (1.05 o'clock p. m.) the court took its usual recess.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Allow me to say, gentlemen, before I proceed, that I admit that I have shown a little impatience at being interrupted or at having any suggestions made. I think I have been wrong, and hereafter if any page is wanted, or if the gentlemen want any information, and will ask me, I will give it to them with pleasure.

I believe when I spoke of the pencil memorandum that I stated that there was some testimony to the effect that the figures in the first part, $10,000 to S. W. Dorsey, $10,000 to John W. Dorsey, and $10,000 to Mr. Peck, were Mr. Dorsey's figures. There was some evidence of that. Mr. Merrick, I think, at that time thought it was stricken out. I read from page 3704:

Q. Did you ever give any directions to M. C. Rerdell, in writing or verbally, to open any account or accounts with William Smith on any book?—A. Never in the world.

Q. Did you ever give M. C. Rerdell, in writing or verbally, any instructions to open any account in your behalf with Sam'l Jones?—A. Never.

Q. Did you ever give him any instructions to open any account for you with John H. Mitchell?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did you ever state to M. C. Rerdell or to anybody that William Smith on your books stood for Thomas J. Brady?—A. In the first place, there is no William Smith on my books; and in the next place, I did not state it.

Mr. MERRICK. I object to his stating what is on his books, and move that it be stricken out.

The WITNESS. I never did.

Mr. MERRICK. I move that the answer be stricken out.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I object to its being stricken out.

The COURT. It can stand. The evidence does not prove what is on his books, because he declares that there is no such thing on his books.

Q. When did you first hear that it was alleged by anybody that you had any account with William Smith and Samuel Jones, or with William Smith or Samuel Jones, on any books that had been kept by you or for you?

That was objected to. Then I repeated the question, and Mr. Merrick stated his objection, and then:

The COURT. [To the witness.] You can answer that.

A. It never came to my knowledge except through what Rerdell had stated to James and MacVeagh. That is the first information that I had on the subject that there were any such books ever thought of in the world. And I believe Rerdell himself told Mr. Bosler and myself about the thing at that time. I believe that is the first time I ever heard of it. I never had any knowledge of it, unless you call Rerdell's statements knowledge.

Now, on page 3775 :

Q. Will you just state what instructions you gave to Mr. Kellogg as to entering the $10,500?—A. After I had given him the memorandum which had been made up by adding the interest on to $9,780—I think that was the amount, but I am not certain as to the particular amount—I told him to enter on the book the exact amount of money——

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] I object.

A. [Continuing.] I gave him directions——

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] I submit that the directions he gave to Wilbur F. Kellogg are not competent evidence.

The COURT. They relate to that paper.

Now I will turn to page 3776, which is the next page. A discussion ensued and the court said :

Yes ; you may ask the question.

Q. Did you give any instructions to your book-keeper as to deducting the interest from the first amount?—A. I instructed Mr. Kellogg to deduct the interest, which made up the $10,500, and left a balance, as I said, of about $9 700, I think. I know the whole amount I gave to J. W. Dorsey, $10,000, and the $10,000 I paid to Peck, and the $9,000 and something made up an aggregate of about $29,000 or $30,000, I don't know which ; and that entry was made on the 16th of May——

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] You cannot speak of that.

The COURT. No.

Q. Ordered to be made?—A. Ordered to be made.

That is the evidence, as I understand it, upon that point.

I will now go on with the corroboration of Mr. Rerdell.

On page 2243 Rerdell swears that while he was in jail S. W. Dorsey had a key to what he called his, Rerdell's, office. On page 3735 S. W. Dorsey swears that he never had a key to Rerdell's office, and that he never was in the office but twice, both times with Rerdell, and that he never took a paper out of the office except what Rerdell gave him. It will also be remembered that when Rerdell was asked in his examination-in-chief whether anybody had a key to his office he replied that S. W. Dorsey had a key to his office. He did not at that time state that his wife had a key. Why? Because he wanted it understood that S. W. Dorsey was the only person that had a key, and that S. W. Dorsey, while Rerdell was in jail, went to that office and opened it and robbed it. On cross-examination I made him swear that his wife had a key, and we afterwards found that his wife went there. He knew she had a key. Still, in his cross-examination, when asked who had a key, he said S. W. Dorsey. What was that for, gentlemen? So that you would infer that S. W. Dorsey was the only person who had a key, and that he went there and robbed that office, as I said before. On pages 2634 and 2635 Mrs. Cushman swears that she went to Rerdell's office with Mrs. Rerdell. When? About 6 o'clock in the morning. And that they found the office open? No. They found the office locked, but found papers in a confused condition, and took away some papers. They were there about fifteen minutes. Recollect this was the third morning that Rerdell was in jail. Rerdell went to jail Monday evening. That made the visit of Mrs. Cushman and Mrs. Rerdell on Thursday morning, and they went there at 6 o'clock. Keep that in mind. Rerdell got out of jail on Friday. George A. Calvert, the janitor, visited every room frequently. His testimony is on page 2672. He swears he found the door of Rerdell's room unlocked. When? The day before Rerdell got out of jail. What time of day? In the morning. What morning was that? Thursday morning. When did Rerdell get out of jail? Friday morning. When did Mrs. Rerdell and Mrs. Cushman visit the room? Thursday morning. What time in the morning? 6 o'clock. When did Calvert find the room open? That same morning. The women swear that when they went there the room was locked. Now the question arises, who opened it? The women. That is all there is to that.

Mrs. Rerdell, on page 2635, swears she got the key on the second day after Rerdell's incarceration, in the evening. That would be Wednesday evening. She used it the next morning, Thursday.

On page 2247 Rerdell swears that on the 20th of December, 1878, Vaile promised him a good salary. On page 4021 Vaile swears that he has no recollection of any such promise. That is what they call corroboration. On page 2348 Rerdell swears that in May, 1879, S. W. Dorsey said, "You know that John is a man of very little judgment. He does not know how to talk to these contractors." On page 3773 S. W. Dorsey swears that there never was any such conversation.

On page 2249 Rerdell swears, "As secretary and manager, I kept the books for a short time." On page 3636 W. F. Kellogg swears that he, Kellogg, had entire charge of Dorsey's books from the summer of 1872 to the fall of 1879, and that nobody else ever made a scratch of a pen in those books. On page 2270 Rerdell swears that Dorsey and Bosler were having a settlement in New York and sent for the books, and that he took the original books over and left them there, and that he went over to New York in June, 1881, and saw both books there and brought the journal over and left the ledger. On page 3955 Dorsey swears that the first settlement he had with Bosler was in December, 1879, or January, 1880. Rerdell swears that the time he got the copy made of his journal by the Gibbises, was between Christmas, 1879, and 1880. Dorsey swears there was not another settlement until November, 1882. The first settlement being in 1879, and Rerdell swearing that he took the books over for a settlement, show that he did not have them here in Washington to be copied at the time he says and at the time other people swear that they copied them.

On page 3788 S. W. Dorsey swears that he never sent for any transcript, and that he, Dorsey, referred to the route-book, and that Rerdell never sent any such book or books as he claimed. On page 2271 Rerdell swears that he gave copies of the journal to Dorsey in June, 1881. That was the time that he made the affidavit. His language by any natural interpretation means that he handed those copies over to Dorsey at the time he made the affidavit on the 20th of June, 1881. On page 3988 Dorsey swears that he did not, and on page 3785 he again swears that he never had them. On page 3784 he again swears that Rerdell never brought any book to him except the route-book. On page 2271 Rerdell swears that Dorsey, on the 13th of May, 1879, told him to make up a statement of the routes showing the profits, and that he thinks he gave it to Bosler. On page 3875 Dorsey swears that he never made up any such statement by his direction, and that he never gave Rerdell such an order. Why should he? According to Rerdell's own statement, in which there is not a particle of truth, Dorsey, on the 13th of May, 1879, that very day, had written a letter to Bosler, in which he told him about the profits, about how much it had cost him, and about how much it would cost him, and about how much the profits would be, and how much he paid to Brady. After writing such a letter to Bosler, containing all the facts, why would he want Rerdell to make up a statement that was already in the letter itself? Nobody can answer. There is not genius enough in this world to make the answer.

On page 2272 Rerdell swears that he saw 7 B, which is a petition, in 1879, and that there were three words in his own handwriting that were not there when he first saw it, the three words being "and faster time."

He also swears that he was instructed to put them in by S. W. Dorsey. I now say that Mr. Rerdell never wrote those three words. On page 783 it appears that 7 B was filed April 18, 1879. On page 3786 S. W. Dorsey swears that Rerdell's statement is false. I will now turn to the testimony of George Sears about the petition, 7 B, which Mr. Rerdell swears was altered by interlineation or the addition of three words "and faster time." The page is 829:

By Mr. BLISS:

Q. I exhibit to you the paper marked 7 B. Please look at this paper [submitting paper] and see if it bears your signature.—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You have seen it before, then?—A. Yes, sir; I have seen it before.

Q. Please look at that paper and see if the heading of it is in the same condition it was when you signed it?

Mr. Chandler then objects; Mr. Merrick makes a remark, Mr. Chandler makes another, Mr. Bliss another, Mr. Chandler another, and so it goes on. Finally:

By Mr. BLISS:

Q. [Resuming.] Can you say whether it is in the same condition now as when it was signed by you or not?—A. I think it is.

Mr. DAVIDGE. That is the end of that.

Mr. BLISS. Yes, it is. I evidently made a mistake as to the paper.

Q. [Resuming and submitting a paper to witness.] I will exhibit to you 12 B.

And so on. Now, we will go to page 831:

Q. Now, here is a petition that you say was not changed, which asks for faster time, does it not?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And the other you say asks for quicker time?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What is the difference between faster time and quicker time over the same route?

* * * * *

A. I do not see any difference.

* * * * *

Q. [Resuming.] You say you did sign this petition containing the words faster time?—A. I did.

Q. And you knew that that was in it when you signed it?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Will you swear whether or not the words quicker time were in the petition when you signed that?—A. I will swear that, to the best of my knowledge, when I read the petition after it was drawn up those words were not in it.

That is another petition. Then a little further down:

Q. That is then what the people did want—faster time?—A. The people wanted the mail to come in there at a more regular time.

Q. And they wanted quicker time; answer my question?—A. They wanted it in quicker time than it did come sometimes.

Q. And that is the reason these petitions were drawn up?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And that is the reason the words "faster time" were used in one of them?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Now, you designed those petitions to go before the Post-Office Department to be acted upon, did you?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You expected the Post-Office Department to be influenced by your petitions for this faster time?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You acted in perfect good faith, did you not?—A. I did.

Q. Did the necessities of the people require this expedition and increase of service, in your opinion, at the time you signed this paper?—A. They required—

And then comes a little discussion, and finally—

The object of wanting the mail on faster time was frequently talked of by the farmers for the following reasons: The mail-carrier was in the habit of coming in sometimes from two to three or four hours later than he would at other times, and the farmers who would come there for their mail, some of them having far to go, wanted the mail to arrive at some certain time. Under the old schedule he had until 11 o'clock in the night to get there, consequently they wanted him to get there at some fixed time, giving them time to get home and do their evening work.

Q. Now the old schedule permitted him to delay the coming until it was too late for them to return home?—A. Sometimes.

Q. The old schedule permitted him to do it all the time, did it not?—A. It did permit him, but he did not do it.

Q. But the schedule permitted him to do it?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. The old schedule was sixteen hours?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And they wanted a new schedule of eight hours so as to require him to be at this point at a time so it would be convenient for them to get their mail and go home after he arrived?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And that was the reason that they were interested in seeking this change, was it?—A. That was it.

Q. That was what was talked over among them?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. This petition was got up by the people generally there?—A. At the request of quite a good many there; yes, sir.

Q. The people generally took an interest in it?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You have testified in this case once before?—A. Yes, sir.

So much for that petition. Rerdell swears that he put in the words "and faster time." Here comes a witness of the Government, apparently a good and honest man, and he swears that the words "and faster time" were in that petition when he signed it. I will take his word for it. I will take his guess as against the other man's oath.

On page 2273 Rerdell swears that he altered 11 B and 12 B by instructions of S. W. Dorsey. Now, gentlemen, Stephen W. Dorsey got such a momentum of crime on him and got running at such a rate that he could not stop, and whenever a petition came in he had it altered without reading it. It did not make a bit of difference what the petition asked for. He just said to his clerk, "Look and see if there is not any line you can add something to. I want something put in it, and I want it put in now." Mr. Rerdell says he did these things without any thought. He just made the changes as he was told, without considering whether it was right or wrong. He told you here on the stand that at one time he was requested to get a petition, and he had a lot of names on hand, and so he just wrote a petition and stuck the names to it. He could not even remember the route it was on. It was a matter of so little importance that he did not charge his memory with it. He was told to get a petition in the regular way, and instead of doing that he said he took some names that he had and just wrote a petition and stuck the names on, because that was easier; and it was a matter of so little importance he really did not remember. He was like the gentleman in Texas who was tried for murder, but did not remember the name of the man he killed; he did not charge his mind with it.

Now for 11 B:

Hon. D. M. KEY, Postmaster-General:

We, the undersigned, citizens of the State of Colorado, residing near and getting our mail at Muddy Creek post-office, on route 38135, from Pueblo to Greenhorn, respectfully represent—that it is necessary that the service on said route should be increased from two trips per week to six trips per week, and a faster schedule. This section of the country is being rapidly settled by people of intelligence, and we ask the increased service for the benefit of us who have already made our homes here, and also as an inducement to others to settle. We also request that the schedule time be reduced so as to run from Pueblo to Greenhorn in eight hours, so that citizens along the route may get their mail at a seasonable hour.

I never noticed before that the "p" is interlined in the word "represent." I have no doubt that was done by order of Dorsey—

I have read the petition as it was in the first place. The Government tells you that after that petition came here, and after it had been submitted to Stephen W. Dorsey, he told his clerk to add in the first part of it the words "on quicker time;" and yet if he had read the last paragraph he would have seen quicker time was there called for. Rerdell says Stephen W. Dorsey told him to put in those three words, and yet the petition says:

We also request that the schedule time be reduced so as to run from Pueblo to Greenhorn in eight hours.

What was finally the schedule?

Mr. CARPENTER. Seven hours.

Mr. INGERSOLL. It asked for eight. Now, do you believe that Stephen W. Dorsey ever instructed a man to put in the words "on quicker time" when the very last paragraph asked to have a schedule of eight hours? No. If Mr. Rerdell put in those words he did it just because——

The FOREMAN (Mr. Crane). [Interposing.] The original time was twelve hours, was it not?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Sixteen hours, and they asked that it be reduced to eight. Rerdell says Dorsey told him to insert the words "on quicker time," and when I read that last paragraph to him he was stuck. Then what did he say? When he got into that little corner and was looking for a mouse-hole, he said he didn't read it and didn't know it was there. Do you believe that a man like Stephen W. Dorsey would deliberately have a petition changed, would deliberately forge a petition, without knowing what was in it and without knowing whether the necessity existed for changing it or not? That falsehood has not even a fig-leaf to cover its absurdity.

Here is 12 B. It would not have taken long to have read that. Rerdell said Dorsey had him put in the words "and a faster schedule." I will read the last paragraph to that:

We also respectfully request and urge that the running time be reduced so as to run from Pueblo to Greenhorn in eight hours, so that citizens along the line may get their mails in a seasonable hour.

He says Stephen W. Dorsey, a man of sense, got that petition, read it all over, and then told this fellow to put in "and a faster schedule" when right in the next paragraph it asked for eight hours. A man who will swear that way had rather tell a lie on ninety days' credit than tell the truth for cash. Just look at it. That is what they call a corroboration. The more you look at this testimony the more absurdities you find. Every truth has an infinite number of signs. Every truth has to fit an infinite number of things. Infinite wisdom could not manufacture a falsehood that would stand the test of investigation.

On page 2272 Rerdell says, speaking of the three petitions, 7 B, 11 B, and 12 B, "We," meaning S. W. Dorsey and himself, "had examined these petitions together, and he," meaning S. W. Dorsey, "told me to put in the clause for expedition." Now, 7 B was filed April 18. That is the day he left for the West. 11 and 12 B were filed on the 8th of May. If they had them all at one time together, and if he and Dorsey had talked about them, why were they not filed at the same time? Why was one filed April 18th and the other two on the 8th of May? That testimony of Rerdell's will not do.

On page 2279 Rerdell says that he found among Dorsey's papers the tabular statement about the middle of April, 1879. In the first column was the number of the route; in the second the termini; in the third the pay; in the fourth the anticipated pay by percentages, and in the fifth the percentage to T. J. B, 33½, with the figures carried out at the end of the column. He tells you that he had that tabular statement when he first went to MacVeagh. That tabular statement was in the handwriting of S. W. Dorsey. Yet the Attorney-General was not satisfied.

He wanted that backed up by a book not in the handwriting of S. W. Dorsey. That will not do. Rerdell also tells you that at the time he went to the Attorney-General he not only had that tabular statement, but he had a letter-press copy of the original letter that Dorsey wrote to Bosler on the 13th day of May, 1879. He had that letter, the original of which was in Dorsey's handwriting, in which he admitted he had paid Brady $20,000. He had the tabular statement in Dorsey's own handwriting in which he was to pay 33½ per cent. to Brady. Yet the Attorney-General did not think there was sufficient evidence, and said "You had better go to New York and steal a book that Dorsey never wrote a word in." Oh, no; that will not do.

On page 2280 Rerdell swears that he lost that memorandum. I guess he did. On page 3785 S. W. Dorsey swears that he never made any such memorandum. On page 2280 Rerdell swears that he employed Gibbs and wife to make a true and correct copy of the books in March, 1880; that he was directed by S. W. Dorsey to send him a true transcript of the books in order to settle with Bosler, and that Gibbs and wife copied the journal and ledger, and that he sent the copy to New York. On page 3788 Dorsey swears that he never heard of the employment of Gibbs and wife, and that he never received any such books or transcripts. On page 2644 Gibbs swears that his wife copied only the journal, not the ledger. Yet Rerdell swears that he copied the journal and the ledger. On page 2644 Gibbs again swears that Rerdell brought him one book. What color was it, red, brown, or black? Rerdell says he took him two red books. Gibbs swears he got one brown book or one black book. That is what they call corroboration. On page 2320 Rerdell swears, with regard to the paper 2 A, that the words "schedule thirteen hours" were written by Miner. If those words, "schedule thirteen hours," were not written by Rerdell, then—they were written by somebody else. [2 A handed to Mr. Ingersoll.] I guess this is the petition that was fixed up. It looks as if it had been to a hospital. Rerdell says Miner wrote the words "schedule thirteen hours." Just look at that word "thirteen," gentlemen. [Exhibiting petition to jury.]

Mr. MERRICK. Boone says so, too.

Mr. INGERSOLL. He said he was mistaken afterwards.

Mr. WILSON. He took it back subsequently.

Mr. MERRICK. He never did take it back.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I think he said it was in a disguised hand. You have no idea how it affects your imagination and brain to be indicted seven times. I have got here exactly what Boone did swear to. On page 2709 Boone swears with regard to this same paper and the same words, that there is nothing in the handwriting to indicate that it was written by Miner; that it is a back-hand; a changed handwriting. On page 4186 Miner swears that it is absolutely not true; that the words "schedule thirteen hours" are absolutely and positively not in his handwriting, and further that he never filed the petition. Gentlemen, evidence of handwriting is very unsatisfactory necessarily. Men do not always write the same. The same man does not always write the same hand. There is the difference of pen, the difference of ink, the difference of paper, the difference of position, and the difference, too, of the man's feelings. At one time he feels in splendid health and at another time he may be tired and worn out. The paper may not be in the same position. The slope of the desk may be different. Countless reasons change the handwriting of a person, and when a man swears that certain handwriting is or is not another's handwriting he must swear on the general appearance; he must swear on the impression that it first makes upon him. I know Mr. Smith and I know Mr. Jones, but it may be that I could not describe the differences in the faces of the two men so that a stranger could afterwards tell them. Yet I know them. It is the effect of all the features upon me. I cannot say it is because of the ear of one, or his nose, or his mouth. I know the combination. I remember the grouping of the features and the form, and that is all I remember. If I am shown a paper and asked "Is that Mr. Smith's handwriting," I say it is, or I say no. Why? Because it looks like it or it does not look like it. I cannot recognize it because an "e" is made in a certain way or because a "d" is turned in a certain way, because the next day he may turn it the other way. You have got to go upon the general impression. On page 2336 Rerdell swears that the oath on route 38140, marked 5 E, was filled in by S. W. Dorsey; that the word "twelve" was written by him, Rerdell, after it was filed, and was written because Turner told him that the schedule must be twelve hours; that Turner handed him the oath and he thereupon changed the "fifteen" to "twelve." On page 3355 Turner swears that he has no knowledge of any alteration in any affidavit. On page 3793, S. W. Dorsey swears that he did not know there was any such affidavit; and he also frequently swears that he never asked Rerdell to change any affidavit that had been filed, and that he never gave any such orders. These gentlemen find one affidavit about which we did not ask Mr. Dorsey particularly and they say, "You have not contradicted that." When a man swears that he never gave an order about any affidavit, that covers every affidavit.

On page 2337 Rerdell swears that the oath marked 20 F, on route 38145, was filled in by him after it was signed, under the direction of S. W. Dorsey. On page 3793 Dorsey denies giving any such directions.

On page 2338 Rerdell swears that blanks in the oath 22 F, the second oath, were filled in by S. W. Dorsey, but will not say whether before or after execution. On page 3771 Dorsey says he does not remember doing any such thing; but certainly there is no evidence that Dorsey did this after the affidavit had been made.

On page 2339 Rerdell swears that the words "ninety-six" in the petition 14 H, were written by Miner. Boone, on page 2709, declines to say that Miner wrote them. On page 4273 Miner swears that the words are not in his handwriting, that he never wrote them. On page 2298 Rerdell swears that he signed a check "S. W. Dorsey by M. C. Rerdell," and that he had that check at home. It may be that is one of the checks for June drawn upon Middleton's bank that we could not find.

On page 2340 Rerdell says that the oath marked 8 I, on route 44140, was filled in by him in Washington after it was signed and sworn to, under the direction of S. W. Dorsey. On page 3792 S. W. Dorsey denies that he gave any such directions.

On page 2342 Rerdell swears that S. W. Dorsey signed the name of J. M. Peck to the warrant 55 G. [55 G handed to Mr. Ingersoll.] I have forgotten the day that the draft was given, but I think it was the 2d day of August. It was paid on August 25, 1880. All I have to say is that there was an abundance of time for that draft to go to New Mexico and to be signed by John M. Peck; there was thousands of time. It makes not the slightest difference who signed the name of John M. Peck to that warrant. The question is, was that money coming to John M. Peck? No. John M. Peck had sold out his interest. He was not entitled to one dollar, and it made no difference who signed his name to the check. Does it show that there was a conspiracy if Dorsey signed his name after Peck had sold out his interest in the routes? Any draft coming to him came to him simply as the trustee and the draft was for the benefit of the person who bought him out. Suppose Mr. Dorsey had signed his name. Would that prove that there was any conspiracy? It would simply be in accordance with his right as the matter then stood. He was entitled to that draft and Peck was not entitled to that draft. Why? Because he had bought him out and paid him $10,000 for his interest. That was all. Yet they would claim if that draft happened to be indorsed by Mr. Dorsey that it would be evidence of a conspiracy entered into in the fall of 1879.

On pages 2348 and 2361 Rerdell says that figures were inserted in all affidavits given him by S. W. Dorsey, except on route 41119, and that Dorsey told him, Rerdell, to put them in the blanks. On page 3793 S. W. Dorsey denies that.

On page 2223 Rerdell says that in August, 1878, he had a talk with Miner, who said that they could do nothing while Boone was in the combination; that Brady was hostile to Boone, and that Boone's place was to be taken by Vaile; and that Miner asked his opinion about Vaile, and asked what Rerdell thought about Dorsey's approving it, adding that Vaile was very close to Brady. On page 4177 Miner swears that he has no recollection of the conversation, and does not believe any such conversation ever occurred.

Ah, but they say that when a paper was handed to Mr. Miner, an affidavit, for instance, he could not give you the history of it; he could not tell you where he was when he wrote it; he could not tell you where he was when he filled it. I would not have believed his testimony if he could. He had to take care of some ninety-six routes. Upon those routes there were numberless papers, notices from the department, notices of fines and deductions, of remissions, and everything of that kind. On each route there were probably a hundred papers, and may be more—petitions, affidavits, and papers of all descriptions. If a man should stand up here five years afterwards and pretend that he knew the history of each paper, I would know he had not the slightest regard for truth.

Mr. Miner said when he was shown a paper, "I don't remember ever having seen that paper before; I don't remember when it was written." That was the truth. If he had wished to stain his heart with perjury he could have said, "Yes, I remember it. I know absolutely the time I wrote it. I know I sent it to New Mexico. I know it was filled up before it was sworn to; but he was honest enough and he was brave enough to face the truth and say, "I don't remember," and I respected him for it when he did it. Whenever you hear the truth, as a rule the first thought is, "May be it won't do." But if it is the truth, the longer you think about it the better it seems, while if it is a lie, the longer you think about it the worse it gets. It would have been, apparently, to Mr. Miner's interest to say, "I remember it perfectly," but the man had honor enough to tell the truth. And when you come to investigate his evidence it sounds much much better than though he had pretended to remember time and place.

I call your attention to page 2446; that is about the affidavit.

On page 2384 Rerdell speaks of the charges made to Samuel Jones and James B. Belford for $2,000. Then Mr. Bliss in his speech, which I will come to after a while, says that Mr. Rerdell spoke about a charge to J. B. B. He never did, never. He said James B. Belford. I started the J. B. B. business. I was the first one who ever said it, and Mr. Rerdell never swore J. B. B. Then they sent out to Denver to get a fellow who had the same initials. I will come to this man after awhile.

On pages 2429 and 2430 Rerdell swears that he had two balance-sheets of the books, made by Donnelly; that he showed them to MacVeagh and Woodward. How does it happen that Woodward was not sworn about it? Nothing would have been of more importance, if they wished to prove the existence of the two red books, than to prove by Woodward that Mr. Rerdell, in June, 1881, showed him copies of those balance sheets or the balance-sheets themselves. They did not bring Mr. Woodward on the stand. Why? Mr. Woodward, in my judgment, had he come upon the stand, would have sworn to the truth. Rerdell says, "I do not know where they are." Then he paused. Then I saw the working of his mind just as plainly as though his skull had been opened. He got himself together and swore that he gave them to Dorsey in July, 1882. He had to get them out of his hands some way.

On page 3736 S. W. Dorsey swears that he, Rerdell, did not give him any balance sheets.

On page 2434 Rerdell swears as to the papers he gave to Dorsey—the original journal, and copy of the Oregon correspondence made by Miss Nettie L. White. Miss White was not called. He gave these, he says, to Dorsey July 13, 1882. On page 2793 Dorsey swears that he did not give them to him, nor did he give a paper of any kind.

On page 2461 Rerdell is asked if he did not admit to Judge Carpenter, in January, 1882, that he had a memorandum written by himself, which he showed to James and MacVeagh, and that he made it so much like Dorsey's handwriting that he did not think anybody could tell it. What was his answer? "I may have done so." Honest man!

On page 2462, in answer to the question, "Did you not tell Carpenter that you brought no book from New York?" the honest man answered:

Very likely I said I brought no book over from New York.

On the same page, in answer to the question, "Did you not tell French that you were trying to entrap James?" he admits that it is likely he was.

On page 2463 he admits that he may have told French that he had learned to imitate the handwriting of Dorsey so well that Dorsey himself could not tell the imitation; and that he wrote that memorandum in pencil because he could the more easily deceive. Honest man!

Mr. Bliss holds S. W. Dorsey up to scorn because he endeavored to turn two men out of the Cabinet on the testimony of Rerdell; and yet he is trying to put four men into the penitentiary on the same oath. Do you not think that it is better to get a man out of the Cabinet than to put another into the penitentiary? And do you not think it is better that a man be put out of office than that he be put into the penitentiary, his family destroyed, and his home left to ruin, upon the oath of a man who swears that the oath was a lie? Dorsey was an awfully wicked man to try to get Mr. MacVeagh out of office on Rerdell's testimony. But now they turn around and want to put Mr. Vaile and Mr. Miner into the penitentiary on the same testimony. The other testimony was the best, because we did not promise him immunity. I will come to it after a while.

On page 2465 Rerdell swears that he did not have any pencil memorandum that he showed to MacVeagh, claiming that it was in the handwriting of Dorsey, and was asked, "Did you not tell Bosler that you had?" What does he say? "Possibly I did." "Did you not tell Bosler that you wrote it?" "Possibly I did."

S. W. Dorsey swears on page 3810 that Rerdell told Bosler that it was in the waste-basket, and Bosler took the pieces out and put them together. Rerdell says he had written it, and in pencil, so that it would look more like Dorsey's handwriting. Why did you not ask Bosler about it, gentlemen, when you had him on the stand to prove your letter? Even Mr. Bliss, in his speech, asked, "Why didn't they call Bosler?" Why didn't you have the fairness to tell all the circumstances? I will tell them all when I get to that part of it. Why did you not tell them that you had looked all through Mr. Bosler's books?

Mr. BLISS. Because I had not.

Mr. INGERSOLL. You did not look in the settlement-book, did you?

Mr. BLISS. I looked at one book, or some entries.

Mr. CARPENTER. He had a glimpse.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Why did you not introduce them?

Mr. BLISS. The book was not in evidence in this case.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will come to it, gentlemen. I was waiting for you. I do not know but I am almost too soon.

Mr. MERRICK. I will tell when I come to the closing.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Of course, I do not object to your telling.

Mr. MERRICK. I will tell.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Mr. Merrick has his reasons and I know Mr. Bliss has his.

On page 2466 Rerdell swears that he did not get that memorandum out of the waste-basket, but got a note from MacVeagh, and that Dorsey was present.

On page 3810 Dorsey swears that it was a pencil memorandum imitating his (Dorsey's) hand closely.

On page 2466 Rerdell admits that he very likely told Bosler in June, 1881, that he had no book on the train and brought none from New York. In answer to my question, he says, "Possibly I did," or "Probably I did," tell Bosler. I cannot bring other witnesses to contradict him when he admits that he did. That is enough for me.

On page 2467 he admits that he very likely told Judge Wilson about the affidavit; that if he told him anything, he told him that no such book existed, and that there was no necessity for any book except an expense-book.

On page 2469 Rerdell swears that he had a copy of the day-book and ledger in June, 1881, in Dorsey's office; that Dorsey took them that day, and that they had been there ever since they were made to be carried to Congress. Then he began to gather his ideas, and he says:

Hold on. I am mistaken. These books were all sent over to New York before that, in the summer of 1880, when I carried the originals over for the last settlement I was present at, between Dorsey and Bosler.

There was no settlement in 1880, the time he speaks of. Mr. Merrick then says:

Q. There were two sets of those copies?

That would be four copies and two originals.

A. No, sir.

On page 3955, S. W. Dorsey swears that he had the first settlement with Bosler in December, 1879, or January, 1880, and had no subsequent adjustment until November or December, 1882; no settlement between those dates. Yet Rerdell says that he took those books over in the summer of 1880 for a settlement, when there was no settlement, and at the same time carried the originals. A moment before he had sworn that the originals were there in the office in June, 1881.

On page 2470 Rerdell swears that he did not give the books to Dorsey in 1881.

On page 2447 he swears that he did not have the balance-sheet in New York; that he had it in the office in June, 1881.

On page 2479, Rerdell, in speaking of the pencil memorandum, was cornered, caught. He said, "I have kept it as a voucher." Then finally he admits that it was not his property, but was the property of Dorsey; and the last admission he made upon that subject was, "I stole it." He says that while he was in jail somebody got into the office and destroyed his papers. And yet, on page 2480, he tells you that the first time it ever occurred to him to use that pencil memorandum was after the first trial was over. Can you believe that? He was trying to steal it on the 13th of July, 1882; was trying to go over to the Government on the 5th day of July, 1882, and did not think that he had that pencil memorandum! Writing a letter on that day to Dorsey; giving him notice that he was going to desert him; saying in that very letter that he had been persuaded by Bosler to make the first affidavit; saying that he was making preparations to go to the Government, was going to set himself right, and yet did not remember the pencil memorandum! Why? Because he manufactured it afterwards. He says that within a day or two after he was out of jail he found this paper a second time. He found it before, and laid it carefully away as a voucher. Then he lost sight of it. Then he was trying to sell it to the Government, and he forgot it; trying to blackmail Bosler and Dorsey, and forgot it. When he got out of jail he found it. That will not do. How does he say it got to his house? His wife carried it from the office while he was in jail. And yet he would have us believe that Dorsey broke into that office and stole all the papers. And yet he says that was in the office, and Dorsey did not take it. It will not do. He manufactured that paper after that time.

On page 2481 Rerdell swears that he did not know that he had that paper at that time, at the time he says his wife got the papers. I say he did not; I say he made it afterwards.

On page 2490 Rerdell swears that he had those red books in the office at 1121 I street; that he never made any effort to conceal them. And yet Kellogg never saw one of those books; never saw Rerdell working upon them, and never saw them in the office.

On page 2491 Rerdell swears that he thinks Kellogg did some work on those red books; that Kellogg helped him (Rerdell) make the first entries. On page 3636 Kellogg swears not only that he did not help him to make those entries, but positively swears that he never even saw any such books.

On page 3635 Kellogg swears positively that Rerdell did not keep any books, but a private expense-book and a route book; and that he (Kellogg) never saw any other books; that he never saw a ledger or journal in red leather, kept by Rerdell. He swears that he himself kept the three books (the journal, ledger, and cash-book,) and that Rerdell never made an entry in them.

On page 2512 Rerdell swears that he never imitated Dorsey's handwriting, or tried to, in Kellogg's presence. On page 3636 Kellogg swears that he saw him do it.

On the same page (2512) Rerdell swears that he never signed Dorsey's name to show Kellogg that he could imitate it. On page 3636 Kellogg swears that he did do it.

I have just given you a few, gentlemen, of the corroborations of this man Rerdell. Recollect that you cannot believe him unless he is corroborated. If you believe him at all you have got to believe all, unless you believe he is mistaken. Where a man comes on the stand as an informer—and I do not call him an informer—even in that capacity he has to be taken altogether or not at all.

Now, with all these contradictions upon his head, I will now come to the affidavit of July 13, 1882. You will remember that I read you the letter of July 5, in which he says that Bosler got him to make the affidavit of 1881. At page 2374 Rerdell gives an account of this affidavit. Dorsey got him in Willard's Hotel, locked the door, and had him. Now, he said to him, "Mr. Rerdell, I will tell you what I am going to do with you: I am going to have you prosecuted for perjury." Let us imagine that conversation. Rerdell replies, "What are you going to have me prosecuted for perjury for?" "For making the affidavit of June, 1881." "Why," says Rerdell, "in that affidavit I swore you were innocent." Says Dorsey, "Don't you know you swore to a lie? Do you think I would stand a lie of that kind, sir? Do you think I will allow any man willfully, maliciously, and with malice aforethought, to swear that I am an innocent man? I will have you arrested to-night, sir." "Well," says Rerdell, "my good God, aint there any way I can get out of this?" "Yes; make another affidavit just like it. Now, sir, you have perjured yourself and I will arrest you for perjury unless you do it again." "Well," says Rerdell, "when I get that done you will have two cases against me." "I can't help it," Dorsey says. "Is that the way you treat a friend? I swore to that lie from pure friendship. Don't you remember you took me by both hands and begged me, for God's sake, and for your wife's sake and your children's sake, to make that affidavit? And now are you going to be such a perfect devil as to have me arrested for perjury for making that same affidavit?" Dorsey says, "Yes, sir; that is the kind of man I am." "Well, but," says Rerdell, "Don't you know the trial is going on now? They are trying to prove, now, that you are guilty, and in that affidavit of mine I swore you are innocent, and how are you going to prove a man guilty when you swear that he is innocent?" Dorsey says, "That is my business, not yours. I am going to have you arrested." "But," says Rerdell, "you had better hold on, I tell you." "Why?" "I have got the red book that I got in New York." Dorsey says, "I don't care." Rerdell says, "I have got the pencil memorandum that you made for me to open the books upon, and charge William Smith with $18,000. And you wrote John Smith first, and I changed it to Sam Jones, don't you recollect, as otherwise there would be two Smiths? And there is the account against J. H. Mitchell, and J. W. D., and cash, and profit and loss." Dorsey says, "I don't care about that. I am not going to allow a man to commit perjury. I am going to have you arrested." Rerdell says, "You had better not have me arrested." Dorsey says, "Why? What else have you got?" "I have got a copy of the letter that you wrote to Bosler on the 13th of May, 1879, in which you say that you paid $20,000 to Thomas J. Brady. That copy was made by Miss Nettie L. White." "Do you believe I care anything about that? You have perjured yourself, and it is no difference to me whether it was in my favor or not. Justice must be done, and I am going to have you arrested." Rerdell says, "You had better not. I have got a tabular statement in your handwriting, Dorsey, where you had a column for the amount due and the amount received, and another column for 33½ per cent. given to Brady, and then at the top, in your handwriting, 'T. J. B., 33½.'" Dorsey says, "I don't care what you have got." Rerdell says, "That aint all I have got, Dorsey. I tore out of your copy-book a copy of the letter I wrote to Bosler on the 21st or 22d of May, 1880, in which I told him that I had gone to Brady, and that Brady said you were a damn fool for keeping a set of books, and suggested to me to have some copies made, and I had the copies made, and I can prove the copies by Gibbs if he does not try not to remember that he made them. Now, go on with your rat-killing; go on with your perjury suit." Dorsey had him already locked up there, don't you see? But Dorsey was bent on having that man arrested for perjury because he had sworn that he (Dorsey) was innocent. Dorsey was implacable.

What else did he do? He put his hand in his pocket and said, "Do you see those letters to that woman?" Then, sir, when he saw the handwriting he was like that other gentleman that saw the handwriting on the wall, and he began to get weak in the knees, and says, "Dorsey, I hope you are not going to have me arrested for perjury. I am willing to do it again right now, on the same subject."

Now, it turns out that at that time Dorsey did not have those letters. Dorsey swears that he never got those letters until after Rerdell was put upon the stand. And after he swore that the Government had the woman to whom the letters were written subpoenaed. Why did they not place her on the stand? That is for you to answer, gentlemen. That is the affidavit of July 13. Recollect, there was a trial going on at that time in which Dorsey was insisting that he was innocent, and although Rerdell had sworn that he was, he was going to have him arrested right off.

What else did he have against Dorsey at that time? Now, says Rerdell, "Dorsey, don't you have me arrested for perjury. I have got a memorandum of that mining stock that was to be given to McGrew and Tyner and Turner and Lilley for corrupt purposes."

What else did he have? After he had agreed to make the affidavit, Dorsey wrote out what he wanted him to swear to, in pencil, and gave it to him. And when he got his liberty, when he walked out of that room a free citizen, he had all the papers I have spoken of not only, but he had in his possession a draft, in Dorsey's handwriting, of the affidavit Dorsey wanted him to make. He made the first affidavit from friendship; the second from fright. You know he never took a dollar for an affidavit. He was not that kind of a man. You might get around him by talking friendship or you might scare him, but you could not bribe him; he wasn't that kind of a man. Armed with all these papers he was frightened; so he made the affidavit of July 13.

Now, let us see. He admits that—I will not say every word, but the principal things in the affidavit of June, 1881, are false. He swore to them knowing them to be false. But he tries to get out by saying he did not write them all. Writing is not the crime. The crime is swearing that they are true when they are not true. It does not make any difference who wrote it. For instance, you swear to an affidavit, and you afterwards say, "I did not write it." "Did you know the contents?" "Yes." "Did you swear to it?" "Yes." What difference does it make who wrote it? And yet he endeavors to get behind that breastwork and say, "I did not write all that affidavit; I only wrote part of it. What I wrote was true, but what I swore to was not." That will not do.

So the affidavit of July, 1882, he now swears was a lie. But he gives a reason for writing that that you know is utterly, perfectly, completely false. You know that Dorsey never threatened to have him arrested for perjury because he had sworn in favor of Dorsey. You know it, and all the eloquence and all the genius of the world could not convince you that at that time Rerdell was afraid that Dorsey would have him arrested for perjury. No, sir.

Now, let us take the next step. Mr. Rerdell testified, on page 2275, that this letter (32 X) was received by him in due course of mail in 1878. Upon being asked whether he did not know that S. W. Dorsey was here in Washington at that time, he replied that he knew he was not. I will read it to you, gentlemen :

Q. When did you receive that letter?—A. I received it some time in the month of April, 1878. I do not remember the date exactly.

Mr. MERRICK. [Reading:]

“Chico Springs P. O.]

“MOUNTAIN SPRING RANCH, COLFAX COUNTY, NEW MEXICO,

“April 3, 1878.

“M. C. RERDELL, 1121 I street :

“DEAR RERDELL: I wish you would get fullest information in regard to all the new post-office lettings and keep posted as to the schemes going on in the department. There are certain routes we want advertised and others we do not. I shall be in Washington as soon as the 12th unless something unexpectedly happens.

Faithfully,

DORSEY.

[The paper last read was marked by the clerk 32 X and submitted to the jury for examination.]

Q. What Dorsey was that?—A. That is S. W. Dorsey's handwriting.

Q. And signature?—A. Yes, sir.

There is where he first speaks of it. At the time that letter was introduced, or in a little time, gentlemen, they also introduced the envelope. I do not know that I should have suspected the letter if they had not introduced the envelope. Whenever there is an effort to make a thing too certain I always suspect it. When that Morey letter was gotten up, what made me suspect it was that they had the envelope, and I said to myself, “Why did they want the envelope if it was clearly in the handwriting of Garfield? What difference did it make whether it was sent to Morey or to somebody else? What difference did it make when it came from Washington? The only question was, “Did Garfield write it?” And upon that subject the envelope threw no light. When a man feels weak and thinks that other people will know what he does not want them to know, then it is that he wants to barricade and strengthen before the attack. So they got up this envelope, and when I looked at that it did not look to me like that stamp had been through the mail. I noticed the handwriting of “Chico Springs, N. M.,” and then I noticed the 3 or the B on the postage stamp, and then I knew that the man who wrote “Chico Springs” never made the letter or figure on that stamp. It is utterly impossible for the man who wrote that “Chico Springs” to make that mark on the stamp. This stamp looked awfully clean, and I said, “Well, I wouldn't wonder if that was an envelope used here in the city which has been got through the mail in some way.” They had it stamped on the back and I said, “Perhaps that was written in 1879.” No. You see, if it was not written in 1879 it did not do any harm, because in 1879 Dorsey was not a member of the Senate. Having gone out on the 4th of March, 1879, if that letter was dated in April, 1879, why then there was no harm in his writing to Mr. Rerdell and telling him to look after the mail business. But if it was written on the 3d of April, 1878, it went far to show that Dorsey was personally interested at that time in mail routes. You will notice the printed date, April 3, 1878. They introduced that letter. I noticed that that envelope was a funny looking thing, and that the writing on it did not correspond with the mark on the stamp. I noticed also that upon the back they had the stamp. I do not know how they got it. When the Post-Office Department has possession of a paper they can put most anything on it. When I said to Mr. Rerdell on cross-examination, not knowing anything about the letter, "Was that not written in 1879?" he said, "No, sir." Said I, "Don't you know, as a matter of fact, that Dorsey was not here on the 3d of April, 1879?" He said, "As a matter of fact I know that he was here on the 3d of April, 1879." "Don't you know, as a matter of fact, that he was here on the 3d of April, 1878?" He says, "I know as a matter of fact that he was not here on the 3d of April, 1878; he was at Chico Springs." He knew as a matter of fact that he was here in 1879, and he swore that so as to preclude the possibility of his having written the letter in 1879. And he swore to the positive fact that he was not here on the 3d of April, 1878, so as to show that he wrote him that letter from Chico Springs. They wanted some letter from Dorsey in 1878, to show that he was personally interested in these routes while in the Senate. They submitted that letter to Mr. Boone, who was their witness. He looks at it and he tells you that Dorsey did not write that letter. A clear forgery. Whom else do they bring now? They leave it right there, and by that admit that Rerdell forged that letter. Mr. Boone, their witness, swears it. Nobody swears to the contrary except Rerdell. Boone threw the letter from him contemptuously, and says "That is not Dorsey's handwriting," and they dare not bring another witness. The country is filled with experts, gentlemen, who know about handwriting; the United States had plenty of men and plenty of money, and they never brought a solitary man.

Now, gentlemen, do you want to know how this fellow got caught? I will tell you. There is the letter, and they dare not put a man on the stand to swear that it is in Dorsey's handwriting. Look it all over. But I want to tell you how Rerdell got caught about Dorsey being present on the 3d of April, 1878, and I might as well tell you how I found it out. I do not want to pretend to be any more ingenious than I am. I found it out because I made the same mistake myself. I stumbled on that same root. I hit my toe of heedlessness on the same obstruction. I went up to look at the Senate journal. I opened a book to see whether Dorsey was here on the 3d of April, 1878. You see at the bottom there of the title page, Mr. Foreman—

Washington: Government Printing Office. 1877.

You know I was not looking for the book of 1877, so I shut that book up. I then took the next book and opened it, and it said at just the same place:

Washington: Government Printing Office. 1878.

I thought that was the book. So I looked over here, and I found that there was no session of the Senate in April, and I said to myself, "Is that possible that there was no session in April, 1878? Why, there must have been." But the book said "no." I looked back here, and it still said 1878. Then I happened to look back to this book that said 1877, and it said that the session commenced December 3, 1877, and consequently April 3 would be found in the book marked 1877 on the title page. So I turned right over here and looked up at the top and saw the date, April 3, 1878. He was looking for the 1878 book, and that included April, 1879, and when he got to April, 1879, there was no session of the Senate. So he came right in here and swore that Dorsey was not here in 1878, but that he was here in April, 1879. I looked in that book and I found that Mr. Dorsey, on the 3d of April, 1878, was appointed by the Vice-President on a committee of conferees, on the part of the Senate, together with Senators Windom and Beck, and I saw exactly how Mr. Rerdell made his mistake. He opened the book, and at the bottom of the title page it said 1877. That was not what he was looking for. He was looking for 1878. And the book that said 1878 showed that in April the Senate was not in session. The book that said 1877 showed that in April the Senate was in session on April 3, 1878. That man thought he was backed by the records of the Senate, and thereupon he manufactured that letter. And that is the letter sworn by Boone not to be in the handwriting of S. W. Dorsey. Now, gentlemen, there is nothing in this world that a man would be prevented from doing, for its baseness, who would do that.

There is more evidence than this. I asked Mr. Rerdell, "When you got that letter did you understand it?" He said, "No." "Did you do anything on account of it?" "No." "Did you know what it meant?" "No." And yet he has the temerity to swear that he received that on the 3d of April, 1878.

The COURT. He did not receive it on that day.

Mr. INGERSOLL. He received it in due course of mail.

How did he come to spell the name Reddell? I will tell you. On page 2275 he had a letter to go by. That is the very page on which the Government puts in that letter. This letter is a letter of introduction. When Rerdell manufactured that letter he had this letter of introduction to go by:

Hon. J. L. ROUTT, Denver:

MY DEAR GOVERNOR: I wish to introduce my friend, Mr. M. C. Reddell.

It was written Reddell in that letter, and when this man wanted to manufacture one he had one in his possession that Dorsey wrote about that time (April 14, 1879), and he noticed that in that he spelled the name Reddell. So when he wanted to get up a fraud he spelled the name Reddell. That is the way. There is no pretense that Dorsey wrote that letter, and they dare not bring an expert or another man on earth acquainted with the handwriting of Dorsey and submit it to him and expect him to say that that is the handwriting of S. W. Dorsey. So much for that.

Now it is claimed that while Torrey was writing up Dorsey's books, having in his possession the check stubs, he was uncertain as to whether a charge was $25 or 25 cents, and he thereupon sent to Rerdell to ascertain the true state of the account, so that he might open his books. Thereupon Rerdell made the calculation in the evidence marked 94 X, and Donnelly wrote under it that it was right. Donnelly made that little certificate at the bottom. Here is the important paper [submitting 94 X to the jury], another piece manufactured out of whole cloth, not whole paper. Now I asked a few questions about this. In the first place, they knew that unless this was corroborated it was good for nothing, and we find on it:

Lewis Johnson & Co., note due 28th October, $3,000.

Was that note at Lewis Johnson & Co.'s? Why did they not bring some of the officers of that bank, if there was such a note for $3,000 there? But no one was brought. And yet they knew that everything coming from Rerdell must be corroborated.

If Rerdell had come to Donnelly to find what the account was, how did it happen to be in Rerdell's handwriting before it got to Donnelly? Donnelly wrote this certificate at the bottom. Rerdell had written all the facts before. If he went to Donnelly to get the facts, how did Rerdell happen to write this before it got to Donnelly? It is like me wanting to get some information from a man, and writing the information before go to him. Now, if Donnelly wrote that after Rerdell had written, where did Rerdell get the information? If Donnelly had the books, Donnelly should have given the information. If Rerdell had the books, why did he want to go to Donnelly for information? And if Donnelly had the books, how did Rerdell write the information before he went to Donnelly? Then if he wanted that information for Torrey, why did he not send it to him? How does it happen that Rerdell wrote out the information for Donnelly, then got Donnelly to certify it, because Torrey had asked it? And then how does it happen that Rerdell kept it? It seems to me that that ought to have been sent to Torrey. Torrey wrote to Rerdell for information; Rerdell wrote it all down, and then got Mr. Donnelly to say it was so. If Donnelly had the books, Donnelly should have given the information. If Rerdell had the books, he did not have to go to Donnelly for information. That is another manufactured paper. As I say, how does it happen to be in the possession of Rerdell? They claim that it was for Torrey's benefit. I believe when Torrey was on the stand they asked him if there was not some dispute about 35 cents. Now they bring that here to show that there was a dispute about 25 cents. Was there any reason for supposing that it was 25 cents? No, except that it was in the dollar column, that is all. Of what use was Donnelly's statement after Rerdell had made the calculation? Nobody on earth can tell why that was given. Why did they not bring some of the books or clerks from Lewis Johnson & Co.'s Bank to show that there was a note there in October for $3,000.

There is another little matter, a conversation between Rerdell and Brady. Rerdell said he had a conversation with Brady in which he told him about the Congressional committee; that he was summoned to bring his books. Brady was astonished that Dorsey would be "Damn fool enough to keep books," and suggested to have them copied. If this is true, Brady at that time made a confidant of Rerdell. If it is true, Brady at that time admitted to Rerdell that he (Brady) was a conspirator; that he had conspired with Dorsey. And yet Brady says that he never had but three or four conversations, I believe, with this man, and Rerdell himself admits that he never had but four or five, and when he is pinned down on cross-examination he accounts for enough of these interviews, without any interviews on the subject of the books, to exceed all that he ever had. Do you believe that he ever had any such conversation? Do you believe that Brady would make a confidant of him? Do you believe that Brady would substantially admit in his presence that he had been bribed by Dorsey? I do not.

Now, in order that you may know what this man is, I want you to have an idea of his character. So we will come to the next point. Mr. Rerdell admits that he sat with the defendants during the early part of this trial; that he was willing to make a bargain with the Government; that he proposed to the Government that he would sit with his codefendants, and would challenge from the jury the friends of the defendants. Did any man wearing the human form ever propose a more corrupt and infamous bargain? That proposition ought to have been written on the tanned hide of a Tewksbury pauper. He went to the Government and deliberately said, "Gentlemen, I am willing to make a bargain with you. I am willing to sit with my codefendants, pretending to be their friend, and while so pretending I will challenge their friends from the jury. I will so arrange it that their enemies may be upon the panel." "And why do you say that, Mr. Rerdell?" "In order to show my good faith towards the Government." He made the first affidavit for friendship, the second for fear, and he made this proposition to show his good faith. There never was a meaner proposition made by human being, under the circumstances, than that. He proposed to do it. Mr. Blackmar says that the proposition was rejected; but that does not affect Mr. Rerdell. He was willing to carry it out.

What more does he swear? He swears that he tried to carry it out. In other words, that although it had been rejected, that made no difference to him. Mr. Blackmar says they would not do it. Rerdell swears that he tried to; went right along and did his level best; and if the court had allowed him four challenges he would have challenged four friends of the defendants from the jury.

What more does he admit? That when the court decided that all of us together only had four, he endeavored to challenge one. Why? Because he believed that one to be an enemy of the defendants; because he believed that one would be in favor of the prosecution; because he believed he was a friend of the defendants; because he believed he would be against the prosecution; and he wanted to get the friends of the defendants away. Why? To the end that the defendants might be tried by an enemy. That is what he was trying to accomplish.

Let us take another step. That proposition reveals the entire man; that takes his hide off; that takes his flesh all off; that leaves his heart bare, naked; you can see what he is made of, and it shows the workings of his spirit, the motions of his mind; and you see in there a den of vipers; you see entangled, knotted adders. And yet that man is put upon the stand stamped by the seal of the Department of Justice, and that department says to twelve men, "Here is a gentleman that you can believe; that gentleman proposes to sell out his codefendants to us, but we would not buy; he is an honorable kind of gentleman, but we would not buy."

Mr. MERRICK. It should be interpolated there—if you will pardon me a moment—that the Government refused to accept Rerdell until he himself had pleaded guilty.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I understand that. I say now, Mr. Merrick, that I would not for anything in the world, on a subject of that kind, go the millionth part of an inch beyond the testimony. Although you and I have not been very cordial friends during this trial, and neither have I and Mr. Bliss, yet if I know myself I would not for anything in this world put a stain upon your reputation, or upon the reputation of either of you, by misstating a word of this testimony. I would not do it. I am incapable of it. I admit that the evidence is that the proposition was rejected, but I also insist that the Government knew the proposition had been made, otherwise it could not have been rejected. And so I say that after this man had made that proposition, infamous enough to put a blush upon the cheek of total depravity, the Government put that witness upon the stand sealed with the seal of the Department of Justice.

Now, we will go another step. He sat with us from day to day, gentlemen, as you know, went in and out with us, as one of the codefendants. In the mean time—and there is a laughable side even to this infamy—he borrowed money from Vaile. He went to him as a codefendant, as a friend, and said, "I want $140; I want to buy bread and meat to give me strength to swear you into the penitentiary." And Vaile gave him the money. Would you believe a man like that? You cannot think of a man low enough, you cannot think of a defendant vile enough to be convicted on such testimony.

Now, we will go another step. He wanted to make that bargain with Mr. Blackmar. Mr. Blackmar swears that he told Mr. Merrick of it, and that Mr. Merrick rejected it; would have nothing to do with it. At that time Mr. Woodward had two affidavits of Rerdell in his possession—an affidavit of Rerdell, made in September, supplemented by another affidavit, I believe, of November, that he made in the city of Hartford, covering seventy pages. When Mr. Woodward saw Mr. Rerdell sitting with the defendants, pretending to go with them, he (Woodward) had those two affidavits of Rerdell in his pocket. Did the prosecution know that Rerdell had made the two affidavits? I do not say they did, gentlemen. I only go right to the line of the evidence; there I stop.

Another thing: Mr. Blackmar swears that they had a signal to look at the clock, and that night Rerdell would meet him at 6 or 7 o'clock, I have forgotten the hour; but Mr. Blackmar could not sit in his room all the time waiting for him, and so he gave him a certain signal, so that he would know he was to wait that night. Then what happened? Then Mr. Rerdell came to Mr. Blackmar and gave to him written reports. Of what? I do not know. He sat with the defendants; he gave to Mr. Blackmar written reports. What were they? I do not know. What did Mr. Blackmar do with them? He handed them to Colonel Bliss. What did he do with them? I do not know. Did he read them? I do not know. Did he know that they were in the handwriting of Mr. Rerdell? I do not know. That is for you.

Still another point: Mr. Bliss, in his opening speech in this case, telling about the confession that Rerdell had once made, and a confession that he would prove in this very trial, says, speaking about the dispatches that Dorsey sent Rerdell, at page 296:

One of them expressed regret that they had parted in anger and begged him to come back, and the other beseeched him to pause in the course upon which he had entered as it would result in the ruin of Dorsey's family. Mr. Rerdell came back to the city with the dispatches in his possession, stating that he was determined to carry out his agreement with the Attorney-General. When he got here—

That is, in Washington—

he fell into the hands of somebody, and from that time on he lost all desire to protect himself and to clear his conscience, but passed altogether under the influence of these defendants. Their ranks were closed up and he stands before you now as one of the defendants, whose testimony against himself—

That is the confession to MacVeagh and James—will be accepted by the court and by you as absolutely conclusive, and whose testimony will throw a lurid light upon this conspiracy and the relations of the different parties to it.

Mr. Bliss, after this jury had been impaneled, stood before them while Rerdell was sitting with us as a defendant, and said:

The ranks of the defendants are closed up, and he—stands before you now as one of the defendants, whose testimony—

Rerdell—

Meaning the confessions made to MacVeagh and to Postmaster-General James—will be accepted by the court and by you, &c.

The question arises, "Did Mr. Bliss know at that time that Mr. Woodward had in his pockets two affidavits made by Rerdell, one made in September and the other in November? Did he know at that time that Rerdell had given his papers over to Mr. Woodward? Did he know at that time that he had offered to challenge the friends of the defendants from the panel? And so knowing, did he give us to understand that Rerdell had passed from the influence of the Government and was now acting as one of the codefendants? Is it possible that Mr. Bliss would furnish Rerdell with a mask behind which he could gather information from the defendants and sell it to the Government for immunity? Is it possible? Those were the circumstances. I do not say that he knew. I do not know.

Gentlemen, I do not believe that it is the duty of a Government to prosecute its citizens. I do not believe that it is the duty of a Government to spread a net for one of the people whom it should protect. I do not believe in the spy and informer system. I believe that every Government should exist for the purpose of doing justice as between man and man. The mission of a Government is to protect and preserve its citizens from violence and fraud. The real object of a Government is to enforce honest contracts, to protect the weak from the strong; not to combine against the one, not to offer rewards for treachery, not to show cold avarice in order that some citizen may have his liberty sworn away. The objects of a good Government are the sublimest of which the imagination can conceive. The means employed should be as pure as the ends are noble and sacred. The Government should represent the opinions, desires, and ideals of its greatest, its best, and its noblest citizens. Every act of the Government should be a flower springing from the very heart of honor. A Government should be incapable of deceit. The Department of Justice should blow from the scales even the dust of prejudice. Representing a supreme power, it should have the serenity and frankness of omnipotence. Subterfuge is a confession of weakness. Behind every pretense lurks cowardice. Our Government should be the incarnation of candor, of courage, and of conscience. That is my idea of a great and noble Government.

I would like it now if the court would consent to an adjournment.

The COURT. Adjourn the court.

Thereupon (at 3 o'clock and 47 minutes p. m.) the court adjourned until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 23, 1883.

The court met at 11 o'clock.

Present, counsel for the Government and for the defendants.

Mr. INGERSOLL. [Resuming.] If the court please, and gentlemen of the jury: The next point to which I call your attention is the withdrawal of the plea of not guilty by Mr. Rerdell. You probably remember the occurrence. I will read to you what he said upon that occasion. I find it on page 2202:

After mature reflection and a full consideration of the whole subject, I have determined to abandon any further defense of myself in this case, and put myself at the mercy of the court and the Government; and if desired to do so by the counsel for the Government, to testify to all my knowledge of any facts with reference to any of the defendants either against or for them, myself included. Therefore, I now in person ask leave to withdraw my plea of not guilty, heretofore interposed, and enter my plea of guilty, and in so doing put myself upon the mercy of the court. I feel this to be a duty I owe to myself, my family, and to truth. I have arrived at this fixed determination upon my own reflections and responsibilities, and without any previous consultation with my counsel, who, I believe, would not have advised me to this course, and whom I now relieve from all and any responsibility for the course I have adopted.

Now, gentlemen, is it not wonderful that if Mr. Rerdell was about to tell the truth as a witness in this case, he could not even withdraw his plea of not guilty without misstating the facts? Is it not wonderful that he felt called upon at that time to tell several falsehoods? He says that he took this step upon his own responsibility. He says that he did it without the advice of his counsel. He tells you that he believes if he had asked his counsel, his counsel would have been opposed to it. He says he is willing to be a witness for the Government if the Government desires it, leaving you to infer that at that time no arrangement had been made for him to be a witness; that it was all in the regions of uncertainty; that he had withdrawn into the recesses of his own mind, and consulting with himself and nobody else had made up his mind to throw himself upon the mercy of the Government and the court, and took that step without even allowing his counsel to know what he was about to do.

But he speaks further on the subject. I read from page 2523. I was then examining him:

Q. How did you come to do it—

That is, to go over to the Government and withdraw his plea—

if you did not make such an arrangement?—A. I finally made up my mind to what I would do. I talked it over the evening before with my counsel—

He so states under oath; and yet when he stood up before this court and withdrew his plea of not guilty, he said he acted without the knowledge of his counsel—and I went with him to Mr. Merrick's house, went in, told him my object, and he then and there explained to me the law, and I accepted the—

Q. [Interposing.] Did you read the case in 9 Otto?—A. No, sir; I did not.

Q. Who went with you?—A. Judge Wilshire and myself.

Q. Who else?—A. Mr. Woodward.

Q. Where did they find you to take you there?—A. At my house.

Q. Did they come after you in a carriage?—A. Yes, sir; I was waiting for them there.

Q. You had made the arrangement?—A. No, sir; I had made my arrangement with Judge Wilshire that evening.

When he arose and withdrew his plea of not guilty he had the impudence to state that he took that step without having consulted with his counsel.

Q. To do what?—A. To go to Mr. Merrick and tell him what I was determined to do, and he came out and told me, and when he came out, Mr. Woodward came in a carriage with him, and we went down to Mr. Merrick's house.

On page 2524:

[Q. * * * You went to the office of Mr. Merrick?—A. I did.

Q. And now when you came away from there had you made up your mind to plead guilty and take the stand?—A. I had; and before I got there.

You will remember his testimony in answer to a question by Mr. Merrick. I want to be absolutely fair about this matter. The testimony is that Mr. Merrick said to him, "I will make you no promise. You must depend upon the mercy of the court" or of the Government, or something of that kind. "I refuse to make any promise." I read this to show you that the statement he made to the court at the time he withdrew his plea was absolutely false. What next? I will go on a little further. The same man Rerdell, after he had made up his mind to go over to the Government; after he had made up his mind to swear away, if it was within his power, the liberty of S. W. Dorsey, admits, on page 2525, that he endeavored to get $5,000 from Mr. Dorsey.

On page 2589 Mr. Rerdell swears positively that he did not know that he was to be used as a witness for the Government until he was called in court to take the stand. Let us look at the evidence of Mr. Bliss on page 2590. I will read you what he said:

Mr. BLISS. Your honor, we propose to show, in substance, that this witness, for reasons with which we have nothing to do, connected with his own views of his own safety, from an early period was desirous of being accepted by the Government as a witness; that the counsel in the case refused to communicate with him or to have anything to do with him until, in the presence of his own counsel, he was brought to Mr. Merrick's office, and there the whole thing was explained; and that then for the first time the Government accepted his willingness to be a witness; and they did it under circumstances which held out to him no inducement and which involved no training or anything of the kind by anybody representing the prosecution.

Now, let us go to the next step. I want to be perfectly fair. On page 2591 Mr. Merrick asked Mr. Rerdell this question:

Q. When did you first learn that you would be put upon the stand after pleading guilty?—A. It was the day before my plea was made in court.

Yet when he rose to withdraw the plea he expressed his willingness to go upon the stand for the Government, leaving you to infer that no arrangement had been made, and he afterwards finally swore that he did not know that he was to be called until he was called. Here he says:

It was the day before my plea was made in court.

Let me read the question again and the answer:

Q. When did you first learn that you would be put on the stand after pleading guilty?—A. It was the day before my plea was made in court.

He knew that he was to be put upon the stand. He knew it the day before he withdrew his plea. Yet he swears he did not know that he was to be used as a witness until he was called to take the stand. These things, gentlemen, you must remember.

On page 2515 Rerdell swears that on the Sunday after he got out of jail he proposed to Mr. Lilley to have Lilley act for him, and authorized Lilley to say to the Government that if the Government would accept him he would go on the stand and rebut Vaile. He told him that he had in his possession a letter or two of Mr. Vaile's. Rerdell tells you that he made this proposition on the 16th or 17th of September, 1882, which was after he made the affidavit of June, 1881. On the same page he is asked:

Q. When did you first see Mr. Lilley on that subject?

And he answered:

The day after Mr. Vaile testified in the last trial, I think.

He said it was just after Vaile went off the stand. That is my recollection. In the last trial Vaile testified on the 4th of August, 1882. So about that time Rerdell, according to his testimony, went to Lilley and made a proposition to sell out then. When he made the affidavit of July 13, 1882, the trial was then in progress. The very next month, August, while the trial was still going on, that same man, having made the affidavit of July 13, 1882, went to his attorney, Mr. Lilley, and authorized him to say to the Government that Mr. Rerdell would take the stand to swear against Mr. Vaile. Remember another thing, gentlemen. The only thing he offered to do then to insure his own safety was to swear against Vaile. He did not offer to swear against Dorsey. He did not authorize Mr. Lilley to tell the Government about the pencil memorandum and the tabular statement and his letter to Bosler and Dorsey's letter to Bosler, and the Chico letter. Not a word. He simply went and wanted to sell some letters he had that had been written by Vaile. Why did he make that offer? Because that was all he had.

On page 2517 he says that nothing was said about pardon, but he says that Lilley told him that he thought he could get him off. What does that mean? That means pardon. On page 2518 he swears that he saw Woodward in November in Hartford, and Woodward and he wrote out the statement, covering, I believe, about seventy pages of legal cap. Then Mr. Rerdell, on page 2519, swears that he never made an affidavit after that. Then he admits, on the same page, that the day before he came into court he met Mr. Woodward and made another affidavit. That was supplementary to the first. In the mean time he found some new papers. So we find, according to his testimony, these affidavits:

On page 2521 we find that he made an affidavit in June, 1881. Remember, gentlemen, that he swore to that affidavit three or four times.

He made another affidavit in July, 1882, and another in September and November of the same year, and another in February, 1883. And yet he swears that he was not to have immunity.

Now, gentlemen, one point more about his plea of guilty. After having withdrawn his plea of not guilty, after rising in court and solemnly saying that he was guilty, and that he was guilty as charged in the indictment, which says that Rerdell conspired with Brady and Vaile and Miner and John W. Dorsey and S. W. Dorsey and Turner, that they all conspired, and that all the false affidavits and false petitions and false everything else mentioned in the indictment were made for the common benefit of all, then on page 2570 he solemnly swears that he never entered into any conspiracy or agreement with the defendants mentioned in the indictment or any of them for the purpose of defrauding the Government. When I asked him, With whom did you conspire, when did you conspire, and what was the conspiracy? he could not tell; and yet he had stood up in court and admitted that he was guilty, and then on oath denied it. Did he not swear himself that after the division was made in the routes Stephen W. Dorsey had not the interest of a cent in any route that went to Vaile or Miner? Did he not also swear that Vaile and Miner had not the interest of one cent in any route that went to Stephen W. Dorsey? Did he not swear that they were not mutually interested, and yet did he not stand up in court, and by a plea of guilty say that they were not only mutually interested, but he was one of the interested parties himself? It seems impossible for that man to tell the truth on any subject whatever. On page 2571 he swears he never made any agreement with Vaile to defraud the United States. He stood up in court and admitted that he had. He swore that he never made any agreement with John W. Dorsey. He admitted that he had. He swore that he never made any agreement with S. W. Dorsey, and yet stood up in court and admitted that he had.

Now let us see whether he expected immunity. He swears that he was taken to Mr. Merrick's office by Mr. Woodward and his counsel. What Mr. Merrick told him we find on page 2590:

Q. And did I not say that, under the circumstances, the Government would have nothing to do with you unless you pleaded guilty?—A. You did.

Q. And that if you pleaded guilty you had nothing to trust to but the mercy of the Government and the court?—A. That is what you did, sir, exactly.

Q. Did I not say to you that you must look to the limit—

Then there was some discussion and then on page 2591:

Q. Did I not say to you that you must look to the limit of that punishment?—A. You did.

Q. And did I not say to you also that I had nothing to promise and you had nothing to hope?—A. You did.

Mr. MERRICK. I went to the extreme, your honor; I want that understood.

Q. I told you if you wanted to be used by the Government you should look only to the mercy of a just Government and court. When did you first learn that you would be put upon the stand after pleading guilty?—A. That very day; it was the day before my plea was made in court.

Now, on page 2523:

Q. Did Woodward and Wilshire bring a book with them and read to you a case?—A. They did not.

Q. Did they at any time?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did either of them?—A. Neither.

Q. Was your attention called to a case?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What case?—A. Mr. Wilshire called my attention to a case. I think he said the whisky cases.

Q. Did he read you the case?—A. He did not.

Q. Did he tell you what it was?

The court would not allow us to prove what passed between the counsel and the gentleman.

Q. Was it not arranged that Mr. Woodward was to come to your house and then take you to one of the attorneys for the prosecution, for the purpose of arranging the terms and conditions upon which you were to take the stand?—A. It was not.

In another place he swears that it was, and that the arrangement was carried out.

The next point I wish to make, if the court please, is that whenever what is called an accomplice or an informer turns what is called State's evidence, and whenever he is permitted by the court to be sworn as a witness in a case, there is then upon the part of the Government an implied promise that if he tells the truth he shall not be punished. I read from the Whisky cases, 9 Otto, page 595. Mr. Justice Clifford delivers the opinion of the court. I read first the first paragraph:

Accomplices in guilt, not previously convicted of an infamous crime, when separately tried are competent witnesses for or against each other; and the universal usage is—

The universal usage is—that such a party, if called and examined by the public prosecutor on the trial of his associates in guilt, will not be prosecuted for the same offense, provided it appears that he acted in good faith and that he testified fully and fairly.

Then, on page 598:

Waiving for the present the question whether the district attorney may contract with an accomplice of an accused person on trial, that if he will testify in the case his taxes shall be abated, or that he and his party shall be exempt from internal revenue taxation, the court will consider in the first place whether the district attorney, as a public prosecutor, may properly enter into an agreement with such an accomplice, that if he will testify fully and fairly in such a prosecution against his associate in guilt he shall not be prosecuted for the same offense; and, if so, whether such an agreement, if the witness performs on his part, will avail the witness as a defense to the criminal charge in case of a subsequent prosecution.

Considered in its full scope, the agreement is that in consideration of the defendants testifying against their coconspirators who were indicted for defrauding the revenue, they, the defendants, should have a full and complete discharge, not only from all criminal liability, but from all penalties and forfeitures they had incurred, and from liability for their internal-revenue taxes which they had fraudulently refused to pay, giving them full and complete indemnity, civil and criminal, for all their fraudulent and illegal acts in respect to the public revenue.

Courts of justice everywhere agree that the established usage is that an accomplice duly admitted as a witness in a criminal prosecution against his associates in guilt, if he testifies fully and fairly, will not be prosecuted for the same offense, and some of the decided cases and standard text-writers give very satisfactory explanations of the origin and scope of the usage in its ordinary application in actual practice.

The COURT. What point are you now making to the court?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I am making this point: It appears from the evidence that Mr. Wilshire, the attorney of Mr. Rerdell told him at the time he was making up his mind whether he would go to the Government or not, about the whisky cases. I make the point that when an accomplice turns State's evidence the State cannot prosecute him after that if he testifies fully and fairly; that the usage is immemorial, and that there is not an exception in the records of all the cases in the books; consequently that when Mr. Merrick told him, "You must look simply to the Government and to the court and you will have just exactly what the law gives you and no more," his remarks meant that the law gave him perfect immunity, provided he went upon the stand and swore truthfully.

The COURT. You have demonstrated, as far as you have been able to, that he has not sworn truthfully.

Mr. INGERSOLL. He has not; HE HAS NOT; and if the Government will act fairly with him he will get no immunity.

Now, on page 602:

Other text-writers of the highest repute, besides those previously mentioned, affirm the rule that accomplices, though admitted as witnesses for the prosecution, are not of right entitled to a pardon; that they have only an equitable right to a recommendation to the executive clemency; and they all hold that prisoners under such circumstances cannot plead such right in bar of an indictment against them, nor avail themselves of it as a defense on their trial.

None of these propositions can be successfully controverted, but it is equally clear that the party, if he testifies fully and fairly, may make it the ground of a motion to put off the trial in order that he may apply to the executive for the protection which immemorial usage concedes that he is entitled to at the hands of the executive.

There he quotes 3 Russell on Crimes (9th American Edition), page 597.

When he went to the Government he understood the law to be that if he swore fully and fairly, or if he swore in such a way that they could not prove that he did not swear fully and fairly, he was to have immunity. He understood that the more he swore against the defendants the better was his chance for immunity. He knew that the Government would never complain of any lie he swore against the defendants.

Now, the next question is what is the law of accomplices, of informers? There was a remark made by Mr. Bliss in his speech, that they had plenty of evidence in this case without the testimony of Mr. Walsh or Mr. Moore or Mr. Rerdell; plenty of evidence without the testimony of Mr. Rerdell. If that had been so then the Government had no right to put Mr. Rerdell on the stand. There is but one excuse for using the testimony of a man who pleads guilty, and that is that without his testimony a conviction cannot, in all probability, be obtained. And upon that point I refer to 10 Pickering, 478, and to 9 Cowen, 711; and not only upon that point, but upon the point I made at first, that whenever you put such a man upon the stand that of itself amounts to a promise of absolute immunity:

The object of admitting the evidence of accomplices is in order to effect the discovery and punishment of crimes which cannot be proved against the offenders without the aid of an accomplice's testimony. In order to prevent this entire failure of justice recourse is had to the evidence of accomplices.—1 Phillips on Evidence., 107.

If, therefore, there be sufficient evidence to convict without his testimony, the court will refuse to admit him as a witness.—Roscoe's Criminal Evidence, 127.

Neither do I believe that Mr. Rerdell had a right to go upon the stand until his case was finally disposed of. Precisely the same language is used by Wharton on Criminal Evidence, 439:

The law confesses its weakness by calling in the assistance of those by whom it has been broken. It offers a premium to treachery, and destroys the last virtue which clings to the degraded transgressor. On the other hand, it tends to prevent any extensive agreement among atrocious criminals, makes them perpetually suspicious of each other and prevents the hopelessness of mercy from rendering them desperate.—Chitty's Criminal Law, 82.

The admission of accomplices as witnesses for the Government is justified by the necessity of the case, it being often impossible to bring the principal offenders to justice without them.—Greenleaf on Evidence, 379.

Obviously, in general, the least guilty morally and least hardened of several participants should be selected as State's evidence. And it should appear probable that his testimony will secure a conviction, which, without it, cannot be presumably had.—Bishop on Criminal Procedure, 1162.

An accomplice is used by the Government because his evidence is necessary to a conviction.

That is the opinion of Mr. Justice McLean, in 4 McLean's Circuit Court Reports, 103.

An accomplice, although a competent witness against the associates and partners of his guilt, is nevertheless only admissible from reasons of judicial necessity and policy, and in furtherance of the essential ends of public justice.—People vs. Whipple, 9 Cowen's Reports, 707.

I also refer to the case of Ray vs. The State, 1 Iowa, 316, in which the court says:

The rule appears to have prevailed in England that an accomplice could not be permitted to testify without first obtaining an order from the court (Criminal Circuit Court Cases, page 51). The reason of this rule is that courts will not permit a resort to testimony so foul unless the exigencies of the case imperiously require it; and even then they will exercise discretion with great caution, unless the witness can be corroborated with other testimony. Besides an implied pardon is held out to the witness, which ought not to be done unless justice can be promoted by a punishment of the greater offender by extending a pardon to the one less tainted with guilt.

We think the safer practice is not to permit an accomplice to be brought into court as a witness without an order of the court for that purpose, and that the application ought to show: 1st, that there is no other witness by whom the offense can be proved; 2d, that the witness is not more guilty than the person on trial; and 3d, that the testimony can be substantially corroborated.

The COURT. What authority is that?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Ray vs. The People, 1 Iowa, 316.

The COURT. It is not the law of this court. According to that decision the court would have to try the other offenders and decide both the law and fact before coming to the consideration of the question whether this witness was admissible or not. It is a question addressed to the discretion of the prosecuting officer. If he thinks the witness is necessary the court will not interfere with his management of the case.

Mr. MERRICK. If not improper I may remark that all those cases refer to a condition of things prior to the trial in which the party appears as the witness.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The usual question is—and the court determines that question—whether a man shall be a witness or not.

The COURT. How can the court determine that without passing upon the evidence in the case? That is not the duty of the court; it belongs to the jury.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The prosecuting attorney has to pass upon that himself when he makes up his mind to put him upon the stand; and he only has the right to do that when he believes that no conviction can be had without that testimony.

The COURT. Then it belongs to the prosecuting attorney.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I go further than that, and say that the prosecuting attorney cannot do that without consultation with the court, and without saying to the court that he believes no conviction can be had without that testimony.

The next point I make is that the jury must take the entire testimony of the accomplice or must throw it entirely away.

Mr. MERRICK. May I be allowed to suggest a point which probably you would like to comment upon—that all these cases refer to accomplices prior to the trial. My own opinion in reference to the case was that I would not put Rerdell upon the stand until he had pleaded guilty.

The COURT. I do not see the ground for the distinction between the cases, but I am very clear that that Iowa case is not to be regarded as authority by me on this trial. Undoubtedly, when an accomplice goes over to the Government and offers his testimony, he does it always in the hope of pardon or immunity from prosecution. It needs no citation of Judge Clifford's opinion or any other decision to show that that is always the hope of the accomplice.

Mr. MERRICK. Certainly.

The COURT. He expects, of course, that he will not be prosecuted further, and the jury are to accept his testimony with that understanding.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is all I want at present.

Mr. MERRICK. I have not denied that.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I want it understood, if the court please, that I shall argue to the jury that at the time he made up his mind to go to the Government, he understood that that meant immunity.

The COURT. Oh, well, of course it did.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The next point is that the court have to take all his story or none; and I read from the second volume of Starkie on Evidence, side-page 24:

In judging of the credit due to the testimony of an accomplice, it seems to be a necessary principle that his testimony must be wholly received as that of a credible witness or wholly rejected. His evidence on points where he is confirmed by unimpeachable evidence is useless. The question is whether he is to be believed upon points where he received no confirmation. And of this the jury are to form their opinion from the nature of the testimony, his manner of delivering it, and the confirmation which it receives derived from other evidence which is unsuspected. If his character be established as a witness of truth, he is credible in matters where he is not corroborated. If, on the other hand, notwithstanding the corroboration upon particular points, doubts and suspicions still remain as to his credit, his whole testimony becomes useless.

That is the point I want to make. If they are only to take his evidence where it is corroborated, they might as well have had the corroboration in the first place without him.

Now, gentlemen, the evidence, in my judgment, shows, and shows beyond a doubt—and I believe it is now admitted—that at the time Mr. Rerdell made up his mind to go to the Government he expected that he was to have absolute immunity. You must judge of his evidence in the light of that fact, in the light of that knowledge, in the light of what had been told him by his counsel. Now, it is for you to say. You know something of this man. You have seen him from day to day. You saw his manner upon the stand. Why, they tell you that at one time he was overcome with emotion, and that that is evidence that he was telling the truth. It may be that there is left in that man some little spark of goodness still. When he was swearing, or endeavoring to swear, away the liberty of the man who had been his friend, may be at that time the memory of the past did for a moment rush upon him. He may have remembered the thousand acts of kindness; he may have remembered the years of liberality; he may have remembered the days that he had spent beneath that hospitable roof; he may have remembered the wife and children; he may have remembered all these things, and for just that moment he may have realized what a wretch he was. In no other way can you account for his having emotion.

But I am about through with that gentleman. I shall not take up your time in the remainder of my speech by commenting upon Mr. Rerdell. Let us finish his testimony now; let us put him out of sight; let us put him in his coffin, close the lid, nail it down:

First nail—affidavit of June 20, 1881; drive it in.

Second nail—the letter of July 5, 1882, when he says that affidavit of 1881 was made by the persuasion of Bosler; drive it in.

Third nail—affidavit of July 13, 1882, where he swears that they were all perfectly innocent.

Fourth nail—the pencil memorandum; drive that in.

Fifth nail—the tabular statement that gave 33½ per cent. to Brady; drive it in.

Sixth nail—his pretended letter to Bosler telling about the advice of Brady; drive that in.

Seventh nail—the letter he pretends that Dorsey, on the 13th of May, 1879, wrote to Bosler, the copies being made by Miss White; drive that in.

Wind his corpse up in the balance-sheets from the red books made by Donnelly.

Then you want a plate for his coffin. Let us paste right on there the Chico letter, April 3, 1878.

Now, we want grave-stones. Let us take the red books, put one at his head and one at his feet.

And let his epitaph, written upon the red book placed at his head, be—

Up to this moment I have been faithful to every trust.

My prayer to Gabriel is, “When you pass over that grave, don’t blow.” [Laughter.]

Mr. DONALDSON (the crier). Come to order, gentlemen.

The COURT. Speak to the ladies.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Let him sleep. There are, there never were, there never will be twelve honest men who will deprive any citizen of his liberty upon the evidence of a man like Mr. Rerdell. It never happened; it never will.

And now, gentlemen, it becomes my duty to answer a few points made by the gentlemen who have addressed you on behalf of the Government. The first gentleman who addressed you was Mr. Ker, and he had something to say—considerable to say—about what are known as the Clendenning bonds.

They claim, gentlemen, first, that an immense fraud was in view when these proposals—I think they are proposals—with accompanying bonds and oaths of sureties were sent to Mr. Clendenning. I wish to give you, in the first place, my explanation of this paper. See if I understand it. If you sent this paper to that officer or to that gentleman as a form to guide him in making up the bonds, you would only fill up that portion of the bond in giving him a sample which you wanted him to fill up, and you would fill it up in order to show him exactly how he was to fill it up; and you would leave out that part which was already filled up in the bond. That is exactly what was done in this case. There was not one of those bonds that had an oath of the surety or the names of the sureties, because they were unknown. The names were unknown, and the amounts that the postmaster would certify to, and so all that was left in blank in the bond sent. But this being only a sample, it was sent to him so that he might know how to fill up the bonds that were sent. Consequently that portion which was absolutely blank in the bond sent would be filled up as a guide to him, and that portion which was filled up in the bonds sent would be left blank in the guide, because he had nothing to do with that part. Now, that is all there is to it.

What was left out, as they claim? Why, they claim that the name of the bidder was left out and the amount of the bid. It makes no difference. That is not the slightest evidence of fraud, is it?

What was the next thing? They were never used, never. No bond included in that bundle was ever accepted by the Government. No bonds were ever made, no contract ever based upon them, not a solitary cent taken from the Government by those papers. Why, then, this secrecy? Because when a man is in this business he does not want anybody else to know that he is bidding, in the first place; and, in the second place, he does not want anybody to know the amount of the bid. If the amount of the bid is put in, then the persons going security will know it, and they may tell. The postmaster who approves the security will know it, and he may tell. The object of the secrecy is not to defraud the Government, but to prevent other people finding the amount of the bid and then underbidding. That is the object, and it is the only object. And yet this little, poor, dried-up bond, soaked in the water of suspicion, swells almost to bursting in the minds of the counsel for the prosecution. There is nothing of it. It was never worthy of mention, in the first place. You will never think of it when you retire. It will never enter your minds; but if it does, remember that the object of the secrecy was simply as a precaution against other bidders, and had nothing whatever to do with the Government.

There is one other point. I believe Mr. Dorsey did say, in his examination-in-chief, that he did not talk to anybody about it, and it afterwards occurred that he did go and ask Mr. Edmunds whether what he had asked Clendenning to do was illegal or improper. To that contradiction you are welcome.

Mr. Ker gives the date of Boone's circular to postmasters asking for information, and says it was dated December 1, 1879. Thereupon Mr. Merrick corrects him, and says it was in 1878. The court does the same. As a matter of fact, these circulars were dated December, 1877. Gentlemen, I just simply speak of this to show how easy it is for people to be mistaken. Those circulars were gotten up for the purpose of getting information before bidding. All the bids were put in in February, 1878. The circulars were sent out, I believe, in November and December, 1877. And yet upon that one point Mr. Ker is mistaken two years.

On page 4512 Mr. Ker states that Miner, in April, 1878, said to Moore that it all depended upon affidavits of the contractors, and that "they were all good affidavit men." The object of this, if it had an object, was to show that this conspiracy was entered into with Moore, and that S. W. Dorsey was a part of it in April, 1878. The evidence of Moore is that the conversation took place, not in April, but in July, 1878, at the city of Denver. And yet Mr. Ker tells you that it was in April, 1878. It is not, perhaps, a very material point, but it simply serves to show you the manner in which this evidence is repeated to you by the counsel for the prosecution.

At page 4537 Mr. Ker says that before J. W. Dorsey went West he made an arrangement with his brother to sell out his interest for $10,000; that he did this before he started West; that he did it before there was any service put on; and that these contracts were taken at such low figures; yet John W. Dorsey had raised his interest up to $10,000. Mr. Ker tells you that the evidence shows that before any service was put on and before John W. Dorsey went West he tried to sell out his interest for $10,000. Now, what was the object in making this statement, unless it was pure forgetfulness? Why it was to connect Vaile with this business some time in April, 1878.

On pages 4100 and 4102 J. W. Dorsey swears that he was here in Washington in November, 1878; before that time he had gone to the Tongue River route; he had come back from Bismarck; and it was then, not in April; it was then, not before he went West; it was then, not before any service was put on, that he talked with Vaile about selling out to him for $10,000; and it was in November that he left the instructions for his brother to sell to Vaile. It was not in April; it was not before he went West; it was not before any service was put on.

At page 4540 Mr. Ker states that—

Dorsey held thirty-three routes, and there was not one of them, I suppose, that was not expedited to the fullest extent.

What evidence is there of that? Is there any evidence that any route of Dorsey's was expedited not mentioned in this indictment? Did not Mr. Ker know whether the routes had been expedited or not? Did not I offer in this court to prove what was done with every solitary route we had? I say to the gentleman that the other routes were not expedited. I say to the gentleman that only two other routes were, and we were not interested in them. And I say also that they know the record, and they knew the record when this statement was made; but they may have forgotten it. But is it fair, gentlemen, for a prosecuting officer to state to you that he supposed all the routes of Dorsey were expedited? One of those in the indictment was not expedited; and not a route outside of the indictment belonging to Dorsey, in which he had an interest, was expedited. So much for that statement.

Mr. Ker informs you that in the latter part of April, 1878, there was a quarrel because of Vaile's coming in and filing his subcontracts. (Page 4542). Vaile did not come in in April, 1878. The contract by which he did come in was dated the 16th day of August, 1878, and executed, as a matter of fact, in the following September or October. The quarrel, gentlemen, did not occur until December, 1878. And yet Mr. Ker tells you that that quarrel was in April, 1878. This is testified to by Vaile, by Miner, by S. W. Dorsey; and the contract that was put in evidence shows that Vaile had no interest at least until the date of that contract, which was the 16th of August. You will find also, gentlemen, that it was in August that Brady telegraphed to Vaile and asked him what service he was going to put on. Now, was this said for the purpose of getting all these defendants together in April, 1878, instead of December, 1878, or April, 1879? And were you so told that they had a quarrel in April, when all the testimony shows that it was in December, simply to get these parties together eight months earlier? I think gentlemen who state evidence to the jury ought to state it as nearly correct as they possibly can. Mr. Ker may have done so, but he has been exceedingly unfortunate in his attempt.

Mr. KER. Now, if your honor please, I wish to make no personal statement, but I read the evidence to the jury, and I am not responsible for a misprint. I find that I said:

In the last part of April, 1878, there was a quarrel because of Vaile's coming in and filing the subcontracts. I read from page 4168—

And there it explicitly states December.

The COURT. I have observed throughout this whole trial that that was a habit, of Mr. Ker particularly, stating one month or one year for another in the heat or excitement of argument. He was thinking of one thing or one date and probably would mention another. We are liable to make mistakes of that kind. Although I have no doubt that Mr. Ker knew the facts, yet I understood that these slips were inadvertent.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Whether inadvertent or not——

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] He read the testimony, and it is there.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Then if he read it, he indorsed it; he read it on his side; he indorsed it as true when he read it as authority.

Mr. BLISS. It says December, 1878.

Mr. KER. I have given you what I said. In the very next paragraph the correct date is given, in December. Vaile came in in August; and they made up their agreement in October; and in December there was a quarrel. I did not give it as my own version; I read the testimony taken from the record.

The COURT. It was manifestly an inadvertence.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Very well, I have the right to answer an inadvertence.

The COURT. Yes.

Mr. INGERSOLL. When they state that it is in April, and all the evidence shows that it was in December, I have the right to answer.

The COURT. The counsel, at the same time he committed the inadvertence, read the evidence which showed that it was an inadvertence.

Mr. MERRICK. The evidence is a part of his statement, a paramount part, and he merely stated his construction of it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Very well; we will see.

At page 4546 you are told by Mr. Ker that—— Nobody ever heard of expedition on a route before.

The report of the Postmaster-General of November 18, 1882, gives a list of expedited routes commencing in 1872.

Mr. BLISS. I object to that. We tried to put in that report, and it was ruled out on their objection. I submit that they cannot refer to it now in arguing to the jury.

The COURT. There was no such evidence admitted. Since this argument began there has been some reference made to one case of expedition in 1876.

Mr. BLISS. I waived the objection.

The COURT. There was an effort to waive an objection to it, but it was not admitted in evidence. There was a report made to Congress containing a reference to that one case in 1876, and Mr. Bliss proposed that all the papers in that case be put in evidence out of time and out of place, but that was not done; so that the only thing we have on that subject is that report of that case in 1876.

Mr. WILSON. More than that, your honor——

Mr. INGERSOLL. [Interposing.] I will answer, in a word: If there was no evidence what right had Mr. Ker to make the statement that expedition was never known until that time?

Now, I will take the next step. We proved what form of contracts had been in the Post-Office Department for twenty years, and proved that in every one of them there was a clause for expedition. So much for that evidence, gentlemen.

At page 4546 Mr. Ker tells us that J. W. Dorsey testified——

That the routes were taken so low as to cut out other people, but that they knew they were to be expedited, and they knew they were to be increased.

J. W. Dorsey testified upon that subject, and his testimony will be found at page 4085:

Q. Did you have an arrangement by which you should bid an extremely small amount on the routes, with the further understanding that the service was to be increased and expedited?—A. No, sir; I never thought of such a thing.

And in his entire testimony in chief and cross, I believe there is not another question on that subject. Mr. Ker says:

John Dorsey has given the explanation that the routes were taken so low as to cut out other people, but that they knew they were to be expedited.

It may be said that does not apply to his testimony. Let me read the next line:

Now, I have given you this general outline of what has been testified to by the different people who were engaged in this conspiracy.

On page 4549, referring to the letter of John M. Peck, which was in fact written by Miner, Mr. Ker says:

Cedarville ought to have had as many mails as the other points between, according to the order, but they were going to supply it only once a week.

As a matter of fact, gentlemen, this letter was written on the 22d of October, 1878, and at the time the letter was written the mail, according to the contract, was carried only once a week on that route, and consequently Cedarville would have had exactly the same mail as any other point; that is to say, once a week.

Page 556 of the record shows that three trips a week were put upon this route to Loup City with a schedule of thirteen hours, but not until the 10th of July, 1879, nine months after this letter was written.

On page 4609 Mr. Ker, in commenting upon an affidavit on the Toquerville and Adairville route, reads from the evidence of John W. Dorsey, citing page 3945, and ends at this question and answer:

Q. It was done so entirely, was it not?—A. It ought to have been so.

Now, let me read you the balance:

Q. Was it not so done?—A. No, sir.

Q. It was not?—A. No, sir.

Q. For whose benefit was it done?—A. He—

Meaning Rerdell—stole $5,000 on that route, or very nearly that—$4,900 on that very route.

Q. When did he steal that $5,000?—A. About a year ago or a year and a half; I don't remember the time.

Q. From whom?—A. From Mr. Bosler and myself.

Q. At what time?—A. I should think in February, 1882.

The question now arises, did Mr. Rerdell take this money as charged? Read now from the record, at pages 734 and 735, and you will find in the last line of the tabular statement introduced in this case that on this very route $4,827.83 was paid to M. C. Rerdell as subcontractor on that route. We also find that it was paid on the 4th of February, 1882. This is the money that Dorsey swears Rerdell stole, and that gentleman never took the stand to deny it.

At page 4616, Mr Ker, after going all over the evidence with regard to the affidavits as to the impossibility of the number of men and horses doing the service rendered necessary by the affidavit, comes to the following conclusion: That under the oath the proportion was as 9 to 23; that under the oath of Johnson the real proportion should have been and was as 8 to 22. In other words, the real proportion, according to Mr. Ker's own statement, would have taken more money from the Treasury than the wrong proportion made under the fraudulent affidavit, and that was as 9 to 23. 9 into 23 goes twice and five-ninths; that is, 255 per cent. and a fraction. That is the fraudulent proportion. Mr. Ker says that the real proportion was not as 9 into 23, but as 8 to 22. 8 into 22 goes twice and six-eighths; that is to say, $2\frac{3}{4}$; that is to say, 275 per cent. The fraudulent proportion, according to his claim, only gave us 255 per cent. The real proportion, which Mr. Ker admits was right, according to the evidence of Johnson, would have given us 275 per cent. In other words, we got 20 per cent. less under the fraud than we would under the evidence of Johnson that Mr. Ker admits to be correct. Finding that it is 20 per cent. less under the fraudulent affidavit than under Johnson's estimate, he shouts fraud.

On page 4617 Mr. Ker tells us that Sanderson "had no more to do with the route than you or I had." On page 731 I find that Mr. Sanderson drew all the money on the route from Saguache to Lake City, I believe, with one exception—the third quarter of one year—1878, it may be. He drew every dollar upon that route, anyhow, up to February 17, 1882, except for one quarter. And yet Mr. Ker stood up before you and said that Sanderson "had no more to do with the route than you or I had."

Let us see if we have any more evidence. I find on page 3271 a subcontract executed on route 38150, from Saguache to Lake City, by Miner, Peck & Co. to Sanderson for the whole time until June 30, 1882. I find that subcontract is signed by John R. Miner and J. L. Sanderson. This contract was to be from the 1st of July, 1878, and was made the 15th of May, 1878, and here it is in evidence. The evidence is that the contract was made between Miner, Peck & Co. and Sanderson; the evidence also is that Sanderson drew the pay. And yet Mr. Ker stands up before you and says that Sanderson "had no more to do with the route than you or I had."

The subcontract, gentlemen, states that Sanderson is to have the entire pay, and it was before the contract term began. So much for that.

Mr. KER. When was it filed?

Mr. WILSON. That does not make any difference.

Mr. INGERSOLL. "When was it filed?" There was a trial in my town of a suit against the city, I believe, for allowing a culvert to get filled up and flood a man's cellar. They brought in evidence to prove, don't you see, that the culvert was not filled up, and one witness swore that the day before the rain he saw a dog go through there. One of the jurors got up and said that he would like to ask a question; he said, "What was the color of that dog?" [Laughter.]

On page 4631 Mr. Ker states that during the investigation by Congress—

Contractors got out printed letters and sent them to every subcontractor upon every star route in the country, asking them to write to their members of Congress urging their members of Congress to vote for this appropriation.

On page 1346 is Rerdell's letter upon this very route, in which not one word is said about the contractor doing anything one way or the other. There is no evidence that any other letter was written on that route. I call your attention to it to show how the prosecution strained every possible point, and how they endeavored to patch and piece and putty and veneer this evidence. Mr. Miner wrote a letter (page 669). I do not remember any other evidence upon this subject. And certainly it would be impossible to write a milder letter than Mr. Miner wrote. He did not ask the people to get up petitions against reduction, or ask for more service. Here is what he says, and I will read you Mr. Miner's letter :

It will be well for the people of your section to send to the member of Congress from your district such petitions as will express their opinions on the subject of this reduction.

Truly, yours,

JNO. R. MINER, Ag't.

Could you write a milder letter than that, to save your life, and refer to the subject? Could you write a fairer letter than that, to save your life? He simply says :

It will be well for the people of your section to send to the member of Congress from your district such petitions as will express their opinions on the subject of this reduction.

He does not say, "Get up petitions against it." He does not say, "Send those petitions to your member of Congress and tell him to do what he can to prevent it." Not one word of that kind. He simply says to send—

Such petitions as will express their opinions on the subject of this reduction

Yet that is considered as evidence of fraud; that is considered as evidence of conspiracy.

The next point made is that Mr. Ker states, at page 4632, that Brady endeavored to bribe the members of Congress into making this appropriation by doubling every star route in the Southern and Middle States, and did so during the Congressional investigation. What are the facts? The deficiency bill passed April 7, 1880. That appropriated money only for the purpose of carrying the mails up to June 30, 1880. The regular appropriation bill was passed at the same session, and appropriated money to carry the mails from the 1st of July, 1880. Now let us see if Brady doubled the trips in these Southern and Middle States during that investigation. On page 3393 Brady says :

Practically on July 1, 1880, we doubled up the entire service for all the Southern and Middle States.

This was after the deficiency bill had passed; it was after the money appropriated by that bill had been expended; and it was paid for out of the regular appropriation for the Post-Office Department.

Yet that was a bribe. It just shows that Congress by the regular appropriation indorsed the policy of Mr. Key to have a daily mail to every place where there was a county-seat.

At page 4652, on the route from Mineral Park to Pioche, there were two petitions, marked 17 K and 18 K. It is somewhat singular that the Government brought no persons whose names are on these petitions to show that they had not authorized their names to be signed thereto, but they brought persons to show that the signatures were not genuine.

On page 1621 the witness Wright swears that the names are the same on both petitions. He is then asked if he knows the signatures of any other people, and he says "Yes." He then says that the signature of John Deland is not genuine. He swears that he knows nearly every one of the people. He is then asked whether these signatures are in the handwriting of the people, and he replies that he thinks not. Then he is asked as to the signature of Cornell, and he says :

That is not in his handwriting.

Here is his cross-examination, gentlemen :

Q. Do you know James Stevens?—A. Yes, sir.

- Q. Do you know his handwriting?—A. No, sir.
- Q. Do you know J. Logan?—A. Yes, sir.
- Q. Do you know his handwriting?—A. Yes, sir.
- Q. Is that his signature?—A. I think it is, sir.
- Q. Do you know Joseph Mercer?—A. Yes, sir.
- Q. Is that his handwriting?—A. I do not know his handwriting.
- Q. Do you know Charles N. McLean?—A. Yes, sir.
- Q. Do you think that is his signature?—A. I am not acquainted with it.
- Q. Do you know Mr. Morrow?—Yes, sir.
- Q. Is that his signature?—A. I do not know his signature.
- Q. Do you know Kimble Bros.?—A. Very well, sir.
- Q. Is that their signature?—A. I believe so.
- Q. Do you know T. B. Shipp?—A. Yes, sir.
- Q. Is that his signature?—A. I believe so.
- Q. Do you know W. A. Hartt?—A. I know him. I do not know his signature.
- Q. Do you know J. M. McArthur?—A. Yes, sir; but not his signature.
- Q. Do you know Mr. J. Kinsley?—A. I do not know his signature.
- Q. Do you know Henry Goble?—A. I do not know him.
- Q. Do you know R. McClure?—A. I know him.
- Q. Is that his signature?—A. I think so.
- Q. Do you know anybody by the name of J. W. Prendergast?—A. Yes, sir; I know him.
- Q. Is that his signature?—A. I am not acquainted with it.
- Q. Do you know C. E. Warner?—A. I am not acquainted with his signature. He has been dead a good many years.
- Q. Do you mean before 1878?—A. No, sir.
- Q. Do you know N. W. Clark?—A. I believe that to be his signature, sir.
- Q. J. R. Smith?—A. I do not know him.
- Q. John Telford?—A. I do not know him.
- Q. Ira Duncan?—A. I know him.
- Q. Is that his signature?—A. I do not think it is.
- Q. Do you know M. B. King?—A. I know him, but I do not know his signature.
- Q. On the second page, you will recollect here are eleven names which you stated you thought were in the same handwriting. Do you know in whose handwriting they are?—A. I do not, sir.
- Q. You are not acquainted with it?—A. No, sir.
- Q. The next five names appear also to be in one handwriting. Do you know Mr. Street?—A. Very well, sir.
- Q. Mr. Cornell?—A. Very well, sir.
- Q. Mr. Despain?—A. Very well.
- Q. J. Boner and John Boner?—A. I know both the Boners.
- Q. Do you know their writing?—A. Yes, sir.
- Q. And Street's?—A. Yes, sir.
- Q. And Cornell's?—A. Yes, sir.
- Q. And you say these are not their signatures?—A. I think that is the signature of Mr. Street only.
- Q. You say that is Mr. Street's signature?—A. Yes, sir.
- Mr. INGERSOLL. I will let the jury judge whether he wrote them all.
- Q. What kind of a man is Mr. Street?—A. An attorney at law.
- Q. Where does he live?—A. Tombstone, Arizona.
- Q. Where did he live in 1878?—A. At Signal.
- Q. What is that name? [Indicating.]—A. John Falvey.
- Q. Who is he?—A. He is an old gentleman; a notary public and justice of the peace.
- Q. At Signal?—A. No, at Cedar Valley mining district.
- Q. Was he a justice of the peace at that time?—A. He has been for a great many years, and I think at that time was justice of the peace.
- Q. Who is Mr. Jerome?—A. A miner, sir.
- Q. Do you know him?—A. Very well, sir.
- Q. Do you know Mr. Clark?—A. Yes, sir; he is a rancher.
- Q. What kind of a man is Mr. Clark?—A. A man of very high character, indeed, sir.
- The COURT. Do you say that is Mr. Clark's signature?
- The WITNESS. Yes, sir.
- Q. I hand you another paper marked 12 P, old number, and will ask you if you find on the face that it bears the signature of Mr. Clark?—A. Yes, sir.
- Q. Do you think that to be his genuine signature?—A. I do, sir.
- Q. You find also the name of Mr. Jerome?—A. Yes, sir.
- Q. Is that genuine?—A. I think it is, sir.
- Q. You find also that of John Falvey?—A. I think that a genuine signature.

Q. And Mr. Logan's. Is that genuine?—A. I think so, sir.

Q. Do you know Mr. Hœbel?—A. Yes, sir; I know them both.

Q. Do you know whether that is his signature or not?—A. I think not, sir. I am not well enough acquainted to say.

Q. You would not state it was not?—A. No, sir.

Q. I will ask you if the first eleven names after the first three names appear to be in the same handwriting?

Here are the two petitions, gentlemen (17 K and 18 K). You remember them. They are substantially the same, and I believe they are exactly the same, though I will not say that positively. The names are written substantially in the same order and substantially by the same hand. Now, I proved nearly all of these men whose names are written by somebody else, and the Government did not produce a solitary one of these men to show that he did not authorize his name to be written upon that petition. There they were. I asked him, "Do you know these people;" made him swear that he knew Mr. Street; that he knew the signatures of many; that he knew these people. I proved where they were living; that they are living in the country now, good, respectable, honest people. And yet the Government did not bring one man whose name had been written here to prove that he had not authorized it. Why? Because they could not. They knew by the testimony here that the petitions were absolutely and perfectly honest. And it is in that way that they seek to deprive men of their liberty. They did not call a man whose name appeared on those petitions to say that his signature was not genuine or not authorized. I proved that many of them are still living and first-rate men.

Now, gentlemen, you remember besides that, that Mr. H. S. Stevens, the Delegate from that Territory, recommended the same thing asked for by those petitions (pages 1635, 1636), where it was admitted by counsel for the Government that the letters of Stevens were genuine. It is upon that same route that General Frémont also wrote a letter (page 1636). And I will show you that the names are exactly or substantially the same on 18 K as those found at pages 1638 and 1639.

Mr. Ker and Mr. Bliss both endeavored to show that there were no petitions on this route, and that it was simply done on a letter. If you will look at page 1603 you will find the evidence of Mr. Krider, who was postmaster at Mineral Park, in which he says there were petitions.

In order to show that there was a conspiracy between these parties, or between Dorsey and Vaile, or Dorsey, Rerdell, and Vaile, Mr. Ker called the attention of the jury to two letters, one written by Rerdell to the Sixth Auditor, and one written by Vaile. Here is a letter dated the 21st of August, 1880. It is introduced, of course, to show that there was a conspiracy at that time between Mr. Vaile and Mr. Dorsey. It was written by Mr. Rerdell to the Sixth Auditor:

To the SIXTH AUDITOR:

SIR: H. M. Vaile was subcontractor on route 40104 during the first quarter of 1879.

In the first settlement for that quarter Vaile was paid for certain expedited service—it was subsequently discovered that the expedition thus paid for was never performed—the department, therefore, and very properly, too, charged back to the route the amount thus paid for expedition never performed, viz, some $2,800.

Meanwhile Vaile, who alone was in fault, had ceased to have any connection with the route—the charging back, therefore, fell on the wrong man, the man who was in no way responsible for the non-performance of the expedition, except so far as he stood between the department and the subcontractor.

It is true that this payment was made by the regular contractor to the subcontractor, but it is equally true that it was, in a measure, a compulsory payment. By the rules of the Post-Office Department it is made obligatory on the regular contractor to pay the subcontractor before the department will settle with him—it is not, therefore, a payment as between two individuals. The receipt is on the form prescribed by the Post-Office Department, and is witnessed by (the then) Postmaster Edmunds, as the rules prescribe. It is on file in the Post-Office Department, and I maintain that our covenants were fulfilled when we put the receipt on file. If Vaile had performed the service as he agreed he would do, and for to do which he received this money, we should have been reimbursed by a certificate of service from the contract office. Now, will you permit Vaile to take advantage of his own wrong, and thus enable him to defraud another man out of his money.

I refrain from discussing the question as to what would be the duty of the department if Vaile, who had received the money wrongfully, had ceased to have any connection with the department, because it is not pertinent to this issue; if it were, I could cite you to many authorities and precedents to the effect that even then it would be your duty to refund the money to me. But this is not necessary, because Vaile is still doing business with the department.

He is subcontractor on route 44156 for the full contract pay, which is $22,000 per annum, hence the department will have no difficulty in reimbursing itself for what was, in simple truth, an overpayment.

I think you will agree with me when I ask that this money be refunded to the subcontractor on route 40104 and charged to route 44156, because it is simply correcting an error. You have the same authority to charge it to one as you have to charge it to the other, and you have already charged it to me.

The law-merchant would experience no difficulty in adjusting a matter of this sort. The merchant who would refuse to correct an error of this character would be justly called a lame duck, and would be scouted from "Change." Vaile was erroneously paid for the performance of a service which he never did perform. Therefore I ask that he be compelled to render unto Cæsar the things that he ceasers.

Respectfully,

M. C. RERDELL,

Acting for himself and for the regular contractor on route 40104.

That is to show also, gentlemen, that there was a conspiracy between Vaile and Rerdell. Now Mr. Vaile wrote a letter also to the same man. I will read it:

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 9, 1880.

Hon. J. M. MCGREW:

SIR: In reply to yours of July 8th, relating to the Jennings case, I would state that I did not receive the money in manner and form as stated by one M. C. Rerdell, nor was the draft of J. W. Dorsey, on said route 40104, for the quarter named, to get an advance of money for myself or for my own use.

At the time I receipted for my pay as subcontractor on said route I did not, in fact, receive any money, but did so receipt that J. W. Dorsey might negotiate his draft on said route, and for no other purpose.

Although I was subcontractor of record on said route at the time named, I was not a subcontractor in my own behalf, but as trustee for J. W. Dorsey, S. W. Dorsey, Isaac Jennings, and others, to collect said money and pay it over as said parties should direct. I further state that all money that ever came into my hands from said route I did pay over to the parties named as trustee, as by them directed.

Acting as trustee of said Jennings, and believing that he had performed the mail service on said route as by him agreed, and in accordance with the laws and regulations of the Post-Office Department, I did pay said Jennings, on the 1st day of April, 1879, the sum of $1,257.73, the sum of money he was entitled to provided he had carried the mail three times per week on the schedule required, which I fully believed at that time he had done, and for a long time after.

I further state that I am informed that said Jennings is not responsible; that it would be utterly impossible for me to receive back the $2,800, or any part thereof; that in fact this sum of money sought to be collected of me, if collected for said Jennings's benefit, or go into his hands in addition to the sum he now has unlawfully, doubly remunerating him for his neglect of duty.

I further state that all the money collected on said route not paid to said Jennings was paid to liquidate the debts of J. W. Dorsey, S. W. Dorsey, and others previously contracted, and not one dollar ever remained in my hands.

I further state I believe both J. W. Dorsey and S. W. Dorsey are irresponsible, and it would be impossible for me to collect any part of said money from them. As above stated, said money came into my hand only as their agent or trustee, and at once paid out as they directed; that my subcontract was put on file simply to enable J. W. Dorsey to negotiate his draft on said route, when in fact said Jennings was the real subcontractor. Said Jennings agreed to perform the service on said route strictly in accordance with the laws and regulations of the department, for the annual sum of $12,600.00, the duplicate of which contract was delivered over to S. W. Dorsey by myself, and which I believe is now in the hands of M. C. Rerdell, and which, or a copy thereof, I demand shall be filed with you in this case, that you may see what said Jennings agreed to do.

This is certainly a strange claim. Jennings agreed to perform mail service on said route. I believed he had done it, and paid him accordingly. It turns out long after he did not properly perform the service, but was attempting a swindle, and a deduction is ordered for not performing the service properly. Then this man, the guilty party, having got money from me, as trustee, wrongfully, as well as from the Government, and asks that the Auditor compel me to pay him the sum of $2,800.00, when, as I am informed, he is seeking to get this same deduction remitted.

Surely if he succeeded in all this he will make a good thing out of his rascality and I a good victim without remedy. I state again I did not hypothecate said draft for myself, did not receive one cent as subcontractor, but became the payee of said draft that said J. W. Dorsey might negotiate it, and I to dispose of the proceeds as he should direct, all of which I did. Therefore I request you not to compel me to pay the sum of money asked, but if I am liable at all let the parties seek their redress at law, where all the facts can be obtained and justice rendered me. And it is also well known that I am a man of means, and any judgment rendered against me could and would be collected, dollar for dollar.

I am, very respectfully,

H. M. VAILE.

That was introduced to show that at that time Vaile was in a conspiracy with S. W. Dorsey. Why did they introduce it? Simply for one line in it in which he says he was acting as the trustee of S. W. Dorsey. He was. How? Dorsey had advanced money. The routes were liable, and the persons who held the routes had agreed to refund it. The subcontracts were made to Vaile, and Vaile agreed out of the proceeds of the route to pay the debt to S. W. Dorsey. To that extent he was the trustee of S. W. Dorsey. Dorsey swears it. Vaile admits it, and we all claim it to be true. And yet they introduced that letter simply because that line was there. Now, gentlemen, I have read both of those letters, and I want you to remember them if you can, and tell me whether at that time Vaile and Dorsey were in a conspiracy together to defraud this Government. And yet the Government introduced this letter just to prove that one thing, and no more.

On the Julian and Colton route there is this peculiarity: The Government failed to prove the number of men and horses necessary on the original schedule for three-times-a-week service, and consequently we are left without any standard by which to judge; without any standard by which to measure.

On page 4685 Mr. Ker calls attention to the fact that the proposal marked 6 P, originally contained an offer to carry the mail at thirty-six hours for $7,722 additional, but he states that the thirty-six was rubbed out and twenty-six was put in its place.

That is, they offered to carry it in thirty-six hours for seven thousand and odd dollars, and then afterwards fraudulently, of course, rubbed out the thirty-six and inserted twenty-six. But they did not change the sum for which they offered to carry it. They offered to carry it in thirty-six hours for $7,722, and afterwards they rubbed out the thirty-six and put in twenty-six, and then offered to carry it in twenty-six hours for $7,722. The question arises, how did that hurt the Government? The question arises, was that a fraud? If it had been originally twenty-six hours and they had rubbed out those figures and put in thirty-six hours, then you might say the intention was to defraud the Government. But the proposition had to be accepted after that was done, and consequently in no event could the Government be defrauded by the change of the proposal before the Government accepted the proposal. I might say to a man, "I will let you have a house and lot for $10,000." He does not accept the proposal. Have I not the right on the next day to charge him $12,000 for it? Is that a fraud? If I tell him, "You may have it for $10,000," and he accepts, then, as an honorable man, I cannot change the proposal. But if I tell him he may have it for $12,000 and then afterwards tell him he may have it for $10,000, Mr. Ker calls that a fraud of $2,000. If one of the jury should give me a contract to deliver one hundred horses for $10,000, and I should scratch out the one hundred and put in seventy-five, certainly you would not consider yourself defrauded. Or if I agreed to carry the mail in thirty hours for the Government for $7,722, and then afterwards changed and said I would carry it in ten hours less time for the same price, can that be tortured into a fraud—unless I might be indicted for defrauding myself?

On page 4563 Mr. Ker, referring to a letter written on the 16th of April, 1879, to Brady, and signed with the name of Miner, but really written by Rerdell, states, pretending to quote the testimony of Rerdell:

Dorsey told me to write that letter and I wrote it, but it was written before the oath was made.

I have looked for that testimony. I cannot find it. The only evidence of Rerdell's I can find on the subject I find on page 2572, and there I cannot find anything about Dorsey having directed Rerdell to write a letter; but there he says:

I was directed to see Mr. Miner and get an affidavit.

I cannot find any evidence about being directed to write a letter. It may be there, but I cannot find it.

On page 4569 Mr. Ker says that Mr. Farrish, who was the subcontractor, says:

I always carried the mail in from six to ten hours before expedition. I carried the mail from Greenhorn to Pueblo. I did not stop at Saint Charles.

On page 835 Mr. Farrish says he carried the mail for three months in 1881. That is the only time Farrish carried the mail. This route was expedited on the 26th day of June, 1879, and yet Mr. Ker says that Farrish carried the mail before it was expedited and carried it in from six to ten hours. Mr. Farrish did not carry the mail until about two years after it had been expedited.

On page 4768 Mr. Ker, speaking of the two affidavits on the route from Pueblo to Rosita, laughs at the idea that the proportion was the same in both.

Now, what is the proportion in both? One affidavit says that on the then schedule it would take eight men and horses; that is, the horses and men added together make eight, and that on the proposed schedule it would take twenty-four. Then they would be entitled to just three times the money they were receiving on the original schedule, because three times eight are twenty-four. Let me explain here what I mean by proportion. If I am carrying the mail with, say four horses and two men, making a total of six, and if then that service is increased so that it takes twelve men and horses, I get twice the original pay; if it takes eighteen men and horses, I get three times the original pay. You understand that there is always a relation between the pay and the number of men and horses used. If I am using one man and one horse and am getting a thousand dollars for the service, and if it is expedited so that I have to use two men and two horses, I would get $2,000. In the first affidavit they had eight men and horses. If they put up the service to what they were going to, it would take twenty-four. Three times eight are twenty-four. Then they would get three times the original amount of money. In the second affidavit he swears that it takes fifteen men and animals on the present schedule, and on the proposed schedule it would take forty-five men and animals. Three times fifteen are forty-five. Three times eight are twenty-four. You see that on both affidavits you get the same amount of money to a cent, because the proportion is absolutely and exactly the same. Yet Mr. Ker laughs at the idea of the proportion being the same. It took eight men and horses in the first affidavit on the present schedule, and twenty-four on the proposed schedule. There the contractor would be entitled to three times the original sum. In the next affidavit it took fifteen men and horses on the original schedule and forty-five men and horses on the proposed schedule. Again, he would be entitled to three times the original sum.

On page 4579 Mr. Ker says the oath was put in for three trips. By looking at page 867 we find that it was for seven trips and not three. There is nothing like accuracy.

On page 4580 Ker says that Brady had on the jacket before him the evidence that Hansom was a subcontractor at $3,100 a year, and the contract gave the contractor a clear profit of $5,048. That is page 4580. The fact is that Brady's order was made on July 8th, 1879. That order is on page 866. Hansom's subcontract was filed October 22, 1879, about three months after Brady's order was made. And yet Mr. Ker tells you that on that jacket when Brady made the order he had notice of Hansom's subcontract. Unless he had the gift of seeing into the future he knew nothing about it. He would have had to see into the future three months in order to have had it before him at that time.

On page 4703 Mr. Ker says that the letter of J. W. Dorsey, written April 26, 1879, referred to the Perkins affidavit as not putting the number of men and animals high enough.

Let us see. Another case of arithmetic. The letter refers to Dorsey's statement transmitted with the letter. It could not be the way stated by Mr. Ker for the following reasons: The affidavit of Perkins said three men and six animals one trip a week on the then time. That makes nine. On one trip a week with the reduction to eighty-four hours, eight men and twenty-four animals would be required. That makes thirty-two. The proportion then gives $3\frac{5}{9}$, or 355 per cent. increase of pay. That is the affidavit, he says, that Dorsey wrote out and said was not high enough, and then fixed up one that was. The affidavit that John W. Dorsey sent in the letter says that it will require for three trips a week on the then time four men and twelve animals, making sixteen; on the proposed schedule for the same number of trips eleven men and thirty-two animals, making forty-three. As 16 is to 43—that is, 269 per cent. increase of pay. Now, that letter, he says, claims that the Perkins affidavit did not put it high enough. I say that he did not refer to the Perkins affidavit. He could not say that did not put it high enough, because that put it at 355 per cent., and the affidavit he inclosed in the letter put it at 269 per cent.—nearly 100 per cent. less. According to Mr. Ker he was complaining that that affidavit was too low, and so he inclosed one 100 per cent. lower. That will not do. Besides all that the affidavit of John W. Dorsey is for forty-five hours, while the first affidavit, I believe, is for eighty-four hours. John W. Dorsey offers to carry it in forty-five hours for 269 per cent., and the other affidavit on the basis of eighty five hours calls for 355 per cent. Do you not see, gentlemen, it is utterly impossible to believe that?

On page 4738 Mr. Ker again falls into mathematics. He says that

Mr. Brady allowed on the Bismarck route for three hundred men and three hundred horses. I tell you this prosecution ought to go into the stock business. One hundred and fifty men and one hundred and fifty horses were called for by the affidavit. Now, Mr. Ker says when Brady doubled the trips he doubled the horses, and when he doubled the trips he doubled the men. That would make three hundred men and three hundred horses. If he had doubled the trips again he would have had six hundred men and six hundred horses, enough cavalry to have protected that entire frontier. Yet after all the Bismarck and Tongue River business, Mr. Vaile comes in and swears, on page 4062, that the loss on that route to Vaile and Miner was at least $50,000; and Mr. Miner swears that the loss on the route was between forty and fifty thousand dollars. Vaile says if he had known at that time of the clause in the contract by which he could have gotten out of it he would have abandoned the route, but that he had not read a contract for ten or twelve years. Now, as a matter of fact, gentlemen, and it seems to me the prosecution ought to be perfectly fair, Brady allowed only 40 per cent. of the affidavit made in regard to the one hundred and fifty men and the one hundred and fifty horses, and yet according to Mr. Ker he allowed for three hundred men and three hundred horses; instead of allowing for 40 per cent. of one hundred and fifty men and one hundred and fifty horses, he allowed for 100 per cent. more. That would have run the pay up, I should think to, about a million dollars. Mr. Ker also says that Mr. Vaile swears that he induced Brady to give an extension to August 15, and thereupon Mr. Ker makes the remarkable statement that Vaile did not do it; that Boone did it; I am very thankful for the admission. From that it appears that Boone was more potent with Brady than Vaile was.

Mr. KER. I never used such an expression.

Mr. INGERSOLL. You will have to look at your evidence and see. Was Boone more potent than Vaile? If he was, why did they have to get somebody close to Brady? Afterwards we are told by Mr. Ker that Mr. Boone was kicked out to make a place for Vaile, so as to get a man close to Brady.

On the Vermillion and Sioux Falls route Mr. Ker attacks the affidavit made by Vaile. Let us see what there is to that affidavit.

Mr. KER. Will you tell me what page it was I spoke about Boone?

Mr. INGERSOLL. It was Mr. Bliss. It is Mr. Bliss's turn to explain now. The notes that I have were handed to me by another, and I supposed referred to Mr. Ker. Mr. Bliss said:

This, I think, can leave no doubt in the minds of any one that the extension was obtained by Mr. Boone.

Mr. Bliss says that on page 4899, and so I will relieve Mr. Ker of that charge.

Mr. KER. I am glad to be relieved of something.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do not want to do any injustice to Mr. Ker.

Mr. MERRICK. Had we not better take a recess now?

Mr. INGERSOLL. It will take me but a few minutes to finish the subject upon which I have just commenced. I will say first, that between Mr. Bliss and Mr. Ker I am perfectly impartial.

As I said before, Mr. Ker attacks the affidavit made by Vaile on the Vermillion and Sioux Falls route. Let us get at the facts. The route was let as fifty miles long. That is the distance that was given in the advertisement by the Government. They wanted expedition on that route. The Government asked for it. Mr. Vaile asked if he could make the affidavit, and he made it, supposing the route was fifty miles long. He never had been over it. It turned out that it was about seventy-three miles long, and consequently the affidavit provided for too fast time. The affidavit called for ten hours. That made over seven miles an hour; or, including the stoppages, I presume about ten miles an hour. The difficulty arose out of the mistake in the distance. Vaile so swears, on page 4030. He also swears that he went in the department and there saw Mr. Brewer, who was in charge of that bureau, or at least of that business, and it was Brewer who suggested to him to make the affidavit. Mr. Vaile did not ask for any expedition on that route. Mr. Brewer spoke to him about it. Mr. Vaile swears that Brewer spoke to him first. Mr. Vaile swears that he made the affidavit at the instigation of Mr. Brewer. Mr. Bliss says Brewer is an honest man, and calls him honest Brewer. Why did he not call honest Brewer to the stand and let him deny that he asked Mr. Vaile to make that affidavit?

Now, if your honor please, I will be glad to have the recess.

The COURT. Yes.

At this point (1 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the court took its usual recess.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. INGERSOLL. [Resuming.] If the court please, and gentlemen of the jury, on page 4645 there is the letter from Miner to Carey:

JOHN CAREY, Esq.,
Fort McDermitt, Nev.:

DEAR SIR: One S. H. Abbott, who was postmaster at Alvord, I find, by accident, is writing to the department that you do not pay your bills, and that there is no need of anything more than a weekly mail.

I wish you would see this man at once and satisfy him; pay him whatever is reasonable and report to R. C. Williamson, at The Dalles. I suppose that is what he is after. He knows nothing of the through mail, and probably a weekly is all he needs; but more likely he wants some money. He complained once before to the department that he had to make a special trip to Camp McDermitt to make his returns, and I sent him $30, and it was all right. Now, I suppose, he wants a little more money.

Yours, &c.,

JOHN R. MINER.

That letter was introduced to show that there was a conspiracy between Miner and Brady; and yet when that man complained that the service was not put on at the time it should have been put on, and that he was postmaster, was forced to carry his returns to the nearest post-office, and consequently spent about $30, Miner sent him the money. Why? Because he and Brady were not confederates; because they were not conspirators. For that reason he sent the man $30. The letter says "The man that was postmaster." When this letter was written Mr. Abbott was not postmaster; he had ceased to be postmaster. Yet they have endeavored to impress upon you the idea that when this letter was written to Abbott he was then postmaster. He had written a letter, stating that a weekly mail was all that was wanted, and that Mr. Carey did not pay his bills. Mr. Miner wrote to Carey on that account, "The man is trying to make trouble. He tried to make trouble once before, and we sent him $30. He is not postmaster now. He has no official position. Go and see him. Give him what is reasonable, and tell him to mind his own business." Why? If he had been in a conspiracy with Brady he would not care what Mr. Abbott wrote to the department. If he was absolutely certain there he would not care anything about it. But having no arrangement with the Second Assistant, having no arrangement of the kind set forth in the indictment, he did not want Mr. Abbott to write letters; he did not want Mr. Abbott to make trouble. That letter, instead of showing that there was a conspiracy, shows absolutely that there was not, and the letter was not written to him while he was an official. The man was not then postmaster. He simply had been.

The next point made by Mr. Ker is a very powerful point, that Mr. Vaile came from Independence, where the James boys came from, and where they steal horses. Suppose I should say that Mr. Ker comes from Philadelphia, the town that Mr. Phipps lives in, the man who stole the roof off of the poor-house. Would there be any argument in that? Yet, gentlemen, you are told that you must remember that Vaile came from Independence, Missouri, the same town the James boys came from.

Mr. Ker says that J. W. Dorsey wrote in his letter that the profits would be $100,000 a year. That was a mistake. I turn to the letter and I find that it says $100,000 in the life of the contract, and not $100,000 a year. Yet Mr. Ker tells you that the letter says $100,000 a year.

Mr. BLISS. Your honor, I claim the right to call attention to the fact that Mr. Ker read the letter in full referring to the $100,000 clear of expenses. He read it and then followed it by the statement of $100,000 a year, which was obviously a mistake.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Does he follow it with the statement that it is $100,000 a year?

Mr. BLISS. I say he does, and I say it is clearly a mistake on his part. But he had read the letter with the square statement of what Dorsey said first.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That only makes it worse. After he had read the letter to the jury, and while the echoes of the letter were still in the court-room, he then said $100,000 a year, while the letter said $100,000 within the life of the contract. Upon such statements, gentlemen, they expect to strip a citizen of his liberty. [To counsel for the Government.] You will have some work to do in a little while. It may be that Mr. Ker forgets these things. I do not say how it happened.

Mr. Ker also tells you that Miner wanted to cut out S. W. Dorsey and J. W. Dorsey and Mr. Peck. Was that because he was a coconspirator? He also tells you that Miner deserted his friend S. W. Dorsey. Was he at that time a conspirator? Mr. Ker tells you that S. W. Dorsey wanted to gratify his spite against Vaile and that the first thing he did after he got out of the Senate was to write that letter to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General against the subcontracts. Does that show they were coconspirators? Did he want to gratify his spite because he had made a bargain with them by which they were to realize hundreds of thousands of dollars?

Mr. Ker also says that Miner's letter to Tuttle shows the conspiracy. It is perfectly wonderful, gentlemen, how suspicion changes and poisons everything. Let me read you the letter from which Mr. Ker draws the inference that there was a conspiracy. It is on page 885:

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 19, 1878.

FRANK A. TUTTLE, Box 44, Pueblo, Colo.:

DEAR SIR: Yours 14th received. We accept your proposition, provided (so that there shall be no conflict) that a friend of ours, who has recently gone to Colorado, has not made different arrangements before we can get him word.

The petition for expedition should be separate from the petition for increase of number of trips. We make no boast of being solid with anybody, but can get what is reasonable.

Yours, truly,

MINER, PECK & CO.

You are told that is evidence of a conspiracy. Suppose the letter had been this way: "We boast of being solid. We can get anything, whether reasonable or not." That probably would have been evidence of perfect innocence. He writes a letter and says:

We make no boast of being solid with anybody, but can get what is reasonable.

They say that is evidence of conspiracy. Suppose he had written the opposite, "We do boast of being solid and we can get anything, whether it is reasonable or not." According to their logic that would have been evidence of absolute innocence. Whenever you are suspicious you extract poison from the fairest and sweetest flowers. Prejudice and suspicion turn every fact against a defendant.

On page 4557 Mr. Ker tells us that Vaile never saw Peck, and yet had the impudence to write that his subcontract was signed by Peck in person. The subcontract is in evidence here. Nobody pretends that it was not signed by Peck, and yet that is brought forward as a suspicious circumstance against Mr. Vaile, because there is no evidence that Mr. Vaile ever saw Mr. Peck. Is there anything in a point like that? "My contract was signed by Mr. Peck in person." He does not mean by that that he saw him sign it. The evidence here is that it was signed by Peck, and yet the fact that he says Peck did sign it, and the fact that he had never seen Peck, Mr. Ker endeavors to torture so that you will think he wrote what he knew to be untrue.

On page 3251 Mr. Ker says that Miner does not deny writing the letter marked 63 E. This letter was dated the 10th day of May, 1879, and was on one of the Dorsey routes.

Mr. BLISS. Is not that page wrong?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I think not.

Mr. BLISS. Mr. Ker did not begin until long after that.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is the page where you can find 63 E. It is dated May 10, 1879. Mr. Ker says that Miner does not deny writing that letter. Miner swears that he never signed a paper, never touched pen to paper on any of the Dorsey routes after the 5th day of May, 1879, and the letter referred to by Mr. Ker bears date the 10th of May, 1879. Mr. Ker says that Miner admits he wrote it. Miner swears that he never signed a paper after the 5th day of May, 1879.

Mr. BLISS. Where does Mr. Ker make that statement? You have not given us the page.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I have not the page. I will get it for you. Mr. Henkle, will you please find the page where Mr. Ker says Miner does not deny writing the letter 63 E. Miner swears he did not do it, and Miner's testimony is on page 4212.

There is also another page where he swears to the same thing. Now, gentlemen, after having made all these statements to you, and I have only taken up a few of them, these misstatements, these mistakes, Mr. Ker winds up with this final appeal:

And if by any mischance, gentlemen, or any misfortune, you were to make a mistake in your application of the law, if you decide wrongfully against these defendants, the remedy is in the hands of the court and the court can do even justice by upsetting your verdict.

He finally winds up by telling you it is the safer plan to find a verdict of guilty, because if you find them guilty wrongfully the court will upset your verdict. Gentlemen, you have sworn to try this case according to the law and the evidence. You are the supreme arbiters of this case. It is for you to decide upon this evidence, and for you alone. Yet you are told by Mr. Ker to shirk that responsibility. You are told by him to violate your oaths and find against these defendants, for the sake of certainty, and then turn them over to the mercy of the court. That is not the law. These defendants are being tried before you. They have the right to your honest judgment. If you have any doubt as to their guilt you must find them not guilty or violate your oaths. You are told it is the safer way to find them guilty and then let them appeal to the court for mercy! That doctrine is monstrous. It is deformed. Such a verdict would be the spawn of prejudice, and cowardice, and perjury. You cannot give such a verdict and retain your self-respect. You cannot give such a verdict and retain your manhood! If you have any doubt as to the guilt of these defendants you must say they are not guilty. You have no right to turn them over to the court, no matter whether the court is merciful or unmerciful. You must pass upon their guilt, and you must do it honestly. I never heard so preposterous, so cruel a sentiment uttered in a court of justice. It amounts to this, gentlemen: If you have any doubt of guilt resolve the doubt against the defendant. If the evidence is not quite sufficient, find against the defendants and turn them over to the mercy of the court. Why should we have a jury at all? Why should you sit here at all? Why should you hear this evidence, if after all you are to shirk the responsibility and turn the defendants over to the court? You never will do it, gentlemen.

Mr. Henkle has found the page for which I asked him. The point I make is that Mr. Ker says that Miner does not deny having written the letter 63 E. Mr. Henkle, will you please read what Mr. Ker says?

Mr. HENKLE. I read from page 4679:

You see his petition was to come through S. W. Dorsey. You remember that Brady, in his testimony, in speaking about the reason why he reduced the time upon this route, spoke about the strong recommendation that Mr. Chaffee had given, and I called your attention to the fact that the "strong recommendation" of Mr. Chaffee was one of a series that had been prepared by Mr. Sibbald. Now, along comes a letter, through the medium of S. W. Dorsey, dated the 10th of May. Miner wrote that letter and signed it.

Then he goes on:

These letters not having been denied by Miner when he was on the stand, he not having taken the trouble to state whether they were or not his letters, and as his name is attached to them, I suppose there can be no difficulty in assuming that they are his. If a man is charged with a matter, and does not take the trouble to deny it, we can certainly assume it. Gentlemen, here is the letter of John R. Miner, dated in 1881, although, as he says, the route was taken by Dorsey.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Miner swore that he never signed a letter after the 5th day of May, 1879.

Now, gentlemen, I wish to call your attention to a few points made by Colonel Bliss. You must remember that Colonel Bliss has been very highly complimented by his associates as a kind of peripatetic index of this case, an encyclopedia of all the papers; that he never makes a mistake; that he recollects amounts with absolute certainty, and that he is infallible. Keeping all these things in your mind, I wish to call your attention to some statements that he has made. First of all I will refer to a little of his philosophy or law, and that is that in every affidavit you should state not the number necessary on the then schedule, but the actual number, and that there could be no doubt about the number of men and horses used at the time when an affidavit was made, and that consequently anybody making an affidavit should put in the number then actually used.

Mr. BLISS. Where did I say that?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will show you. If you are in any great trouble about it, look at page 4760. Gentlemen, he says that they have no right to go outside of the actual number. Let us see how that will work. He says the oaths are false because they do not state the actual number of men and horses employed in carrying the mail at the time they were made. He says that the person making the affidavit swore to the number actually employed, and that where that number was not employed that fact of itself shows the affidavits to be false. I say that is not the law. The law calls for the number necessary, not the number actually employed. Let me show how easy it would be to cheat the Government on the principle laid down by the gentleman.

Mr. MERRICK. Have you got the section of the law there?

Mr. INGERSOLL. No.

Mr. MERRICK. That is not the exact language.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do not care about the language of the law. I am talking about Mr. Bliss's language.

Mr. BLISS. It is not mine either.

Mr. INGERSOLL. It is near enough to it, I think, my friend. You take the ground that they must give the number of men and animals then employed, and if they swear to a different number from that the affidavit is false. That is what you say, and I will show you how infinitely silly that is. Let me illustrate. Here is a route one hundred and fifty miles long, once a week. You know it is possible for one man and one horse for a little while to carry that mail and to go one hundred and fifty miles one way and one hundred and fifty miles the other, making three hundred miles in a week. You can take a magnificent horse and a good, stout, tough man, and you can do it.

The COURT. Or a boy.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Or a stout, tough boy.

The COURT. A boy would be best.

Mr. INGERSOLL. You do not need any boy. Just one man and one horse will answer. The man can ride the horse one hundred and fifty miles in three days, and then ride one hundred and fifty miles back in the next three days. All you have to swear to, according to Mr. Bliss, is the number actually used, and so you would come in and swear to two on this route. Now, when you are making an affidavit as to the number to be used on a schedule to be made, you cannot swear to the number actually in use, because they are not then in use. You have to swear to the number necessary. You have to swear to the number required.

Mr. BLISS. Colonel Ingersoll, I do not propose to submit to any misstatement. You refer me to a page, and upon that page I find this:

It means, gentlemen, simply this: that the contractor is to swear, first, to one fact, how many men and horses are necessary on the present schedule; and, secondly, to his opinion of what will be necessary upon the proposed schedule.

Mr. INGERSOLL. You said a hundred times that the number actually used was the number to be given. You said it a hundred times. There is not a statement in your speech that you did not make a hundred times. I will give you the pages before I get through. You insisted that they must swear to the number then used.

Now see. On a mail route one hundred and fifty miles long I would only want a good smart horse, and one good active man or boy. I would not need to carry it more than one week, because I could make the affidavit for that week, and then the question would be how many men and horses would be required for a daily mail on the same route. I would put in a reasonable number, and the difference between the number then actually used and the reasonable number to use would be the standard by which to fix my pay. If you take the man and horse actually used, and then take the number that would reasonably be used, you would make a difference of a thousand per cent. And yet that is the doctrine laid down here to guide us as to these affidavits.

Let me tell you what the law is. It does not make any difference what you are really using at the time. You must swear to the number that would be reasonably necessary to carry the mail on the then schedule. You must swear to the number that would be reasonably necessary to carry the mail on the proposed schedule. In the first place, if you put a great deal of work on a man and horse, you must put the same proportion on man and horse in the second schedule. If you are easy on man and horse in the first schedule, you must be easy on man and horse in the second. The only object, gentlemen, is to keep the proportion, because you are to be paid according to the number of men and horses used.

Now, they say it would be necessary to go out there in order to tell how many men and horses would be necessary, and that the men who made these affidavits had never been on the routes. There was no need of being on the routes. I could give you the number required on any route two hundred or five hundred miles long. I could give you the number of men and horses reasonably required to carry the mail once, twice, three times, or seven times a week; and I could give you the number reasonably required to carry it at the rate of three miles an hour or five miles an hour or six miles an hour without going there. I need not go there for the purpose of the affidavit. I can take it for granted that the road is good and level, and I can keep exactly the same proportion and nobody can be defrauded. If you take the rule of Colonel Bliss it would be the easiest thing on earth to defraud the Government. That would be by taking the actual number in use and then taking the number necessary.

On page 4761 Mr. Bliss makes the point that according to law the Second Assistant Postmaster-General was not bound to allow according to the affidavits. He is right as to that. That is what Mr. Bliss says, and that is what John W. Dorsey swore he thought, and that is what Mr. Thomas J. Brady swore he did. He did not take the affidavit as a finality. Mr. Thomas J. Brady said that he took it for granted that the man when he made the affidavit thought it was true, and that the man, when he made the affidavit, swore to the best of his knowledge and belief. But Thomas J. Brady never swore that he considered himself bound by the affidavit. On the contrary, he swore that he had a standard in his own mind, and that expedition was to cost $30 a mile, or something of that kind. He went by that standard, and he gauged the affidavits by it.

On page 4762 Mr. Bliss says that Brady admitted that he made no inquiry as to the truth of affidavits, and that he accepted them as absolutely conclusive. On page 3434, Mr. Brady swears:

I accepted their statement as conclusive so far as they knew.

Brady also swears that he had his standard in his own mind, as I said before, and that he had an opinion of his own, and that by that standard and opinion he was governed.

On page 4765 Mr. Bliss charges that Brady took the oath of Perkins on route 38113 as the basis for the expedition. Mr. Turner's calculation on file shows that that affidavit was not the basis of the calculation.

Mr. BLISS. Your honor, allow me to say that subsequently I stated to the court and to the jury distinctly that while the indorsement on the jacket recited the Perkins affidavit as being the one used, or the affidavit of the subcontractor, and while Mr. Brady transmitted to Congress that Perkins affidavit as the one upon which he acted, I still believed that the calculation showed that he used the other affidavit.

Mr. WILSON. He never made that statement until he made it during the progress of my argument when I was discussing that very point.

Mr. BLISS. You are mistaken.

Mr. MERRICK. He made it while I was here and I was not here during Mr. Wilson's argument.

Mr. INGERSOLL. If he has taken it back three times, that is enough.

Mr. MERRICK. He has not taken back anything. He is stating the fact. Brady was called upon by Congress for the affidavit upon which he made that order and he transmitted the Perkins affidavit to Congress.

The COURT. I remember that perfectly.

Mr. INGERSOLL. On page 4766 Mr. Bliss charges Brady with having two affidavits on the Pueblo and Greenhorn route, from John W. Dorsey on the same day.

Mr. BLISS. Mr. Henkle called my attention to the fact that it was not the Greenhorn route, but the Pueblo and Rosita route, and I corrected it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. You took it back.

Mr. BLISS. I said the Pueblo and Rosita route, and not the Greenhorn route.

Mr. INGERSOLL. You did not take it back?

Mr. BLISS. I said that.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Good enough. I did not know about his taking it back. I was not here at the time. The fact was, however, that only one affidavit was ever filed, and that was an affidavit, not by J. W. Dorsey, but by John R. Miner.

Mr. BLISS. There were two on the Pueblo and Rosita route by John W. Dorsey.

Mr. INGERSOLL. We will come to them. You will get tired of them before we get through with them.

On page 4767 Mr. Bliss refers to two affidavits. The first affidavit, the one not used, calls for three men and seven animals on the then schedule. That makes ten. On the proposed schedule of eighty hours it called for nine men and twenty-seven animals. That makes thirty-six. The proportion then in this affidavit is 3.6, that is, the pay would be 3.6 times the original pay. In the second affidavit five men and fifteen animals, twenty in all, are called for on the then schedule, and on the proposed schedule twelve men and forty-two animals. The proportion there is 2.7. So that the affidavits, leaving out the fractions, which are substantially the same, stand in this way: By the first the contract price would have been multiplied by three and the contractor would have had three times the original pay, and by the second he would have had twice the original pay. Substituting an affidavit at only double the pay is called a fraud, because they withdrew an affidavit for treble the pay. That is what Mr. Bliss calls a fraud. He says still that it is a fraud.

Mr. BLISS. I have not said so.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Somebody said so.

Mr. BLISS. I said to Mr. Merrick I did not say it was a fraud.

Mr. INGERSOLL. What was it if it was not a fraud? Now, then, there were two affidavits, and these two affidavits, gentlemen, Mr. Bliss well knew were filed on different schedules. The first affidavit was filed on a proposed schedule of eighty hours. The second affidavit was filed on a proposed schedule of fifty hours. The affidavit agreeing to carry the mail in fifty hours offered to do it at double the pay. The affidavit on eighty hours wanted three times the pay, or substantially that. One was 3.7 and the other was 2.6. Just think of trying to make that a fraud on the Government. Suppose they had filed a third affidavit and offered to carry it for nothing. That would have been carrying a fraud to the extreme.

Mr. BLISS. Your honor, with reference to that, I said, expressly referring to these two affidavits: It is not a question of proportion. The question is whether the mere existence of those double affidavits did not give Brady conclusive notice that the man who could make those affidavits was not a reliable man, because no matter what the time was to which it was to be increased, he stated the number necessary on the then schedule as so and so in one affidavit and in the other he stated the number differently. I referred to it solely in that connection, as the language shows on the page referred to.

Mr. INGERSOLL. For instance, a man writes, "You owe me $500 according to my books," and writes the next day, "I have made a mistake. You don't owe me anything." Mr. Bliss insists that the second letter would show that the man was not to be relied upon. That is his idea of honesty. If in the first letter he had written that I did not owe him anything, and in the second letter I did, that might be suspicious. But when in the first he writes that I owe him and in the second that I do not, there can be no suspicion as to his honesty. In the first affidavit this man stated so much, and in the second affidavit he put it one-third less. That simply shows the man was paying attention to it and wanted to make an honest offer. And yet everything in this case is poisoned with prejudice and suspicion.

Another point: Mr. Bliss, on page 4770, says that on the Pueblo and Rosita route the number of trips was seven and that there was no increase. Upon that statement he bases an argument of fraud. The argument is that there was no increase of trips. Now, on page 866, the order shows that in the first place there was one trip a week and there were six trips added. That makes seven. The original pay was $388. Six trips were added, and the value of the six trips, which gave $2,328 of additional pay. Yet Mr. Bliss tells you that there was no increase of trips. As a matter of fact, six trips were added, and that was all that could be added.

Mr. BLISS. Were they added coincidently with the affidavit for expedition?

Mr. INGERSOLL. You say they were not added; I say they were.

Mr. BLISS. No, sir; I said at the time of the expedition there was no increase of trips and the affidavit was based upon the seven trips.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I say that at that time there was an increase.

Mr. BLISS. Of trips?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLISS. At the time of the affidavit for expedition?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I say exactly what I said before and what you said, and I will read it to you again; Mr. Bliss, on page 4770, says that on the Pueblo and Rosita route the number of trips was seven, and that there was no increase.

Mr. BLISS. If it was seven it was not increased.

Mr. INGERSOLL. How could seven be increased?

Mr. BLISS. It might be fourteen.

Mr. INGERSOLL. It could not be. There is not a solitary route in this indictment over seven trips.

Mr. BLISS. Your honor, the point is this: I think I am right in saying that the increase of trips took place after the expedition. That is my recollection about it. I have not referred to the record. I think Colonel Ingersoll will find that is so.

Mr. INGERSOLL. We will see whether you are right. At the time the affidavit was made there were just three trips, and afterward there were four trips added. Let us get it exactly right. I read from page 866:

Date, July 8, 1879. State, Colorado.

Number of route, 38134.

Termini of route, Pueblo and Rosita.

Length of route, fifty miles.

Number of trips per week, one.

Mr. BLISS. I see you are right. The trips were increased.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I am right, am I?

Mr. BLISS. Yes.

Mr. INGERSOLL. When anybody gives it up I will stop. That is fair and that is honorable.

Now, the next point. On page 4771 Mr. Bliss says that the oath on the Toquerville and Adairville route was made for seven trips, although the order only gave them six trips, of course the inference being that they got as much pay for six trips as they were entitled to for seven trips. On page 3290 the original order was for one trip. Two trips were added. Look on page 949 and you will find that more trips were added. The second order increased four trips, and that made seven in all; and yet Mr. Bliss makes the statement that there were only six. That is another mistake.

Another point. On page 4772 Mr. Bliss states that Mr. Rerdell spoke in his testimony about J. B. B. I have referred to that. I have referred before to the claim that Rerdell was sustained by the testimony of Mr. Bissell. As a matter of fact, I do not remember that Mr. Rerdell ever said one word in his testimony as to charging anything to J. B. B.

Ninth point. At page 4778 Mr. Bliss states that Dorsey admitted in his letter to Anthony Joseph that the average rate for mail service on star routes was only $5 a mile. Mr. Dorsey says in his letter no such thing. He says the "average cost of horseback service;" he does not use the language employed by Mr. Bliss, "The average rate for mail service on star routes," but he says, "The average cost of horseback service." That is a small point, but it shows how anxious the gentlemen are to get the thing fully as big as it is.

Tenth point. At page 4783 Mr. Bliss says that Brady cut off $49,000 of increase on the Mineral Park and Pioche route on the 22d of January, 1879, because the mail bills showed so little business. That is another mistake. The order cutting off the $49,000 was made on the 22d of January, 1880, not 1879. I mention this simply for the sake of accuracy.

Eleventh point. At page 4785 Mr. Bliss says that the mail bills on the Silverton and Parrott City route showed that Brady ran the service up from $745 to $14,900, and that the $14,900 was afterwards increased to $31,343.76. The record shows nothing of the kind (see pages 1894-'5). The original pay was $1,488 (page 1854). The pay under the order of June 12, 1879, was $6,512.28 (page 1855). No other increase was ever made. On page 1855 is the increase and expedition, being in all $14,808.63. The original pay was $1,488. A little change was made in the route that brought it up to $1,703.65. That, together with the expedition, makes a total of $16,512.28. And yet Mr. Bliss told you that it was $31,343.76. So that this encyclopedia of the papers made a mistake, in one year, of $14,831.48. For the whole contract time it would be a mistake of $45,000. And yet, strange as it may appear, that mistake was made against the defendants. Well, let us go on.

Twelfth point. On page 4800, bottom line, Mr. Bliss says:

They got so much in the way of offering petitions that Mr. Rerdell being told by Stephen W. Dorsey, upon this route from Pueblo to Greenhorn, to go to work and alter the petitions, inserted the words "and faster time."

As to this petition, 7 B, in which are the words "and faster time," George Sears swears, at pages 829 and 830, that it is in the same condition now as when it was signed by him, he thinks. Thereupon Mr. Bliss told you that he was mistaken in the paper. You must recollect these things.

Mr. BLISS. Are there not two petitions there altered?

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is on another route. There were 7 B, 11 B, and 12 B.

Mr. BLISS. Exactly.

Mr. INGERSOLL. 7 B was the written paper, and you introduced 11 B and 12 B. One said "quicker time," and one said "on faster schedule," and yet in the very next paragraph they asked to have it run in eight hours. Mr. Rerdell had to admit that he put in the words without knowing what the petition called for, and that Dorsey instructed him to put them in.

Mr. BLISS. Your honor, in the very same paragraph, the very line, where I said "faster schedule," I called attention to the fact that the words were unnecessary.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is not the only point. The point is, who wrote "faster time?"

Mr. BLISS. That is not what I said.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I have given the words; I have not misrepresented you at all.

Mr. BLISS. You have not given the whole sentence.

Mr. INGERSOLL. You cannot expect me to read your whole seven days' speech. That would be too much. This is what you said:

They got so much in the way of altering petitions that Mr. Rerdell being told by Stephen W. Dorsey, upon this route from Pueblo to Greenhorn, to go to work and alter the petitions, inserted the words "and faster time."

That is it exactly.

Mr. BLISS. Then follows this:

He inserted "and faster schedule," "on quicker time," though there was not any necessity for doing that, because if they had gone further down, after some argument in the petition, to the request for expedition, they would have seen that there was no necessity for that little forgery up there.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is a magnificent admission, "There was no necessity for" putting that in. I am glad he admits that. He would ask you to believe that S. W. Dorsey, a man of intelligence and brains, would ask to have a petition forged, altered, interlined, without knowing what was in that petition. It will not do, gentlemen.

Thirteenth point. At page 4810, Mr. Bliss says that McBean told Moore, in reference to route No. 44140, Eugene City to Bridge Creek, "that he could carry all the mail in his pocket."

Now, as a matter of fact, Mr. McBean does not state any conversation with Moore covering this route. That was another mistake. No matter.

Fourteenth point. At page 4814, Mr. Bliss, in speaking of the Ojo Caliente route, says the service in fact never was performed in fifty hours; that the evidence of that is conclusive. Now let us see. Here is a jacket on page 3008, and that jacket shows that out of seventy-eight half trips, expedition was lost on twenty-three and made on fifty-five. Yet Mr. Bliss tells you it never was made. The jacket on page 3040 shows that expedition was lost on twelve half trips and made on sixty-six. And yet Mr. Bliss says it was never made. The jacket on page 3056 shows that at the time they were carrying seven trips a week, nineteen expeditions were lost out of one hundred and ninety-two half trips. And yet Mr. Bliss says the fifty-hour schedule never was made. Another mistake.

Mr. BLISS. That is long after the time I was referring to. As to the other point, I simply repeat it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. It will not help it to repeat it. For every expedition lost on this route or any other the Government did not pay. When the expedition was lost the pay was deducted; when the expedition was made the pay was given, and not otherwise. You see, gentlemen, how they have endeavored to get the facts before you; what a struggle it has been over all these obstacles—lack of memory, the immensity of this record—how they have climbed the Himalayas of difficulty; how they have gone over the Andes and Rocky Mountains of trouble to get at the facts!

Fifteenth point. On page 4820 Mr. Bliss states that there could not have been legally allowed, on the evidence on the Dalles route, on expedition over $4,144. As a matter of fact, the evidence does not cover the whole route as to the number of men and horses used. The Government never proved the number of men and horses necessary to carry the mail over the whole route, but only a part. Mr. Ker admits that the evidence is defective in that regard. When you have no standard, gentlemen, you cannot measure.

Sixteenth point. On page 4820 Mr. Bliss, in speaking of the route from Eugene City to Bridge Creek, says that, taking the undisputed facts as they were, before and after the expedition, Brady could not legally have allowed more than $2,991.23. The evidence is (page 1343) that Wyckoff was the subcontractor from July, 1878, to 1880. Powers first carried the mail in 1880. The route was increased and expedited in June, 1879. Mr. Powers never carried it from the expedition. Mr. Wyckoff was the only man who did that, and Mr. Wyckoff was not called. Consequently there was no evidence as to the number of men and horses used on either schedule. That left the gentleman without a standard and without a measure.

Seventeenth point. On page 4820, Mr. Bliss says that on the Silverton and Parrott City route the oath was made for seven trips a week on the present schedule, when it ought to have been two trips on the old schedule and seven trips for the new schedule. As there is no evidence as to the number of men and horses used on the old schedule, of course there is no evidence in this record to impeach that oath; you cannot find it.

Eighteenth point. On page 4822 Mr. Bliss states that after the passage of the act of April 7, 1880, there were two increases upon the White River route. The fact is there was just one after the passage of that law. Of course a little mistake like that does not make much difference in a case of this magnitude.

Nineteenth point. On page 4824 Mr. Bliss states that Raton was put on the Trinidad route April 24, 1879 (page 1031). The office was embraced on the route July 1, 1878. The first order in reference to it was made June 6th, 1878. It was put on the route from July 1, 1878, increasing the distance twenty-three miles. Yet Mr. Bliss tells you that it was put on the route April 24, 1879.

Mr. BLISS. Is not that the date of the order?

Mr. INGERSOLL. It may have been the date of your order.

Mr. BLISS. Is not that the date of the order in the case?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do not know anything about that. I give you the exact facts. The office was embraced on the route July 1, 1878. The first order in reference to it was June 6, 1878. It was put on the route from July 1, 1878, increasing the distance twenty-three miles. That was enough.

Twentieth point. On page 4825, Mr. Bliss, in speaking of the Ojo Caliente route, charges that by the order increasing the trips on this route in February, 1881, there was paid from the Treasury illegally $2,011.46. As a matter of fact, had we been paid for that entire quarter it would have amounted to $7,139.41. The pay was not adjusted until April 22, 1881 (page 731). The amount that was then paid was not $7,139.41, but it was $3,727.22. It was not for the entire quarter, but simply for the actual service rendered. The quarterly pay for the preceding quarter, before the expedition, was $3,358.26; showing that we received only for that quarter an excess, on account of expedition, of $368.96. But he told you that we got illegally $2,011.46. That is a small matter.

Twenty-first point. On page 4897, Mr. Bliss says in effect that Dorsey undertook to state that he kept no books; that he was doing a business amounting, I think he says, to $6,000,000 a year, and yet he kept no books. On the contrary, Dorsey swore that he did keep books; on the contrary, he swore that Kellogg was his book-keeper. Kellogg swore that he did keep the books. Torrey swore that he was his book-keeper, and kept the books. And yet Mr. Bliss stood up before this jury and said to you that Mr. Dorsey wanted you to believe, or stated that he kept no books of that immense business. It will not do. No books but the red books, I suppose, were kept.

And right here, gentlemen, I want now to say a word about Rerdell. I want to give him his epitaph, and I want the reporter to put it back there at the place so that it will come in right. Mr. A. B. Williams, who is with me in this case, suggested this epitaph to be put on the red book at the head of his grave:

Up to this moment I have been faithful to every trust.

Twenty-second point. At page 4883, Mr. Bliss says that in regard to one of Vaile and Miner's routes (Canyon City to Fort McDermitt) there were large profits, amounting to $20,000 a year. Then he says $80,000 during the four years. And yet Mr. Bliss knew at that time that that expedition lasted only eleven months. Trying to fool the jury about $62,000.

Twenty-third point. On page 4815, Mr. Bliss states that the fines on the Bismarck and Tongue River route, during Brady's administration, were only $13,000. If you will look at page 727 of this record, where the table is put in evidence as to the fines, you will find that he deducted from the pay $29,224. Mr. Bliss made a mistake of $16,224. But in a case like this that is not important. Gentlemen, you know you cannot always be accurate.

Mr. BLISS. I desire to say that my statement there is correct.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes; well, I desire to say that it is the other way.

Mr. BLISS. The fines Colonel Ingersoll is referring to were for the period during Brady's administration imposed afterwards.

Mr. INGERSOLL. No. I do not bring them in. Before Brady went out there was $13,000 made up upon that route not yet passed upon by Brady, and Mr. Elmer, I believe, also imposed these fines. But outside of that, and before Mr. Elmer went out, Mr. Brady had imposed $29,224.

Mr. BLISS. I think not, sir.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Well, let us look at page 727. If I am wrong, as much as I hate to admit it, I will. Calculating the amount down to January 25, 1881—and there was no more allowed until May 2, 1881, (and Brady went out between January 25, 1881, and May 2, 1881)—and the amount down to that point makes $29,224.

Mr. BLISS. Of which $17,831 was remitted.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes; but what do you say? Mr. Bliss states that the fines on the Bismarck and Tongue River route during Brady's administration were only $13,000. As a matter of fact, they were $29,224. I have got the gentleman penned up there.

Mr. BLISS. Not very much.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes; very much.

Mr. CARPENTER. Only a little more than $13,000 remitted.

Mr. BLISS. Seventeen thousand eight hundred and thirty-one dollars and odd cents was remitted.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I made a mistake of $4,000, and you made a mistake of $16,224. Mr. Bliss is an accurate man, as a rule. He has been called the index of this business for the Government.

Twenty-fourth point. On page 4987 Mr. Bliss says:

The one fact of the evidence of the payment of money by Dorsey to Brady remains the same whether the books were put out of the way by Dorsey or by Rerdell. That is the great central point, so far as the books were concerned; and as to that the testimony is absolutely uncontradicted.

Mr. Brady swears that Dorsey never gave him a dollar. Dorsey swears that he never had a money transaction with Brady amounting to one cent. Mr. Rerdell does not pretend to swear that he knows of Mr. Dorsey having paid a dollar to Mr. Brady. He does not pretend to swear that he knows of any one of these defendants having paid one dollar to Mr. Brady. And yet Mr. Bliss will tell you that the fact that Dorsey paid Brady money is uncontradicted.

Mr. BLISS. I did not intend that, Colonel Ingersoll. I do not think it is capable of that interpretation.

Mr. INGERSOLL. What did you mean?

Mr. BLISS. As to the statement being in the books it is uncontradicted.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Let me see. He now turns and says he did not mean the money, he meant the books. The evidence is overwhelming on our side that the books did not exist. When you deny the existence of the book I take it you deny the existence of any item in it. It is a question whether any such books ever existed, gentlemen. Rerdell swore in the affidavit of June 20, 1881, and he swore to that affidavit three times hand-running, that no such books existed. He swore substantially the same thing on the 13th of July, 1882. He told Mr. French that no such books ever existed. He told Judge Carpenter that no such books ever existed. He stated to Bosler that no such books ever existed. And now this gentleman says the evidence is uncontradicted that Brady was charged in those books. That is a good deal worse than the other. Let us go on.

Twenty-fifth point. At page 4962 Mr. Bliss says that Mr. Dorsey, according to his own statement—

Had brought Rerdell up and led him to infamy.

Did Dorsey make any such statement? Did Mr. Dorsey, gentlemen, in your presence, swear that he had brought Rerdell up? Did he, in your presence, swear that he had led him to infamy? Did he, in your presence, swear that he had done anything of the kind? I have got the exact words.

Mr. BLISS. What are they?

Mr. INGERSOLL. "Had brought Rerdell up; had led him to infamy." Look about the third or fourth line from the bottom, and you will find it.

Who, according to his own statement, he, Dorsey, had brought up, had led to infamy, and who, according to his own statement, had stated that MacVeagh had told a lie.

A curious use of the English language. I believe it is in that connection, though, that he speaks about Mr. Dorsey having the impudence to go to the President of the United States. That is not a very impudent proceeding. In this country a President is not so far above the citizen. In this country we have not gotten to the sublimity of snobbery that a citizen cannot give his opinion to the President; especially a citizen who did all he could to make him President; especially a citizen in whom he had confidence. Not much impudence in that. I do not think that during the campaign General Garfield would have regarded it impudent on the part of Mr. Dorsey to speak to him. I do not believe in a man, the moment he is elected President, feeding upon meat that makes him so great that the man who helped put him there cannot approach him, and every man who voted for him helped to put him there. I am a believer in the doctrine that the President is a servant of the people. I have not yet reached that other refinement of snobbery.

Mr. BLISS. In point of fact, Colonel Ingersoll, I made no such statement.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will see whether you did or not.

Mr. BLISS. Not as you put it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The idea was that he was impudent in going to Garfield.

Mr. BLISS. No.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The idea was, too, that he had defamed Garfield.

Mr. BLISS. Now let me read the passage on the very page you refer to.

Mr. INGERSOLL. It is somewhere around there.

Mr. BLISS. [Reading:]

Patched up the affidavit of Mr. Rerdell, addressed it to the President, admittedly went to the President with it, and then had the impudence to come here and malign the character of General Garfield by saying that upon that affidavit of an accused man, instead of seeking a trial, he would have removed two members of his Cabinet.

I meant nothing about the impudence of going to the President.

Mr. INGERSOLL. He had the impudence then to come here and malign Garfield by saying that upon that statement he would have turned out two members of his Cabinet. That is Mr. Bliss's idea of impudence; and yet, upon the testimony of the same man, he wants to put five men in the penitentiary.

Mr. BLISS. Not upon the sole testimony, I suppose.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Not upon the soulless testimony. Now, I think that Mr. Dorsey had a right to go and see Mr. Garfield. I think he had a right to take that affidavit with him. General Garfield was told what this man had said concerning Mr. Dorsey. He had the right to take that affidavit of that man with him so that General Garfield, or the then Attorney-General rather, might know how much confidence to put in the statement of that man. He had a right to do that. If he found in this way that his Attorney-General and his Postmaster-General were seeking to have a man convicted by means not entirely honorable, then it was not only his privilege, but it was his duty to discharge them from his Cabinet. But I am not saying anything in regard to them now, because they are not here to defend themselves.

Mr. BLISS. I want to correct myself. Further down on that page I see I did refer to the impudence of this man going to Garfield.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Well, as Mr. Bliss has been fair enough to state it, I will not follow up my advantage.

Mr. BLISS. I said the impudence of going to him with that affidavit.

Mr. INGERSOLL. On another page Mr. Bliss says that the idea that Mr. Vaile did what he did for Miner out of any sympathy is "too thin." Mr. Bliss cannot believe that Vaile became Miner's friend so suddenly, but he thinks it highly probable that they conspired instantly. That is his view of human nature. Friendship is of slow growth; conspiracy is a hot-house plant. Gentlemen, is that your view of human nature, that a man cannot become the friend of another suddenly? Whenever he does become his friend the friendship has to be formed suddenly, does it not? There is a first time to everything. A moment before it did not exist; a moment afterwards it is dead very suddenly.

There was a boy came to town one morning and met an old friend. The old friend asked the boy, "How is your father?" He says, "Pretty well, for him." "How is your mother?" "Pretty well, for her." "Well, how is your grandmother?" "She is dead." "Well," says the old man, "she must have died suddenly." "Well," said the boy, "pretty sudden, for her." [Laughter.]

Whenever one man becomes the friend of another, a moment before that he was not, and a moment after he is. It must be sudden. But I imagine that there was a friendship sprang up between Vaile and Miner, and I will tell you why. They have been partners ever since. You, gentlemen, have had the same experience a thousand times. It is not necessary to conspire with a man in order to like him. Neither is it necessary to like him to conspire with him. Men have conspired without friendship a thousand times more, probably, than they have formed friendships without conspiracy.

Mr. Bliss says that because Miner failed to produce the power of attorney that Moore swore was given to him when he went West, the jury have a right to infer that instructions to get up false petitions were in writing and were included in that power of attorney. Mr. Moore did not swear to the contents of that power of attorney. Do you think that it is within the realm of probability that a man ever gave a power of attorney to another and inserted in it: "You are hereby authorized to get up false petitions; you are further authorized to have them so written that you can tear them off and paste others on?"

"N. B. You will make such contracts with all contractors.

"P. S. Don't tell anybody." [Laughter.]

There was another witness in this case, Mr. Grimes (page 808). Not the one that wore the coat—

All buttoned down before—but Mr. Grimes, postmaster at Kearney. He came all the way here to swear that he stopped using mail bills on the route from Kearney to Kent because he was so ordered by a letter from the Post-Office Department. Then it was discovered that he did not have the letter with him; he went home to get the letter, but he never came back any more.

We introduced Spangler (page 341) from the inspection division of the Post-Office Department; I think he was in charge of that division. He swore, as a matter of fact, that there never were any mail bills on that route at all.

Mr. CARPENTER. He was in charge of the mail bills on that route.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The mail bills on that particular route. That man Grimes was brought clear here to prove that he stopped using mail bills, and then we proved that there never were any mail bills used on that route for him to stop using. I do not suppose that that man was dishonest. These people just got around him and talked to him until he "remembered" it. They just planted the seed in his mind, and then came the dew and the rain and the lightning until it began to sprout and in time blossomed and bore fruit—mail bills. When we come to find out that there never were any mail bills used, away went Mr. Grimes.

On page 4969 Mr. Bliss says:

They have not, up to this moment, dared to state under oath, I think, that those books are not in their possession.

On page 3784 Dorsey swears that he never received any such books. Never saw any such books. He swore again and again that he never heard of any such books.

Mr. BLISS. I stated distinctly that the defendants had not stated that in the form required to excuse them from the production. I stated that distinctly.

Mr. INGERSOLL. All right; away goes that.

On page 4983 Mr. Bliss says:

Is it not an absurdity to suppose that Dorsey would leave Rerdell in charge of his business from July, 1879, to August, 1880, and then on from that time until the close of the contract term in August, 1882; leave all the business in that way, and then through Bosler settle the accounts with Mr. Rerdell and have no knowledge in any way, not only of the entries contained in the books which Rerdell kept, but have no knowledge that he kept any books whatever? Is it not absurd to suppose any such thing? These ten routes represented an income of two hundred and fifty-odd thousand dollars a year, or a total business, including income and outgo, of $500,000 a year, for three years, going no further than that. These ten routes alone represented transactions amounting to half a million dollars a year. There were one hundred and thirty routes and Mr. Dorsey took one-third in value if not in number. If the value was the same, Mr. Dorsey took not less than forty routes. As ten routes involved a business of $1,500,000 in that period, the forty routes involved in that proportion transactions amounting to $6,000,000.

You made a calculation on the supposition that all the routes were expedited the same as those in the indictment, and when you made that calculation you knew they were not expedited.

Mr. BLISS. I object, your honor, to his making any such statement as that. In the first place, it is not evidence; and in the second place, which is of more importance, it is not true. I did not know any such thing, and I do not know any such thing.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Do you say now that the other routes of his, to the number you talked of, were expedited?

Mr. BLISS. I do not know anything about it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Do you say now that you do not know whether they were or not?

Mr. BLISS. I am not on the stand to be cross-examined now. But I do say to your honor that there is no evidence of that in this case. And then I go beyond that, and say that I did not know those things then and I do not know them now.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Very well; he made the argument on the supposition that all the routes were expedited.

Mr. BLISS. Yes.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I say that not one of them was expedited in which Mr. Dorsey had an interest.

Mr. BLISS. There is no evidence on that subject.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Is there any evidence of what you say?

Mr. BLISS. I put a supposititious case; you have stated a fact.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will put another supposititious case, and mine is that the other routes were not expedited.

The COURT. That is the right way to meet it.

Mr. BLISS. Yes.

The COURT. Counsel ought not to turn to counsel on the other side and make an appeal to his knowledge in regard to matters not in evidence.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I know, but he said he did not know it. Then I asked him, as a matter of fact, if he did not know——

The COURT. [Interposing.] He stated his supposition, and you met that supposition——

Mr. INGERSOLL. [Interposing.] I am always glad to get information.

Now, then, I will go to another point, and that is the $7,500 check. Mr. Bliss speaks of that check at page 4997, and he says:

There is a question raised as to whether it was drawn in Mr. Rerdell's presence.

I do not think there was. How could such a question be raised, gentlemen? The check was made payable to M. C. Rerdell, or his order. On the back of the check is Mr. Rerdell's name, put there by himself. He is the only indorser. And yet Mr. Bliss tells you that there is a question raised as to whether the money was drawn in Mr. Rerdell's presence or not. The check shows, and the evidence is absolutely perfect, that the money was paid to Rerdell in person. The question is this: Whether it was drawn in Mr. Rerdell's presence. If it was paid to him in person, I imagine that he was in that neighborhood at that time. The check was written by him, everything except the signature of Dorsey. It was drawn to Mr. Rerdell, or order, and indorsed by Rerdell himself. There was no other indorser. So that it is absolutely certain that he drew the money in question. And yet Mr. Bliss says the question is whether it was drawn in Rerdell's presence or not.

Mr. Bliss continues and states that the money went to S. W. Dorsey. Did it? Mr. Dorsey, on page 3965, states the circumstances. He was packing to go away. He had not the time to go to the bank himself. He had the check written payable to Mr. Rerdell, or order, and he signed it. Rerdell went to the bank, got the money, brought it back and put it in his carpet-sack. That is the testimony.

Now, Mr. Bliss says:

No evidence was given as to what Stephen W. Dorsey was wanting just at that time with $7,500 in bills.

According to Mr. Rerdell, he wanted that money to give to Mr. Brady.

That is what Mr. Rerdell intended to swear. But when he found that that check was made payable to him, and indorsed by him, then they had to take another tack. They dare not say then, "That is the check." They dare not say then, "That is the money." Rerdell had forgotten at the time he swore that that check was payable to his order. When he told his $7,000 story to MacVeagh he forgot about that check. When he told it to the Postmaster-General, if he did—I have forgotten whether he did or not—he forgot about that.

Now, gentlemen, I will call your attention to the part to which I really wish to direct your attention. It is an admission by the Government, an admission by Colonel Bliss; it is in these words, on page 4997, speaking of this very thing:

However that may be, they themselves put in a check here for $7,500, drawn about the time Mr. Rerdell spoke of, the money upon which admittedly went to Stephen W. Dorsey, though there is a question raised as to whether it was drawn in Mr. Rerdell's presence or whether it was not drawn by him. But the money went to Stephen W. Dorsey, and there was a promise made to show you what was done with that $7,500. But, like many another promise in this case, it remains unfulfilled to-day. No evidence was given as to what Stephen W. Dorsey was wanting just at that time with $7,500 in bills.

Mr. Dorsey offered to tell you what he did with it, and you said you did not want it; you did not want to know when he was on the stand. He offered to tell you what he did with the money, and you would not take his statement. Hear what he says:

Mr. Dorsey was not taking $7,500 in bills to the West.

How do you know? Who ever told Mr. Bliss that he was not taking $7,500 to the West? He must have got that from Mr. Rerdell. Maybe that is the reason they would not allow Dorsey to tell, because before that time they had been informed that he would swear that he took the $7,500 to the West. How else did Mr. Bliss find this out? It is not in the evidence, not a line. Somebody must have told him. Who could have told him? Nobody, I think, except Mr. Rerdell. Is it possible, then, that Mr. Bliss was afraid that Mr. Dorsey would swear that he took it West? And was he afraid also that you would believe it? I do not know. He did not want him to state. Now here is what I want to call your attention to:

Of course all that transaction might have occurred precisely as Mr. Rerdell testified, and there might have involved no corruption on Mr. Brady's part.

There is an admission. After all the talk about that evidence, all the talk about the $7,000, all the talk about the $7,500 check, Mr. Bliss at least admits to this jury:

Of course all that transaction might have occurred precisely as Mr. Rerdell testified, and there might have involved no corruption on Mr. Brady's part.

If, then, it may have occurred exactly as Rerdell swore, and involved no corruption, certainly it might have occurred as Mr. S. W. Dorsey swore and involved no corruption. I will go on now with a little more from Mr. Bliss:

The drawing of the money and going to Mr. Brady's room might have been a mere accident, as a call there to attend to some other business.

Of course, that is reasonable. I might go to the bank and draw $5,000, and then I might stop in the Treasury Department, but that is no evidence that I am bribing the Secretary of the Treasury. I might step over to see the President; that would be no reason to believe that I bribed the Executive.

Of course that is not conclusive. It is only a little straw in this case, as showing a transaction of that kind involved in connection with all the evidence you have in this case—evidence of Mr. Brady's acts, and particularly as at the time when that occurs evidence in connection with the large increases which Mr. Brady was then ordering; evidence in connection with the books, and the evidence they bear; evidence in connection with the declarations of Brady to Walsh—evidence all consistent.

“A little straw”—

And then he adds this piece of gratuitous information :

Mr. Dorsey was not taking $7,500 in bills to the West.

How does he know? How did he find that out? And has it come to this? Has all the testimony upon that point—has the confession of Rerdell to MacVeagh and James shrunk to this little measure—that it is “only a straw?” Has it shrunk to this measure that Mr. Bliss admits that the whole thing might have been exactly as Rerdell swears, and yet have been perfectly innocent? Has it shrunk to this little measure? The Government would not tell us—I presume the Government will not tell us, what check it was the proceeds of which were taken by Mr. Dorsey to Mr. Brady. Neither will they say whether that sum was made up in one check or by adding together a number of checks; and, if so, what number?

At page 295 Mr. Bliss told you, in his opening speech, that Rerdell had on one occasion gone with Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey to the bank, and that $7,000 had been drawn; that he had gone with Dorsey to the door of the Post-Office Department, or to Brady's room, at the time—he would not undertake to say which—Mr. Dorsey stating to him that he intended to pay that money to Mr. Brady, and that he (Mr. Dorsey) then went in. But when they come to put this man on the stand he will not swear that Dorsey ever told him that he intended to pay the money to Brady. Probably that part of the statement, that Dorsey told him that he was going to pay that money to Brady, can be found in the affidavit made before Mr. Woodward, in September, and repeated in the affidavit made at Hartford in November. But it is not in the evidence here.

Now, we brought all the checks that we had given on Middleton's bank, with the exception of two, I believe, that amounted to some hundred and odd dollars. We gave the Government counsel notice that there were two others.

Mr. MERRICK. Is there any evidence as to the amount of the checks?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I am giving you the evidence of my own statement.

Mr. MERRICK. I object to that.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I stated it at that time, and I have a right to state what I stated at that time.

Mr. MERRICK. It is that to which I object. He is not stating the evidence. He says it is his own statement, and that is not evidence.

Mr. S. W. DORSEY. I stated the amount, colonel.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I stated properly at that time the number of the checks and what they amounted to, and my client, S. W. Dorsey, swore on the stand what they amounted to.

Mr. MERRICK. If your honor please, pardon me for interrupting the counsel, but my recollection is that there were two of these checks that were not brought in.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes; that is right.

Mr. MERRICK. And when the counsel introduced those in evidence that he did introduce, he made some statements and promises in reference to those that he did not, to the effect that the court was to have them all. I may be in error in my recollection, but that is my recollection without refreshing it by the record. So it is questionable now, under the ruling of your honor at the time, whether, in the absence of those two checks, those actually brought in are in evidence. When we refer to the record I think you will find that your honor so intimated—that is, to the effect that the whole must be here in order that a part might be admitted. But as to those not brought in, unquestionably the counsel has no right to say one word to the jury, except that there were two not brought in, unknown in quantity and unknown as to the payee.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I think the court decided that those that were already in should stay. That very question was raised. But before I get through I will show from the record exactly what happened, and I will show further that my client swore at that time what the other two checks were and what they came to.

Mr. BLISS. No, sir; that would have been proving the contents of written papers.

The COURT. My recollection of the occurrence is something like this: That the defendants offered certain checks drawn upon Middleton & Co. during that month. The court was of opinion that those checks of themselves were not competent evidence. Something was said, and the court was of opinion at the time that all the checks, for that matter, if offered in evidence by the defendants, would be received; and a day or two afterwards the checks were produced, with the exception of two, and it was stated that those two were of small amounts severally, and would afterwards be produced.

Mr. MERRICK. Yes, sir.

The COURT. I think they never were produced afterwards.

Mr. INGERSOLL. No, sir; I could not find them.

Mr. MERRICK. And the admission of the others, your honor ruled, was to depend upon the performance of the promise of the introduction of all.

The COURT. No, there was no condition about it.

Mr. MERRICK. Not expressed to the court, but your honor said they were admissible if all were produced, and the response to that qualification was, "They will be produced."

Mr. INGERSOLL. You are a little in error about that, Mr. Merrick.

Mr. MERRICK. Find the record. Leave that for the present and refer to it in the morning.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will refer to it in the morning and show just what was said.

What I say is, gentlemen of the jury, that at that time when we introduced those checks the evidence was that there were two others. I think it was stated to whom one of them was made payable; but without going into any particulars, it was stated, I believe, that they amounted to a hundred and odd dollars.

Mr. MERRICK. I object to that statement.

Mr. INGERSOLL. It is part of the evidence.

Mr. MERRICK. No, sir; it is not.

The COURT. No; it was not.

Mr. INGERSOLL. It was so sworn, in my judgment.

Mr. MERRICK. The court said it is not in the record.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Very well; wait then until I find it. So we will say nothing about those two vagrant checks now. Let them go. I did introduce a certain number of checks; I do not know how many, but a good many. Among those checks was this one for $7,500. There were many others. I asked the gentlemen to pick out their check; they would not do it. I asked the gentlemen to pick out the checks; they did not do it. And now if we had failed to produce checks that were important in this case, the Government could have produced the books and clerks of Middleton & Co., and shown exactly the checks we drew upon that bank that month. They did not do it. As a matter of fact, I offered all the checks on all the banks I could think of that we had any business with in any way, except one, and that turned out to be the German-American Savings Bank, and it turned out that that went into bankruptcy eight months before this business; so there is no trouble about that. Why did they not pick out the checks upon which they claimed that the money was drawn that was paid to Brady?

Mr. Rerdell, on page 2254, in speaking of the money, swore that money was charged to Brady on the stub. He says that Dorsey told him, "You will find the amount on the stub of the check-book." The jury will notice that he speaks of the "amount," the "stub," and the "book," all in the singular. That was followed, I believe, by about six pages of discussion, and everybody who took part in that discussion, the court included, spoke of the sum of money as an "amount," upon a "stub," in a "check-book." And on page 2258 the court says:

The COURT. In consequence of that. It is proposed to prove that Dorsey directed the witness to enter a credit to William Smith upon the account book for an amount which he would find entered upon the stub of Dorsey's check-book. Now, it is proposed to prove further, that the witness did look at that stub of the check-book, and did enter a certain credit. The question now is whether the rule excluding oral testimony where better testimony, written testimony, can be obtained, applies to such a case as that. The book is not here. It is proposed to prove what the witness did in that book, what credit he entered in that book; it is not proposed to prove, as I understand it, what the stub exhibited, but what the witness did after looking at that stub in pursuance of the request made by Dorsey.

Mr. MERRICK. I propose to prove that he, being referred to the stub-book, ascertained something from it in reference to the amount, confirmatory of what Dorsey had said generally about the amount. He said, "So much has been paid, but you will find it on the stub-book. Go there and make the charge on the book against William Smith, of whatever amount it was.

Then, at the bottom of the page:

Mr. MERRICK. I desire, your honor, before reaching the second point and before framing the offer, in a shape which makes it plainly admissible beyond all doubt, to claim the right to introduce it upon the ground of the notice. That notice will become quite important in the course of the further examination of this and other witnesses. If we had the stub-book here the witness could pick out the particular check.

Now, what I insist is, that all along they were talking about one check, one charge on one stub, one stub in one stub-book, and one amount on one stub. Then there is a little bit of departure:

Those checks—

Plural for the first time—were not drawn to the favor of William Smith, but were drawn payable to Dorsey himself.

Mr. MERRICK. What page do you read from?

Mr. CARPENTER. 2259.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I also call attention to 2254-'55-'56-'57-'58-'59. On all those pages it is spoken of as a stub of a check-book, or amount on a stub in a check-book. After the discussion was closed, then the witness began to talk about "books," "checks," "stubs," and "amounts." Why did he do that? His object was to get the evidence broad enough—checks and check-books enough—to fit their notice, to the end that they might get possession of all the check-books, and of all the amounts on all the stubs.

What more? The discussion convinced Mr. Rerdell that it would be far safer to say "stubs" than "stub;" that it would be far better to say "check-books" than "check-book," and far better to say "amounts" than "amount;" because he would have a better chance in adding these up so as to make $6,500, or $7,000, or $6,000, than to be brought down to one check, one amount, and one stub-book. So he went off into the region of safety, into the domain of the plural.

Now, the last point—at least for this evening—so far as Mr. Bliss is concerned, I believe, is about the red books. Mr. Bliss tells you that Mrs. Cushman was telegraphed to from the far West. There was a little anxiety, I believe, on the part of Rerdell about the book, and he telegraphed her. She found it there in the wood-shed, you know, hanging up, I think, in the old family carpet-sack—I have forgotten where she found it—and she put it away. Now, there is a question I want to ask here, and I know that Mr. Merrick when he closes will answer it to his entire satisfaction, I do not know whether he will to yours or to mine: How does it happen that Mrs. Rerdell never saw that red book? How does it happen that Mrs. Rerdell, when she was put on the stand, never mentioned that red book? How does it happen that she never heard of it when her husband went to New York to get it; when everything he had in the world, according to his idea, was depending upon it; when it was his sheet-anchor; when it was the corner-stone of his safety? And yet his wife never heard of it, never saw it, did not know it was in the wood shed, slept in that house night after night and did not even dream that her husband's safety depended on any book in a carpet-sack hanging in the wood shed. She never said a word about it on the stand, not a word. Gentlemen, nobody can answer that question except by admitting that the book was not there and did not exist.

But perhaps I have said enough about the speeches of Mr. Ker and Mr. Bliss. Of course, their business is to do what they can to convict. I do not know that I ought to take up much more time with them. I feel a good deal as that man did in Pennsylvania who was offered one-quarter of a field of wheat if he would harvest it. He went out and looked at it. "Well," he says, "I don't believe I will do it." The owner says, "Why?" "Well," he says, "there is a good deal of straw, and I don't think there is wheat enough to make a quarter." [Laughter.]

So now, gentlemen, if the court will permit, I would like to adjourn till to-morrow morning.

The COURT. Adjourn the court.

Thereupon (at 3 o'clock and 53 minutes p. m.) the court adjourned until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

THURSDAY, MAY 24, 1883.

The court met at 11 o'clock.

Present, counsel for the Government and for the defendants.

Mr. INGERSOLL. If the court please, and gentlemen: The first thing to do this morning is to clear up a little matter that arose last evening. On page 5400 I was going on to say that Mr. Bliss had made a mistake as to the amount of fines that had been imposed by General Brady on the contractors on the Bismarck and Tongue River route. I stated that the amount was $29,224. I also stated that there was between thirteen and fourteen thousand dollars remitted. At that point Mr. Bliss interrupted me, and said:

Of which $17,831 was remitted.

To which I replied:

Yes; but what do you say? Mr. Bliss states that the fines on the Bismarck and Tongue River route during Brady's administration were only $13,000. As a matter of fact, they were $29,224. I have got the gentleman penned up there.

Mr. BLISS. Not very much.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes; very much.

Mr. CARPENTER. Only a little more than $13,000 remitted.

Mr. BLISS. Seventeen thousand eight hundred and thirty-one dollars and odd cents was remitted.

He made that statement while he was looking at the table, and consequently I admitted it. I then said:

I made a mistake of $4,000, and you made a mistake of $16,224. Mr. Bliss is an accurate man, as a rule. He has been called the index of this business for the Government.

Now, I did not suppose, of course, that Mr. Bliss could be mistaken when he was looking at the table, but thinking that may be he might make a mistake, and also thinking that if he did, it would be one against the defendants, I looked, and I found on page 727 of the record that the amount of fines was exactly as I stated, except it was 9 cents more—just $29,224.09. While Mr. Bliss was looking at the table of remissions on the Tongue River route he said the remissions were $17,831. On page 727 I find that the remissions were $13,303.74, and no more.

Mr. BLISS. Please look at the two items—starred—$4,503.89 and $13,328.56, and then look below and see what it says:

Remission of parts of the deduction imposed in the fourth quarter of 1879 and the first quarter of 1880.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes. It says there remissions $13,303.74. The others never were remitted. I turn right back to page 725, and on the third line I find:

Bismarck and Tongue River route. Pay accrued, $157,487.83. Fines and deductions, $46,299.89. Remissions, $13,303.74.

There it is, gentlemen.

Mr. BLISS. And yet the $4,503.89, and the other amount are starred as afterwards remitted.

Mr. INGERSOLL. It is a mistake.

Mr. BLISS. It may be. It is in the table. I have not looked to see whether it is a mistake or not.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I want the gentleman's character as an index destroyed. I want you, gentlemen, to know that one of two things is true: Either that he does not know the contents of these papers or that he does not state them. So much for that point.

I have another little difficulty to settle with the same gentleman. I stated on yesterday that the idea Mr. Bliss had and that he has endeavored to enforce again and again was that in making the affidavit you should state in that affidavit the number of men and horses then actually in use; not the number required—not the number necessary, but the number actually in use. Mr. Bliss denied that, and said I was mistaken. I did not know but that I was, and so I went and looked at the record. I first looked at page 239 to see if he had ever said anything of that kind. On page 239, found this language used by Mr. Bliss:

You have to find out how many are employed at the moment under the original contract, and then how many will probably be employed under the increased speed. One is a question of fact, the other a matter of opinion.

In other words, he lays down the doctrine that the affidavit should state the actual number then employed. I demonstrated to you that the actual number then employed might not be a reasonable number. On the same page I find this :

You see, gentlemen, the importance of getting at that fact, and getting at it accurately: "How many men and horses are now used."

Then I turn to page 240:

If Mr. Brady takes and states correctly the number of horses actually employed.

On the same page:

He understated the number of men and horses actually employed then.

On the same page:

Now, what did Mr. Brady do in ascertaining these most important numbers? Did he do as any honest man would do, as any fair official would do? Did he make any effort to find out what those numbers were? Did he send to the locality and find out how many men and horses were then actually being used?

On the same page:

He went to the man who was to be benefited by the allowance, who was to get the money from the Treasury, and he received from him a brief affidavit not larger than that [exhibiting a folded paper], in which the man said that the number of stock and carriers now employed—

Were so many. On the same page:

We have searched in vain to find a case where Mr. Brady prior to making an order for increase of speed inquired of any human being how many men and horses were then being used.

On the next page:

That the contractor who is to be benefited should be required to give his own statement, and to give it under oath, of the number of men and horses he is then using.

On the same page:

We probably would try to state correctly the number of men and horses we are now using.

On the same page:

But Mr. Brady, under that regulation, took from the contractor, or claimed to take from the contractor, his affidavit of the number actually used.

On the next page:

What is the result of allowing such affidavits, so made by these parties, to be accepted? Why the result was, and we shall place before you the witnesses who will show it, that the statements were almost uniformly false of the number of men and horses then actually in use.

Yet he says that is not his doctrine. On page 243:

I believe that is the absolutely conclusive statement of the number of men and animals that are now in use upon that route.

Then I go to page 245:

The affidavit which stated the number of men and horses then actually in use.

On the same page:

The only error was that he forgot when he made the second affidavit what he had stated in the first affidavit as to the number of men and horses actually in use.

Now we come to page 4761. Let us see if he still kept up his doctrine in his last speech:

He orders expedition and increase, being governed by the proportion between the number of men and horses actually used and the number of men and horses that are thought to be needed on the proposed schedule.

Then I come to page 4762:

Take, for instance, a case where the amount allowed is $2,000 a year, and where they are actually using five men and ten horses.

Now, on page 4793, to show that he still kept up his doctrine:

In other words, the statute looks to the fact, what were the number of men and horses actually used when the oath was made.

That is enough. I can give, I think, twenty-seven other cases where he used that expression. I stated yesterday that he laid down to you the doctrine that the first question was to know the number of men and horses actually in use at the time the affidavit was made. I have demonstrated to you that that is an unsafe rule.

Mr. BLISS. Will you allow me to say a word?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will.

Mr. BLISS. I began by saying that the statute said the number necessarily employed; and that in getting at the number necessarily employed the most important element in the calculation was to find out how many were then being used. I started out in my remarks in both cases by saying that the statute said "necessarily employed," and that it must be those that were employed, and it must be those that were necessarily employed. I said it might be that there were not enough necessarily employed.

The COURT. You speak of a statute. There is no statute.

Mr. BLISS. There is a statute:

The additional compensation shall bear no greater proportion to the additional stock and carriers necessarily employed than the compensation in the original contract bears to the stock and carriers necessarily employed in its execution.

The COURT. I understand that. But in regard to the regulations——

Mr. BLISS. [Interposing.] I fitted the affidavit to the regulation. I assumed that the regulation was intended to comply with the statute. The statute says, "The number necessarily employed." I started out in that way, and then said that the best evidence of what were necessarily employed, or evidence that ought to be obtained, was as to the number actually in use. That is my view now.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That explanation (as you said of the friendship of Vaile and Miner, as I recollect it) is too thin. Gentlemen, what he did insist upon before this jury, and what I have shown to you he insisted upon, is that the thing to find out is not the number necessary, but the number actually in use, and that would show the number necessary. I demonstrated to you that a man could carry a mail one hundred and fifty miles and back once a week with one horse, and he need not do it more than one week in order to make an affidavit that that was the number actually employed. I showed you that by his rule the Government could have been defrauded out of millions of dollars. You see his rule will not work. The rule is this, gentlemen: The number reasonably employed; the reasonable number to do the work on the existing schedule, and the reasonable number to be employed to do the work on the expedited or increased schedule. That is the law, because that is common sense. There can be no question about that.

Now, if the court please, I come to the next point. Mr. Merrick, I wish to call your attention to pages 3964 and 3965. This is with regard to the Middleton checks:

Mr. MERRICK. In regard to the checks that were offered the other day, your honor, are they considered in evidence? There was some proposition about doing something, and I did not know whether they were in generally or provisionally.

Mr. INGERSOLL. They are in evidence, as I understand it. I read them all and stated at the time that there was another one.

The COURT. The checks on Middleton & Co. are in evidence.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Oh, yes, so I understood.

Mr. MERRICK. There were two checks on Middleton & Co. missing, I believe.

The COURT. One for a small amount—a $10 check.

Mr. BLISS. There is no evidence as to what that check was.

Mr. MERRICK. It is a missing check.

Mr. CARPENTER. For a small sum of money.

Mr. BLISS. We do not know that.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will show exactly. I stated at the time that I could not prove it by that witness, but I would introduce another, which I will do.

Mr. MERRICK. The stub-books will show it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. You will have as much as you can do, gentlemen, to run one side of this case.

Mr. MERRICK. There are two checks missing.

The WITNESS. That is my recollection, that there are two missing; one, I think, for $60 or $70 and one for one hundred and—

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] No matter; I did not ask about that.

Mr. INGERSOLL. No matter; we will prove it.

Mr. MERRICK. Supposing that that will be proved, shall I proceed with the examination about these checks?

The COURT. Certainly; you may regard those checks in evidence; they were admitted.

Mr. MERRICK. They were admitted, as I understood, in the event that all the checks were put in.

The COURT. No; they were admitted at any rate.

Mr. MERRICK. But I mean all the checks on Middleton & Co. for that month.

The COURT. It was understood at the time, however, that those missing checks would be accounted for.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Certainly.

Now, on page 3737, I find some more remarks on the same subject:

Mr. INGERSOLL. If the court please, I offer in evidence every check given on Middleton & Co. in the month of June, 1879.

The COURT. How many of them are there?

Mr. INGERSOLL. [After counting checks.] There are twenty-seven, and there is one check for $170 to Reeside, making twenty-eight. Those are all I know of.

Now, on page 3738, very near the bottom:

The COURT. Do you propose to follow this evidence by proving that these are all the checks?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes, sir; either that they are all, or produce the other one; the other one is all I know, in the month of June, 1879.

Thereupon objection was made by the prosecution and overruled by the court. I then introduced, I believe, twenty-seven checks, stating at the same time that there was another one. The other one I never could find and never did find. Mr. Dorsey in his evidence said that he believed there were two checks, one I think for sixty or seventy dollars, and one for a hundred and something. I find on page 2298, in the testimony of Rerdell, something on the subject. The affidavit of June, 1881, was under consideration:

Q. Another paragraph:

"I desire to say here, that from long association and connection with Mr. Dorsey as his stenographer and business agent, I have learned to imitate his handwriting, and can sign his name so near like he does that he himself cannot tell it, and I have signed checks that passed the bank."

A. That is not so, except that I did on one occasion sign a check at his request. Sitting at the desk opposite him I had written a check, and he said, "Sign it," and I signed it without any effort, as I now remember. And on another occasion I signed a check "S. W. Dorsey, by M. C. R.," which got the money. I have got that check at home now, I think.

The only point that I make is that I consider those checks in evidence

Mr. MERRICK. There is one other page upon the subject. I think page 3739, if I am not mistaken, but it is not material to read it. Suffice it to say, before Mr. Ingersoll proceeds, as he has addressed his remark to me, that there was never as far as I recollect any evidence introduced in reference to those two checks. It was all speculative and there was no proof that these were all the checks.

The COURT. Rerdell accounts for one of them.

Mr. MERRICK. No, sir; not on that bank; not necessarily does he account for one of them. There is no proof that these forty and odd checks, I think Mr. Ingersoll said, are all the checks.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I think there were twenty-eight in all and I introduced twenty-seven which were all I had at the time. Afterward I think Mr. Dorsey stated that there was still another check to Reeside of $170 or $70, and I found that check.

The COURT. What evidence is there in the case that these twenty-eight checks as you say were all the checks for that month?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Mr. Dorsey swears to it.

Mr. MERRICK. I think not. I may be mistaken. I was going on to remark in that connection that there is in the numbering of the checks which follow in tolerably consecutive order, at one point a break of some fifty checks. The checks are consecutively numbered.

Mr. INGERSOLL. A break of just fifty checks.

Mr. CARPENTER. A break of three hundred on account of the change of check books.

Mr. MERRICK. I think not so large a break as that. I am very confident of it. The checks follow consecutively and then there is a break. The first suggestion I make to the court is that there is no proof that these are all the checks and consequently by the break in the number there is indirect proof that they are not.

Mr. CARPENTER. There is a break of three hundred and sixty.

Mr. MERRICK. I will show you that that is a mistake.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. Bliss commented upon it in his speech.

Mr. MERRICK. That he may have done. That I do not deny. I simply make this suggestion, and that is all I have a right to do now.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Then I do not care to say any more on the subject, except to the jury. I stopped commenting further last evening on account of there being a dispute as to the evidence. The condition of the evidence as I understand it is simply this: That we introduced some twenty-seven or twenty eight checks. I have not counted them lately. I stated at the time they were introduced that they were all, with the exception of one to Reside. It afterwards turned out, I believe, that there were two not here. We commenced with the date of June 9.

Mr. MERRICK. What is the page?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Page 3739. There is a break from 143 to 501. The banks furnish check-books to their customers. Some of these books had a hundred checks in, some five hundred, I believe, and some as low as fifty. The check-books of the same bank are not always alike. They change from time to time. You will notice these checks that I introduced are some of them large. [Exhibiting checks.] These were furnished by the bank, and you will find that they are numbered in the five hundreds.

Mr. MERRICK. May I ask if there is any proof that they are furnished by the bank? My impression is that there is some proof that Dorsey had his own checks printed; but I am not sure about that.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The bank furnishes the checks, and if you want your name printed upon them the bank will have it done. It does not make any difference about that. Now, gentlemen, in drawing checks sometimes a man will use one book and sometimes another, and so of course the numbers will be different; besides all that, it is owing to where he happens to be. All the large ones are in the five hundreds. Sometimes a man writes a check on one book and sometimes on another; sometimes on an ordinary piece of paper, and sometimes on the back of the bill that is brought to him to be paid. There are a thousand ways. We introduced these checks and we said, these are all, with the exception of two. One is for a certain amount and the other is, I believe, for a hundred and odd dollars.

Mr. MERRICK. I object to that statement.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is what the witness said.

Mr. MERRICK. If your honor will allow me——

Mr. INGERSOLL. [Interposing.] I read from page 3964:

The WITNESS. That is my recollection, that there are two missing: one, I think, for sixty or seventy dollars and one for one hundred and ——

And the answer was not finished.

Mr. MERRICK. In the course of a discussion between the counsel and the court, whilst the witness was on the stand, in response to no question whatever, the witness, as he did when Bissell was on the stand, just blurted out this statement. It is not evidence in the case, your honor. He could not prove the contents of a paper. It was an expression coming from the witness without inquiry and was a breach of order. It was immediately followed by my remark:

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] No matter. I did not ask about that.

Mr. CARPENTER. You cannot find it stricken out anywhere.

Mr. MERRICK. It makes no difference whether it is stricken out or not. I say it is not in the case, for he was not then testifying, properly speaking, any more than he was when he told Bissell on the stand, from his seat, that there was no J. B. B. check.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That would not have been evidence if Bissell had not agreed with him.

Mr. MERRICK. He did not agree with him.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Oh, yes; he said he could not say whether it was that or a draft on Tankersley.

The COURT. I think that would hardly be evidence.

Mr. INGERSOLL. No matter whether it was or not; I do not care.

Here are the German-American National Bank checks, and there seem to be two kinds of checks. Some of these Middleton checks seem to have the numbers printed. I introduced the checks, stating that they were all there except two.

Mr. MERRICK. I object to that.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I have the right to make that statement.

Mr. MERRICK. I do not think counsel has a right to make that statement.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Then we will discuss that.

Mr. MERRICK. I must insist that the counsel confine himself to the evidence, where I am prepared to meet him; but I cannot cope with him in statements of that kind.

The COURT. Undoubtedly these checks were admitted with the understanding that counsel for the defense would produce the missing checks.

Mr. MERRICK. Produce the missing checks and prove that he had produced and accounted for all.

The COURT. And with that understanding the others were admitted. But having come in in that way, the court subsequently refused to take them out, and endeavored to hold counsel to their pledge. Whether they have fulfilled that pledge or not——

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] Is a matter for the court.

The COURT. [Continuing.]—is a matter for the court.

Mr. MERRICK. There were other obligations which I have no doubt they would have fulfilled if they could.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The court says they are in absolutely.

Mr. MERRICK. Yes; they are in. But the counsel first stated that two were all that were needed to complete the number drawn in the month of June, but there was no proof of that fact, as far as I know.

The COURT. No proof further than Colonel Ingersoll's statement.

Mr. MERRICK. That is all, and I should be sorry to take that as proof, and I am sure that Colonel Ingersoll would not want to take the statement of counsel as proof in a case.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is not what I am talking about.

Mr. MERRICK. What the counsel said was said to the court, and is a pledge remaining unredeemed, because you could not find them.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes; it was unredeemed, because I stated here in court that we could not find the checks.

Mr. MERRICK. I say because you could not find them.

The COURT. Then the case stands in that way, and the jury may draw its inference one way or the other from that omission.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is right.

The COURT. [To Mr. Merrick.] Then the matter is open for you to comment upon.

Mr. MERRICK. That unaccounted-for check is not the only thing, but the promise of the proof that those were all the checks was not fulfilled.

The COURT. That is open for your remark.

Mr. MERRICK. I object. I do not think the court understands me.

Mr. INGERSOLL. At the time that I offered these checks I notified the other side that we claimed that those were all, with two exceptions; I think I said one at first, and I think afterwards the witness said two. I simply want it understood that at the time I introduced these checks I gave full, perfect, and complete notice that we claimed that those were all with those two exceptions—that I stated at that time—and that I would bring them in if we could find them.

The COURT. Yes; there was no proof afterwards on your part that they were all.

Mr. INGERSOLL. No, sir.

The COURT. And there was no proof on the other side that they were not all.

Mr. MERRICK. And yet there was a distinct promise that there would be proof that they were all.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Now, gentlemen, all I want to say is that after I had given them such notice, and the proof was not forthcoming, they could have gone to the bank of Middleton & Co., and have shown by its books and clerks that these were not all, and that there were other checks for large amounts drawn by Dorsey to his own order in the month of June, the proceeds of which might have been paid to Mr. Brady. The prosecution is absolutely welcome to all they can make out of that. Here is the bank right down here. Everybody knows Middleton & Co. If these were not all the checks, if other checks had been drawn for large amounts, it would have been very easy to bring Mr. Middleton here, and perfectly easy to bring his clerks and books here in court.

Mr. MERRICK. Why did you not bring them?

Mr. INGERSOLL. After I had introduced the checks and made the search for the others I absolutely forgot the question ; it passed out of my mind utterly. That is the absolute truth. Else I would have proved by Mr. Dorsey that he made the search and that they could not be found. But I will now give the gentlemen the opportunity, if they make any claim on that, to bring in Mr. Middleton and his clerks and books. No need of having any trouble on a little thing like that.

Now, gentlemen, the next witness to whose testimony I will invite your attention is Mr. Boone. Mr. Boone was relied upon by the Government to show that this conspiracy was born in the brain of Mr. Dorsey ; that these other men were simply tools and instrumentalities directed by him ; that he was the man who devised this scheme to defraud the Government, and that it was Dorsey who suggested the fraudulent subcontracts. They brought Mr. Boone upon the stand for that purpose, and I do not think it is improper for me to say that Mr. Boone was swearing under great pressure. It is disclosed by his own testimony that he had, I believe, eight hundred or nine hundred routes.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Eleven hundred.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Eleven hundred routes, and that he had been declared a failing contractor by the department ; and it also appeared in evidence that he had been indicted some seven or eight times. Gentlemen, that man was swearing under great pressure. I told you once before that the hand of the Government had him clutched by the throat, and the Government relied upon his testimony to show how this conspiracy originated. Now I propose to call your attention to the evidence of Mr. Boone upon this subject. I may make some mistake in the page. It is hard to keep perfectly accurate with regard to the page. Sometimes I read just at the bottom of the page on the last line, and then over on the next page. But if I make any mistake of that kind I will gladly correct it, of course.

On page 1352 Mr. Boone swears substantially that on his first meeting with Stephen W. Dorsey—that is, after they met at the house—he said to Dorsey that he (Boone) would be satisfied with a one-third interest. Now, the testimony of Boone is that Mr. Dorsey then and there agreed that he might have the one-third interest.

Mr. Dorsey says it is not that way ; that he told him that when the others came they would probably give him that interest, or something to that effect.

Mr. Boone further swears that when J. W. Dorsey did come there was a contract—or articles of agreement you may call them—handed to him by J. R. Miner, purporting to be articles of partnership between John W. Dorsey and himself, and that he signed these articles ; that that, I believe, was on the 15th of January, 1878, and that it was by virtue of that agreement that he had one third. It was not by virtue of any talk he had with S. W. Dorsey that he got an interest, and you will see how perfectly that harmonizes with the statement of Stephen W. Dorsey.

Mr. Dorsey's statement is: "I cannot make the bargain with you, but when John W. Dorsey comes I think he will, or they will." It turned out that when John W. Dorsey did come in January he did enter into articles of partnership with A. E. Boone, and did give him the one-third interest. So the fact stands out that he got the one-third interest from John W. Dorsey and not from Stephen W. Dorsey. If the paper had been written and signed by Stephen W. Dorsey that would uphold the testimony of Boone. If Boone had said, "I made the bargain with Stephen W. Dorsey," and the articles of copartnership were signed by him, I submit that that would have been a perfect corroboration of Boone. Stephen W. Dorsey swears that the bargain was made with John W. Dorsey, and you find that the agreement was signed by John W. Dorsey, and not by Stephen W. Dorsey. I submit, therefore, that that is a perfect corroboration of the testimony of Stephen W. Dorsey.

At page 1544 Mr. Boone says that, as a matter of fact, all contractors endeavored to keep what they were doing secret from all other contractors. Think of the talk we have heard about secrecy. If the bidders upon any of these routes did not want the whole world to know the amount they had bid, that secrecy was tortured into evidence of a criminal conspiracy. If John W. Dorsey did not want the world to know what he was doing, if Mr. Boone wanted to keep a secret, these gentlemen say it is because they were engaged in a conspiracy to defraud the Government, and crime loves the darkness. What does Mr. Boone say? As a matter of fact, that all contractors endeavored to keep what they were doing secret from all other contractors where they feared rivalry. Of course that is human nature.

Mr. Boone further says that he never knew of one contractor admitting even that he was going to bid. He always pretended, don't you see, that he was not going to bid. He wanted to throw the other contractors off their guard. He did not want them to imagine that he was figuring upon that same route, because if they thought he was, they might put in a much lower bid. He wanted them to feel secure, so that they would put in a good high bid, and then if he put in a tolerably low bid he would get the route. That is simply human nature.

Boone further says that always when a letting came on he had his bids in; that contractors keep their bids secret from rival contractors, not for the purpose of defrauding the Government, but for the purpose of taking care of their business. Now, gentlemen, when men make these proposals and keep their business secret—as it turns out that in these cases they were keeping their business secret—the fact that they are so doing is not evidence going to show that they are keeping that business secret because they have conspired. Have you not the right to draw the inference, and is it not the law that you must draw the inference, that they kept their business secret for the same reason that all honest men keep their business secret?

At page 1545, Mr. Boone, swearing again about his talk with Mr. Dorsey that night after the arrangement was concluded, says that—

He—

Dorsey—

told me to be careful of Elkins, because Elkins was representing Roots & Kerens, large contractors, * * * the largest in the department, at that time, in the Southwest.

And yet that evidence has been alluded to as having in it the touch and taint of crime, because S. W. Dorsey said to Boone to say nothing to Elkins. Who was Elkins? He, at that time, as appears from the evidence, was the attorney of Roots & Kerens; and who were they? Among the largest, if not the largest contractors in the department; that is, the largest in the Southwest.

Mr. Boone stated that the letter of Peck to S. W. Dorsey requested him to get some man who knew the business to look after the bids or proposals. Now, I want to ask you, gentlemen, and I want you to answer it like sensible men, if Stephen W. Dorsey got up a conspiracy himself, why was it that Peck wrote to him asking him to get some competent man to collect the information about the bids—that is, about the country, about the routes, about the cost of living, about wages, the condition of the roads, and the topography of the country? If it was hatched in the brain of Stephen W. Dorsey, how is it possible, gentlemen, that a letter was written to him by Peck asking him to get a competent man to gather that information? Mr. Boone swears that he had such a letter. Mr. Boone swears that Dorsey showed the letter to him. Mr. Boone swears that, in consequence of that letter, he went to work to gather this information. Did Mr. Dorsey do anything about gathering information? Nothing. Did he give any advice? None. Did he ask any questions? Not one. Did he interfere with Mr. Boone in the business? Never.

You know there was a very suspicious circumstance. I believe there was a direction given that letters be sent to James H. Kepner. That was another suspicious circumstance. Mr. Boone swears that he was also in the mail business; that he did not want the letters to go some place; that he had to give at the department an address; that thereupon he chose the name of James H. Kepner, his step-son, so that all the mail in regard to this particular business would go in one box, and not be mingled with the mail in reference to his individual business or the business represented by the firm to which he belonged. What more does he swear? That neither Dorsey nor any one of these defendants ever suggested that name, or ever suggested that any such change be made; that it was made only as a matter of convenience; that it was not intended to and could not in any way defraud the Government.

Now, Mr. Boone has cleared up a little of this. He has cleared up the letter; he has cleared up the charge of secrecy; he has cleared up the charge that we had the letters addressed to James H. Kepner & Co.; he has shown that everything done so far was perfectly natural, perfectly innocent, and in accordance with the habits of men engaged in that business.

Now I come to the next thing (page 1550). The next great circumstance in this case, the great, suspicious circumstance, was that the amount of the bid was left blank in the proposals. The moment they saw those blanks in the bids they knew then that the Government was to be defrauded, and they brought Mr. Boone here for the purpose of showing that that was done to lay the foundation for a fraud. What does Boone swear? He swears that he always left that part of the proposal blank; always had done so; had been engaged in the mail business for years, and never filled that blank up in his life, in which the amount of the bid should be inserted. It was not left blank to defraud the Government, but to prevent the postmasters and sureties, or any other persons, finding out the amount of the bid. Away goes that suspicious circumstance.

After the bids had been properly executed and came back into the hands of the contractors, from the time the figures were put into those routes, what does he say they did?

We slept with them until we could get them to the department.

He says they never allowed anybody to see them after the amount of the bid had been inserted; that they would not allow anybody to see the amount of the bids; that it was left out, however, only for self-protection, and for no other reason. That is the Government's own witness. He is the man they brought to show that this blank in the bid was a suspicious circumstance. He is the man they brought here to show that because Stephen W. Dorsey had told him to say nothing to Elkins, that injunction of secrecy was evidence of a conspiracy.

At page 1552, Mr. Boone, in speaking of these same things, says that however they were made, whether the name of the bidder or the route was put in, or whatever he did—that is, Boone—he did not do it for the purpose of defrauding the Government. They say to him, “Don’t you know that you left out not only the amount of the bid, but the name of the bidder?” He says, “Whatever I did, whether I left out the amount of the bid or the name of the bidder, I did not do it for the purpose of defrauding the Government; I had no such idea, no idea of defrauding the Government by leaving any blank or any blanks.” He did the work. Stephen W. Dorsey left no blank; A. E. Boone left every blank; and yet they brought him forward to prove that that was the result of a conspiracy; and after he comes upon the stand he swears, “I left those blanks myself; I always left them in proposals exactly in that way; and whether I left out the amount of the bid or the name of the bidder, I did not do it to defraud the Government; I did it simply to protect myself, as I had the right to do.” So much for that. That is gone.

So, speaking of these other proposals (the Clendenning proposals) what does Mr. Boone say—the witness for the Government, the very man who got up those proposals, the man who wrote them, the man who wrapped them up, and sealed them? What does he say? “Those proposals were not gotten up for the purpose of defrauding the Government; I did not send them to Clendenning for that purpose.” That is the end of that. No conspiracy there. The object, don’t you see, gentlemen, was to show by Boone that he acted under the direction of Dorsey; that Dorsey was responsible for everything that Boone did; and that although Boone was guilty of no crime in leaving the bid blank, still, if he did it by authority of Dorsey, Dorsey had an ulterior motive of which Boone was ignorant. Let us see.

At page 1555, Mr. Boone swears that Dorsey never told him at any time or any place that he wanted any blanks left. And yet they were endeavoring by that witness to saddle that upon S. W. Dorsey. But that witness swears that Dorsey never even told him that he wanted any blanks left in any paper, proposal, bid, or bond. He says that Dorsey never at any time or place told him (Boone) that he (Dorsey) wanted any blanks left, or any proposals of any particular form printed, to the end that a fraud might be perpetrated upon the Government—not a word.

And, gentlemen, I am now in that space of time where they say this conspiracy was born. At page 1567, before Miner got here, Mr. Boone swears that Dorsey told him that he would advance money for the other defendants, and Mr. Boone swears that after he got here he never asked Dorsey for a dollar except through Miner; that Dorsey never gave a dollar except through Miner.

What more? This is the witness that is going to establish the guilt of Stephen W. Dorsey. Stephen W. Dorsey never told Boone at any time that he had any interest whatever in those mail routes. Boone never heard of it. Dorsey never told him to print a proposal with a blank; never told him to leave a blank after it was printed; never told him to do anything for the purpose of defrauding the Government in any way at any time. This is extremely good reading, gentlemen, when you take into consideration that this is the witness of the Government, their main prop until the paragon of virtue made his appearance upon the stand.

Page 1558. Another great point: That in preparing the subcontracts, Dorsey having it in his mind to conspire against the Government, or really having conspired, according to their story, wanted a provision in a subcontract for increase and expedition. Why, it strikes me, gentlemen, that that is evidence of honesty rather than dishonesty. If these subcontracts were to hold good during the contract term, and if in the contract given to the contractor by the Government there was a clause for increase and expedition, why should not the subcontract provide for the same contingencies that the contract provided for with the Government? That looks honest, don't it? And I believe, as a matter of fact—I do not know whether I have the right to state it or not—that an order has been issued now by the Post-Office Department——

Mr. BLISS. [Interposing.] I object.

Mr. MERRICK. Is it in evidence?

Mr. INGERSOLL. No, sir.

Mr. MERRICK. Then you cannot state it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I did not know but that these orders, being of a general nature, we could all take notice of them.

Mr. BLISS. We will not take your statement of it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I certainly will not fake yours.

The COURT. You are not trying the case; neither are the counsel on the other side trying it. We are trying it on the evidence.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is right. Now, gentlemen, I say that it was evidence of honesty to put that clause in the subcontract. It was advertising the subcontractor that the moment he signed his subcontract the trips were liable to be increased and the time was liable to be shortened, and that if the time was shortened or the trips increased the pay was to be correspondingly increased. But I will go on with the testimony.

Page 1558: In preparing the subcontract Mr. Dorsey instructed Boone to provide for an expedition clause. That was a suspicious circumstance. What for? To conform to the expedition clause in the contract with the Government. If making it like the Government contract is evidence of conspiracy, the fact that the Government contracts have that clause is evidence that the Government conspired with somebody. It is just as good one way as the other. The Government made a contract with the contractor, the contractor made one with the subcontractor, and the contractor so far forgot his duties, so far forgot his moral obligations, that he made it just the same as his contract with the Government. Gentlemen, is there any depth of depravity below that? Absolutely copying the contract that the Government was going to make with him, and treating the subcontractor, so far as the contract was concerned, as the Government had treated him, he (Boone) prepared a clause which he thought filled the bill, and which he still thinks, I believe, would have been better to use than the other. When he showed that to Stephen W. Dorsey Dorsey suggested another form. It was the same thing exactly, but in different words. There was the testimony I have read to you, and now here is what Mr. Bliss states about it at page 4865:

But Stephen W. Dorsey, away back there, knew sufficient about expedition to appreciate the importance of keeping for the contractors 35 per cent. and giving to the men who were performing the service only 65 per cent.

Why not? Is that a crime? Suppose I agreed to carry the mail four years for $10,000 a year and I subcontract with another man. Have I not the right to get it carried as cheaply as I can? I just ask you that as a business proposition. Or has every man to treat this Government as though it was in its dotage? Must you do business with the Government as though you were contracting with an infant or an idiot? Must you look at both sides of the contract? That is the question. The Government, for instance, advertises for so much granite, and I put in a bid which is accepted; at the same time I know that I could furnish that granite for 25 per cent. less. Is it my duty under such circumstances to go and advertise the Government that I have cheated it, and that I would like to have it put the contract down? There may be heights of morality that would see the propriety of such action, but it is not for every-day wear and tear. Very few people have it; it scarcely ever comes into play in trading horses. Must we treat the Government as though it were imbecile? I say it was a simple business transaction. The Government advertises for proposals to carry the mail; I make my bid for $10,000, and we will say that my bid is accepted. Now, I admit that I could carry it and make money for $5,000.

Am I criminal if I go on and perform the contract as I agreed and draw the money? Or suppose the people along the route do not want it expedited and increased, and so I talk to them about it; I go to Mr. Brown and say, "Mr. Brown you are living in this smart, thriving town, and you need a daily mail." I go to the next village and I say, "Why, gentlemen, you will never have a town here until you have a daily mail; I am the fellow now carrying the mail." And I keep talking about it, you know, and finally get a fellow to get up a petition, or I write one myself, and send it around, and say to them, "Gentlemen, what you want is more mail, faster mail; the mail is the pioneer of civilization, gentlemen; have a daily mail, and along the line at once towns and villages and cities will spring up, and all the hillsides will be covered with farms, and school-houses will be here, and wealth will be universal." Any crime about that? Every railroad has been built just that way. Every park has been laid out in every city by just such means. Nearly every street that has been improved has been improved in that way, by men who had some interest in the property, by men who were to be benefited by it themselves, and who ought to be benefited. Should the men that get the public attention in that direction be benefited, or the men who do nothing? I say that the men who give attention to the business have a right to be benefited by it. And yet here is the crime, gentlemen. And then we only gave these fellows 65 per cent. and took 35 ourselves, because we were bound to the Government to fulfill the contract, as was explained to you so admirably, so perfectly by Judge Wilson. The contract was to run for four years, and I believe in a certain contingency for six months thereafter. We had to carry out the contract, whether the subcontractor carried out his contract with us or not.

Now, this is what Mr. Bliss says:

So, after a large mass of subcontracts had been struck from the press, which gave to the subcontractors all the increase—

There never was a subcontract that gave to the subcontractors all the increase; there is no evidence that there ever was such a subcontract. And yet Mr. Bliss states to you:

So, after a large mass of subcontracts had been struck from the press, which gave to the subcontractors all the increase—

That is a mistake—

he—

That is, Stephen W. Dorsey—directed them to be put back on the press.

I should think he would. If he found any subcontracts were printed that gave to the subcontractor all the increase, I do not wonder that he had them destroyed. Here you get, we will say, a contract for $10,000 for one trip, with the agreement that if there are two trips the compensation shall be $20,000. Thereupon you make a contract with a subcontractor, and you agree in that subcontract that he shall have all the increase. Of course, you want that made over again; of course, you would not make that kind of a subcontract.

He directed them to be put back on the press, and this provision giving the subcontractor his money struck out and this other clause put in.

Gentlemen, that is an entire and absolute mistake. There is no such evidence, there never was in this case, and I take it there never will be. The evidence was—and you remember it; and you remember it; and you remember it; and you [addressing different jurors]—that Stephen W. Dorsey allowed to the subcontractor 65 per cent. of the expedition, and that same subcontract provided what he should have for one trip, and what he should have for two trips; that is to say, what he should have for increase; and it provided at the same time for 65 per cent. on expedition. Mr. Boone swears it; others swear it. Not only that, but it is printed in the record again and again and again. Why did Stephen W. Dorsey do that? I can tell you why: He did not. Why did Stephen W. Dorsey do that, if it was not because his fertile imagination had already conceived the plan of defrauding the United States, and he was making an arrangement by which that fraud could be consummated? How would that help him consummate a fraud? Suppose he struck out all the per cent. to the subcontractors; suppose he had not had any subcontract printed; suppose the subcontract was printed, and printed on purpose to deceive and defraud the subcontractors; how does that show that he was trying to defraud the United States? Why, if it proves anything it proves the other, that he had not entered into a conspiracy by which he could get the money from the United States, but had endeavored to get it from the subcontractors. If it proves anything it proves that. But the reason it does not prove anything is because the statement is not correct.

Now, just see how a conspiracy can be built of that material. A man that can do that can make a cover for Barnum's Circus with one postage-stamp; he can make a suit of clothes out of a rabbit-skin; he can make a grain of mustard seed cover the whole air without growing. Just think of that. Here is the evidence of that conspiracy:

So, after a large mass of subcontracts had been struck from the press, which gave to the subcontractors all the increase, he directed them to be put back on the press, and this provision giving the subcontractor his money struck out and this other clause put in.

That is given as an evidence that Dorsey had conspired. There is not a thing on the earth that he could have done that would not prove conspiracy just as well as that—just exactly—no other act. Humph! That is the way they build a conspiracy.

Why not take another step? Why not have a little bit of ordinary good hard sense? On the 17th day of May, I believe, 1878, the act was passed allowing the subcontractor to put his subcontract on file. Now, that contract ought to provide for all the contingencies of the service, so that if the trips were increased the Government would know how much to pay that subcontractor; so that if the time was expedited the Government would know how much to pay the subcontractor. The subcontract ought to have been made in that way, and it would be perfectly proper to make it in that way.

I once went to see a friend of mine who had the erysipelas and who was a little crazy. I sat down by his bedside, and he says, "Ingersoll, I have made a discovery; I just tell you I am going to be a millionaire." Said I, "What is it?" He says, "I have found out that if four persons take hold of hands after they have had a hole made in the ground and put a piece of stove-pipe in it, and then run around it as hard as they can from left to right, a ball of butter will come out of the pipe." [Laughter.] Now, I think that is about as reasonable as the way conspiracies are made, according to Mr. Bliss.

Now, we come to Mr. Boone (page 1560). He says that the action he had taken was upon his own responsibility, and that at no time had any papers been gotten up with any view of defrauding the Government. That was good. I am like the Democrat who said, after hearing the returns from Berks County, "That sounds good." The action he had taken had been on his own responsibility, and at no time had papers been gotten up with any view of defrauding the Government. Then, here is a question asked him:

Q. I understood you to say that the contract was made between you and somebody, fixing your interest in all this business?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you recollect about the date of that?—A. I think it is on the day John W. Dorsey got here in Washington.

On page 1561 he swears that at the time Boone made that contract with John W. Dorsey he and Dorsey had not conspired to defraud the Government in any way, nor did they ever do so after that contract was made. When was that contract made? It was made on the 15th day of January, 1878. Who made it? John W. Dorsey of the one part, and Albert E. Boone of the other. And they tell exactly what that contract was for. Here is the contract, on page 1561, and this shows that the statement of Stephen W. Dorsey that the matter was deferred until John W. Dorsey should come is absolutely correct:

This memoranda of agreement made and concluded this 15th day of January, A. D. 1878, by and between John W. Dorsey and Albert E. Boone, witnesseth:

That, first. It is agreed that a copartnership is hereby entered into by and between John W. Dorsey, of Middlebury, Vt., and Albert E. Boone, of Washington, D. C., under the firm-name of J. W. Dorsey & Co.

Second. That the parties to this agreement shall share in all the profits, gains, and losses as follows: John W. Dorsey shall have two-thirds and Albert E. Boone share, one-third.

Now it goes on about where the routes are to be, in the States of Arkansas, Louisiana, Texas, and so on.

Sixth. The partnership hereby formed shall continue until August 1, A. D. 1882, unless sooner dissolved by mutual consent.

JOHN W. DORSEY. [SEAL.]
A. E. BOONE. [SEAL.]

Then I asked him:

Q. Was that firm dissolved?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was there any written agreement of dissolution?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Have you got that?—A. I turned over to the prosecution all the papers connected with that matter.

Now, gentlemen, there was the original partnership agreement. Let us see if that was ever dissolved:

Whereas, on the 12th day of September, 1878—

I think there is a mistake. May be I had better call for the original paper. This original contract, gentlemen, was on the 15th of January, 1878. The next contract was made on the 12th of September, 1878, and at the top it says:

Whereas, on the 12th day of September, 1878—

That evidently refers to the contract of January 15, 1878. Whether 22 X shows it or not, I do not know, but as a matter of fact, it must refer to the one of January 15, 1878.

Whereas on the 12th day of September, 1878, a contract was made by and between John W. Dorsey and Albert E. Boone, whereby said Dorsey was to have two-thirds and said Boone one-third interest in certain mail routes in the States of Kansas, Nebraska, Arkansas, Louisiana, and Texas, and the Territories of Indian and Dakota: Now, therefore, in consideration of $1 in hand paid, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, I hereby, sell assign, and transfer to Albert E. Boone all my said two-thirds interest in the routes in the name of said Boone in the States of Texas, Louisiana, Arkansas, Kansas, and Nebraska, and in the name of said Dorsey in the States of Texas, Louisiana, and Arkansas.

He gives everything to Boone in consideration of one dollar.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand this 12th day of September, 1878.
JOHN W. DORSEY. [SEAL.]

The reason he did that was because Mr. Miner had made a contract with Boone to that effect; and probably I had better read that now so that you will have it exactly and know what we are doing. I read from page 1569:

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 7, 1878.

Whereas A. E. Boone has this day, for the purpose of saving a failure in the routes in the name of John R. Miner, John M. Peck, and John W. Dorsey—

“For the purpose of saving a failure,” recollect. Although Stephen W. Dorsey, according to the prosecution, was a conspirator, and although John W. Dorsey was another, and Peck was another, yet, on the 7th day of August, 1878, “for the purpose of saving a failure,” they made this:

Whereas A. E. Boone has this day, for the purpose of saving a failure in the routes in the name of John R. Miner, John M. Peck, and John W. Dorsey, assigned to John R. Miner his one-third interest in the routes in their names, now, therefore, I, John R. Miner, agree that John W. Dorsey shall assign his interest in routes in the name of A. E. Boone in Kansas and Nebraska, Texas and Louisiana, and Arkansas; in the name of John W. Dorsey, in Texas, Louisiana, and Kansas. The latter clause not guaranteed.

JOHN R. MINER.

Now he said to Mr. Boone, “I have got to have another man come in; we haven’t got the money to run these routes; I have got to get somebody with us; if you will go out, I will agree that John W. Dorsey will assign to you his two-thirds interest in all the routes in Kansas, Nebraska, Texas, Louisiana, and Arkansas. I will agree that John W. Dorsey, although he has a two-thirds interest in all these routes, shall assign them to you, A. E. Boone, and they shall thereupon become your property.” That agreement was made on the 7th of August, 1878; and then, as I read you before, on the 12th day of September Miner made that promise good, and John W. Dorsey did assign to Boone his two-thirds interest in all the routes that Miner said he would. Then Boone was out of it. He had no more to do with Miner, Peck & Co., and no more to do with John W. Dorsey; he went his road and they went theirs. He went out in consideration that John W. Dorsey would give him (Boone) two-thirds of all the routes that he before that time had one-third in. Then Miner took in Mr. Vaile, because he had the money to go on with the business.

(Page 1562, still talking about Mr. Boone.) There is another very suspicious circumstance that was brought up by the prosecution. These bids were put in in different names, and that was looked at as a very suspicious circumstance! What does Boone say about that? He says that the object in bidding in separate names was not to defraud the Government, but was to have the service divided up and not to bid against each other. That was reasonable. The arrangement was simply to keep from injuring themselves; it was not made to defraud the Government, but it was made so that they might not by accident injure each other. It was a common thing for members of a firm to bid in that way, and it is a common thing for persons to organize themselves for the purpose of bidding and running contracts, and when they thus bid they always bid in their individual names. The fact that we bid in our individual names was taken as a circumstance going to show that we had conspired to defraud the Government, and a witness they bring forward to prove that fact swears that it has been the custom for all firms to bid in their individual names. Away goes that suspicion. The coat-tail of that point horizontalizes in the dim distance. [Laughter.]

(Page 1563.) The point was made, gentlemen, that we bid on long routes with slow time, knowing—understand, knowing—that the service would be increased and that the time would be shortened. The only word I object to there is the word “knowing.” That we bid on long routes with slow time thinking that the service would be increased and the time shortened was undoubtedly true. That we bid expecting that the service might be increased and the time shortened is undoubtedly true. That when we bid we took into consideration the probability of the service being increased and the time shortened is undoubtedly true. The only difference is the difference between thinking and knowing; between taking into account probabilities and making the bid because we had made a bargain with the Second Assistant Postmaster-General. That is the difference. Let us see what Boone says about it. I read from page 1563:

On all service of three times a week and under there is a chance for improvement in getting it up to six or seven times a week.

Everybody who has ordinary common sense knows that! If I bid on service for once a week there is a great deal better chance for getting an increase of trips than if there were seven when I started. Everybody knows that. There is about six times as good a chance.

All contractors consider that—in their bids, and bid lower on one, two, and three times a week service than on a daily service—

That chance—

Why?—

because the chances are the route will be increased.

Boone swears on the same page that he always did that himself; that he always had done it. Yet that is lugged in here as evidence of a conspiracy.

There is a great deal better chance for expedition when a route is let at two or three miles an hour than when it is let at six or seven.

Of course there is. The slower it is let the better chance of getting it expedited. The faster it is let the less chance of getting it expedited. There is no need of bringing a man here to show that. You know that. If you thought there was more money in expedition and increase than on the original schedule, you would, as I insist, bid on such routes as the advertisement showed the time was to be slow and the service infrequent upon. Now, gentlemen, to take advantage of such a perfectly apparent thing as that will not do. You have heard a good deal about star routes, gentlemen. Every one of you by this time ought to make a pretty good Postmaster-General; every one of you. If you do not know all about this subject, you never will.

The FOREMAN (Mr. Crane). We ought to be good lawyers, too.

Mr. INGERSOLL. You also ought to be good lawyers, at least on this subject! I do not know that you have got all the testimony in your minds, as there have been so many misstatements made, but if you ever are to know anything on this subject you know something now; and if you, Mr. Foreman, or you, Mr. Renshaw, were to-morrow to go to work to bid on some star routes you would bid on the longest routes, on the slowest time, and with the most infrequent trips. You would do that. Then would you say, "That is evidence that we have conspired?" Has a man got to be so stupid that he will not take advantage of a perfectly plain thing in order to escape the charge of conspiracy? If you were to put your money in land in the Western country you would not go where the country was settled up and give $100 an acre for land. You would go where you could get land for two, or three, or four, or five dollars an acre, and say, "There is a chance for land to rise." That is not conspiracy. So if you were going to bid on mail service you would bid where the time is slow, or the route long, and the service once a week. Then you would say that the country might grow, that railroads might be built and that they might get the service up to seven trips a week; and instead of going on two miles an hour may be they would want to make it seven miles an hour. That is the service to make money on. Is it a crime to make money? Is it a crime to make a good bargain with the Government? I suppose these gentlemen of the prosecution made the best bargain they could with the Government themselves. Is it a crime? I say no. Is a man to be regarded as a conspirator because some outsider thinks he got too good a bargain? That will not do. Boone says he always did that. Of course he did. He says another thing. These gentlemen say that we did not go above three trips, and that is another evidence of fraud. They say we did not bid on any route with more than three trips a week. Mr. Boone tells you, on page 1565, that the department never advertised for four trips a week. That is the reason I think they did not bid on any of these. He also swears that they never advertised for five trips. That is a good reason for our not taking any routes with five trips, is it not? There were not any advertised. The Government did not offer to let us have any. That is a good reason for not taking any of them. The Government had not any of that kind. After you get beyond three trips Boone swears that the next number is six or seven; never four, never five. Don't you see? And yet it is a very suspicious circumstance that we did not bid on any four-trip routes, or any five-trip routes; that we stopped at three. Why did we stop at three? Because if we had not stopped at three we would have had to go to six. Why did we not go to six? Because at six trips a week we would have been obliged to put up too much money, and to put up too many certified checks. It required too many men to go on the bonds. That is the reason. Gentlemen, if there had been a conspiracy it would have been just about as well for us to bid on six or seven trips to get the expedition of time. If there had been a conspiracy to make money, and it had been understood by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, he could have just as well given us routes with seven trips a week, and put the service up to seven, eight, nine, or ten miles an hour, and he could have done that in the thickly-populated parts of the country, if it had been the result of a conspiracy. Let me read more from what Mr. Boone says on page 1565:

The department never advertised for four or five trips a week. After three times a week it is always six or seven, or more than that. The proposals that I destroyed were upon routes of at least six times per week.

How did he come to destroy them? Another suspicious circumstance against Dorsey! Boone said when he went into the business he just took the bidding-book and commenced at A, and was going right straight through to X, Y, and Z, and make a bid, I believe, on every route that was in the book. I think that is his testimony. Boone says:

I was going on without instructions. I was going on without authority from anybody, working on the bids.

He thinks it was the same day that Miner got here, or the day afterwards, and he—I suppose meaning Dorsey—came up to the room and saw what the witness was doing. He was making up bids for every route in the advertisement, going right along with big and little, when Dorsey said there was a mistake. No proposals were to be made for over three times a week or for routes under fifty miles. When Miner came into the room witness asked what was the reason of that. I say upon this point that Stephen W. Dorsey never said a word about it, and that Boone is mistaken. But he says he asked Miner the reason. What did Miner say? Did he say to him, "It is because we have got a conspiracy? We have got it fixed with the Second Assistant Postmaster-General?" No. He said this, he said for fear of failure in getting bonds; that they could not get the bonds for all the service and could not get certified checks for all the service. Boone was going clear through the book from preface to the finis. They could not get bonds for all the service and could not get certified checks for all the service. You remember that for all the service over $5,000 they had to put up five per cent., I think, in certified checks. Now, there was an immense volume, of I suppose 10,000 routes. I believe that is about the number, is it not?

Mr. CARPENTER. No. That was the advertisement for that section of country.

Mr. INGERSOLL. About how many were there?

Mr. CARPENTER. About three or four thousand.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Very well; three or four thousand routes and he was going to put in a bid on every one of them. That is what Boone was going to do. He did not understand the conspiracy at that time. Miner explained to him, "We cannot get the certified checks. We cannot get the bondsmen." He did not tell him, "Good Lord, my friend, you don't understand the terms of the conspiracy. We are taking no such service as that. We are taking none over three times a week, because, don't you see, we want the chance for increase. We want the lowest. If we can find any service where the horses agree to stand still, that is the service to take. You must look over the terms of the conspiracy and have some sense about it."

Boone says he was starting in, taking the advertisements, going right through the territory, all over that country, and bidding on every route, not missing one. He never saw Stephen W. Dorsey do any work on the bids. The proposals sent down to the postmasters in Arkansas, including those to Clendenning, he (Boone) fixed himself and sealed them. Gentlemen, there is no evidence that Mr. Dorsey, as I understand it, ever saw one of those papers, but simply the form that was written out by Boone that was sent to Clendenning with instructions what to do with the proposals. That I understand to be the evidence. They proved by Boone that Dorsey never saw them; never wrote them; never ordered them to be written; never ordered a blank to be left unfilled. And yet, gentlemen, he was the man whom they say had brooded over this conspiracy; the man that gave to it life and form. He is the man that used Boone and John W. Dorsey and Peck and Miner as instrumentalities and tools.

What more? Did Boone take those bonds up to Dorsey and show them to him? He says that he did not open them; that he did not show them to Dorsey. That is what Mr. Boone swears. Surely Mr. Boone is an honorable man, stamped with the seal of the Department of Justice. He did not even show them to Dorsey. Dorsey never saw anything except the form after Boone had made it out. I showed you that form on yesterday, I think, marked 16 X. That is the only thing that Dorsey saw. He did not know what blanks were left in the bonds, or whether any were left. He never gave any orders about them, and never saw them. Yet the prosecution want you to hold him responsible as a conspirator for those bonds.

What more, gentlemen? Those bonds were never used. Nobody was ever defrauded. Not a proposal was put in the Post-Office Department. They never came to life. Dead! No contract, says Mr. Boone, was ever awarded on those proposals, even the proposals sent back, unless it was a contract to him, Boone. That is what he swears. And yet Dorsey is to be held responsible.

Let us hurry along, gentlemen. See how Dorsey came to do this. How did that arch-conspirator, as they claim him to be, happen to write that letter to Clendenning? On page 1567 Boone says that he suggested to Dorsey that he had better send a note with the proposals to Clendenning. Boone suggested it. He was not a conspirator, but he suggested it. Dorsey was the conspirator, but never dreamed of it. How fortunate for a conspirator to have an innocent man think of the means of carrying out a conspiracy; never thinking of crime, but having it all suggested by perfect innocence and then crime taking advantage of it. That is the position! He suggested that Dorsey had better send a note with the proposals to Clendenning. I will read from page 1568:

Q. Was there not danger that he would be declared a failing contractor?—A. Well, there was no danger of him being declared a failing contractor, but I can tell you what the result would have been.

Q. Well, tell it.—A. If there had been a failure in our name it would have suspended his pay in the department, and of course business cannot be conducted without money. The result is his service would have had to fail, and as he was on other contractor's bonds it would have pulled down other contractors; in fact pulled down all the contracts I was interested in at that time, some nine hundred.

Q. Outside?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was it at that time the practice of the department if a man, for instance, had fifty contracts and failed on one to declare him a failing contractor on all?—A. No, sir; but they would declare him a failing contractor on that one route and suspend his pay until he paid up the loss to the Government—just my case now, exactly.

Q. That was one of the reasons that you had. Now, you were informed at that time that they had not the money to carry this on. When, as a matter of fact did you go out of the concern?—A. The 8th day of August, 1878.

Q. Was S. W. Dorsey then in Washington?—A. No, sir; he was not.

Q. As a matter of fact, had he not been gone for several weeks?—A. No, sir, he had not been gone several weeks; he had been gone ten or twelve days.

Q. So that you had your last conversation in regard to going out with Mr. Miner?—A. Yes, sir. There is a paper here that will show the date I went out.

Now, then, we come to August 7, 1878, the time that Mr. Boone went out. Mr. Boone swears that he went out. He put it in writing. He did it for the purpose of saving a failure on the routes in the names of Miner, Peck, Dorsey, and himself. That is what he went out for, and that is his only reason. On page 1570 Mr. Boone swears that so far as he knows neither John W. Dorsey, John R. Miner, John M. Peck, nor Stephen W. Dorsey had any arrangement with the Second Assistant Postmaster-General to increase the service; none whatever:

S. W. Dorsey told me on his arrival when he got back that he was not aware that I was out of the concern until I told him so.

Boone went out on the 7th day of August, 1878. S. W. Dorsey was in New Mexico. He did not return here until about the time Congress assembled in December. Boone swears that he then learned from S. W. Dorsey that he, Dorsey, did not know that Boone was out of the concern; did not know that he had left on the 7th day of August, 1878. Now, gentlemen, if Stephen W. Dorsey was the main conspirator, if he was doing this entire business, is it possible that A. E. Boone went out on the 7th day of August, that John W. Dorsey assigned his interest in all the routes mentioned in the agreement, and John R. Miner took in Vaile, and the service was put on those routes by the money furnished by Vaile, that all that was done and yet Stephen W. Dorsey never heard of it and did not even know that Boone was out, did not even know that Vaile was in? Besides that, gentlemen, as I told you, Dorsey was not here. He was in New Mexico. He was in utter ignorance of this entire business, and yet they claim that he was the directing spirit.

At this point (1 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) the court took its usual recess.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. INGERSOLL. [Resuming.] If the court please and gentlemen, Mr. Boone further testifies, on page 1571, that Brady showed him a telegram from the postmistress at The Dalles, saying that the service was down. When I read that I thought may be that was where Moore got his hint to swear that he telegraphed to find out what was done with that service. Boone further swears that Brady said that it must be put on; that he said it could not be put on at the contract price, and that Brady told him, "I advise you to telegraph and put it on at any price," and that unless all the service was on by the 15th day of August he would declare the contractor a failing contractor on every route the service was down upon. That is what Brady told him. Stephen W. Dorsey was not here. According to the testimony of Moore he knew when he went away that the service in Oregon was not put on, but he abandoned it, and paid no attention to it. He happened to meet Miner at Saint Louis, and told him, I believe, "There are my notes for $8,500. That is all I will do. I am through! I have already advanced thirteen or fourteen thousand dollars. I will not advance another dollar." Why did not Miner tell him, "If you are not going on with this conspiracy I am going home?" Why didn't Miner tell him then, "What did you get up a conspiracy like this for, just to abandon it?" Why did not Miner say to him, "This is your child. I became a criminal at your suggestion. I entered into this conspiracy because you urged me to, and now after we have got the routes, you are going to abandon it?" Why did he not say to him, "Dorsey, if you are not going on with this conspiracy I am going back to Sandusky?" Did Dorsey at Saint Louis treat it as his bantling? or did he say to Miner, "This is all I will do?" Did he mean for himself? No. "All I will do for you." Certainly he would not have made the threat to Miner that he would not do anything more for himself. He then said to Miner, "I am through!" Miner knew at that time that Stephen W. Dorsey had not the interest of one solitary dollar except the money he had advanced. Stephen W. Dorsey, according to the testimony of this prosecution, knew when he left this city that the routes were not in operation in Eastern Oregon. He went away knowing that J. W. Dorsey and John R. Miner and John M. Peck were in danger of being declared failing contractors. Yet he never even called on Brady to see about it. He never asked to have the time extended a minute. He never took the least interest in the business. He started for New Mexico, and went by way of Oberlin, Ohio. He happened to meet Miner in Saint Louis, and for Miner's sake, for Peck's sake, for John W. Dorsey's sake, and not for his own sake, he gave them some notes to the extent of $8,500 that they could have discounted, and said to Miner then and there, "That is the last dollar. That is the last cent." What more did he do? He abandoned the whole business. He went to New Mexico. He never wrote about it; he never spoke about it; he never received a dispatch concerning it until the following December, when he came back to Washington, and then for the first time found that Boone had gone out and that Vaile had come in. What more? Although he was interested to the extent of thirteen or fourteen thousand dollars, he did not know until he came back in December that his security had been rendered worthless. He found that out then for the first time. That is a fine model of a conspirator. Reading again from Boone's testimony, on page 1371 :

Fully a month and a half of the time had been taken up by the Congressional investigation, and we—did not know what to do with the service. We dared not to move. We expected that the contracts would be taken from us.

That is to say, Miner, Peck, Boone, and the rest—

Do you tell me that under such circumstances, if Stephen W. Dorsey had conceived this thing, he would have gone off and left it? Do you tell me, with the entire business trembling in the balance, without the money to put the service on, at the mercy of Thomas J. Brady, that if Stephen W. Dorsey had gotten up that conspiracy, and also put in thirteen or fourteen thousand dollars, he would have gone away and left it, and told Miner and the others, "I will have no more to do with it," and leave it so effectually and so perfectly that he did not even know that Boone had gone out and Vaile had come in until the following December, when he came here to take his seat in the Senate?

On page 1580, again quoting from Mr. Boone :

The fact—

Here is something that rises like the Rock of Gibraltar. It is one of those indications of truth that rascality never had ingenuity enough to invent :

The fact that Dorsey refused to advance any more money on account of this business was taken into consideration by me when I made up my mind to go out.

Do you want any better testimony than that that Dorsey did refuse to advance any more money? This witness, called by the Government, says :

The fact that Dorsey did refuse to advance it is the very reason that I went out of the business myself.

Don't you see how everything fits together when you get at the facts? How naturally they all blend and harmonize when you get at the facts. Now, here is some more from Mr. Boone:

If I had not gone out the service would have undoubtedly failed, unless they got the money to put it on. When Mr. Dorsey declined to furnish any more money or to indorse any more notes, there was nothing else to do but for me to go out and let somebody else come in who had the money.

That is a witness for the Government, and yet at the time that happened they say there was a great conspiracy; that the Second Assistant Postmaster-General was in it; that a Senator of the United States was in it; and that these other men were simply tools. It will not do, gentlemen. If that had been the case Stephen W. Dorsey would have remained here. He would have gone to Mr. Brady and said, "I must have time," and Mr. Brady would have given him all the time he desired, because, according to this prosecution, it was their partnership business. Brady had ten times as great an interest as Stephen W. Dorsey. According to the testimony of Mr. Rerdell Brady had an interest of $33\frac{1}{3}$ per cent., and according to the testimony of Rerdell and Boone Dorsey only had an interest of seven-eighths of 1 per cent.

The FOREMAN (Mr. Crane). Does that mean net profits or gross receipts?

Mr. INGERSOLL. That means, as I understand it, according to their testimony, $33\frac{1}{3}$ per cent. of the gross expedition; not profits, but of the gross expedition. That is what they swear. When he gave on a route an expedition of, say, \$6,000, \$2,000 would go to Brady each year. In other words, $33\frac{1}{3}$ per cent. of the money paid for expedition went to Brady.

The COURT. The subcontractors had to be paid first.

Mr. INGERSOLL. No, sir; it does not say so. Oh, no.

Mr. WILSON. No, sir.

Mr. INGERSOLL. No, sir.

Mr. CARPENTER. Walsh's testimony is just the reverse.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Mr. Walsh testified and gave the exact figures, and called the amount, if the court will recollect, $60,000, and 20 per cent. he said of that is $12,000. That had to run, he says, for three years, and that made $36,000. That is the testimony in this case, gentlemen. If you should have a row of men as long as the row of kings that Banquo saw, stretching out "to the crack of doom," and they should swear to it, I should still die an unbeliever; but that is their testimony. Dorsey ran away and left his conspiracy and Brady would not attend to his own business. Now, I read again from Boone:

With regard to the preparation of circulars, the sending of them to postmasters, the printing of proposals, the printing of bonds and subcontracts, there was nothing done differently from what I had always done before.

Recollect that. He is a Government witness. Dorsey in a conspiracy got Boone to help him, and in helping him Boone did nothing different from what he had always done before. There is not much left of this case, gentlemen, but I will keep going on just the same. Mr. Boone swears that he followed the regular custom and practice of doing business.

Then, there is another suspicious circumstance. At the bottom of the contracts published by the Government, for the purpose of informing contractors as to how the bonds or contracts are to be signed, and exactly what is to be done by each person, there are a lot of instructions.

Mr. CARPENTER. On the proposals.

Mr. INGERSOLL. On the proposals. When they got up the proposals of their own, they, understanding the business, left off all those directions that the Government put upon its forms. Why? Those directions were put there for the benefit of men who did not understand the business. These men did understand the business, and consequently it was nonsense for them if they had to have the printing done, to put on the bottom of the contracts two or three paragraphs of directions to themselves. They understood exactly how to do it without the directions. When the original form was made, of course, the people who were to make the contracts were ignorant as to what the department required. There were instructions that the sureties must sign their full names and other instructions. Now, when they got up the forms themselves, they did not need to put on those directions, because they knew what to do without having directions printed, and they therefore saved the expense of printing. That is all there is to that. Boone says:

At the bottom of the proposals sent out by the Government there was a lot of instructions to bidders.

Who left them off? Stephen W. Dorsey? No. John W. Dorsey? No. He had nothing to do with it. Miner? No. He had nothing to do with it. Who left them off? Boone says he did. Was he instructed to do it? No. Did it take a conspiracy to leave them off? No. He left them off for two reasons, and good ones, too. One was to save the expense of printing. That was a good reason. There was no conspiracy needed for that. The other was that, knowing how to perfect the proposals and understanding all those instructions, there was no need of having them printed for their benefit. Those instructions were only intended for persons who knew nothing about the business. They understood the business, and consequently did not need them.

Next, on page 1582. What instructions as a matter of fact did Mr. Boone receive from Mr. Dorsey, if he received any? The question arises, upon what subject? In reference to what particular point? Boone says on this page that he received no instructions from Dorsey in reference to the business except in regard to the subcontract blanks. That is the one subject on which he received any instructions from S. W. Dorsey. I have shown you that those instructions were in the interests of honesty and fair dealing. Those were the only instructions he received. On every other subject there is not a word. Why? Here Boone gives the reason. "I did not require any." Why? Because he understood the business himself. What else? "I was to go ahead and do whatever was necessary to be done." He did it without consulting anybody. He did it in his own way. He did it as he thought best for all concerned. Now, gentlemen, there will be an effort made to convince you that Stephen W. Dorsey did everything during all that period. If you are told that, when you are told it remember what I tell you now: that Mr. Boone swears that he did it himself; that he attended to the entire business, and that he was instructed by Dorsey in no particular except as to that one blank, and that I have clearly demonstrated was in the interests of honesty and in the interests of the subcontractor, so that the subcontract might agree with or be similar to the contract made with the Government. That is all.

Now we come to another point. You must recollect that Mr. Boone got out the circulars. Mr. Boone sent to all the postmasters to know about the roads and the price of grain and the price of labor, about the snow in winter and the rain in the spring. He got all that up. He went through the bidding-book originally and made the bids. He it was who prepared most of these proposals. He did all the work until Miner came. S. W. Dorsey did not do any of it. Boone never saw him working upon or touching the proposals. What S. W. Dorsey did he did at Boone's request. What he did he did at Miner's request. What he did he did simply because he was a friend. Boone attended to it all. Now, what does Boone say on page 1584? He swears that so far as he knew there never was any conspiracy on the part of these defendants with him, with each other, or anybody else, in reference to these routes, or any route bid for and awarded to them during that time. There was no conspiracy to defraud the Government in any way. That is what the Government witness swears to—a man brought here to stain the reputation of Stephen W. Dorsey. That is what a Government witness swears; swearing, too, under pressure; swearing, too, under circumstances where the Post-Office Department could strip him of everything he had on earth; swearing under circumstances where if he did not please the Government they could pursue him as they have pursued us. And yet under those circumstances, caught in the net of power, that man stands here and swears that during all that time he attended to the business, and there never was any conspiracy, there never was any agreement to defraud the Government in any manner whatever. Perhaps I had better read what he says. I read from page 1583 of my examination :

Q. At the time the contracts were finally let and the bonds given and everything of that kind done you were pretty well acquainted with John W. Dorsey and Mr. Miner? The WITNESS. When what bonds were given?

Mr. INGERSOLL. At the time the service was accepted and part of it put on, bonds had been given and the contracts awarded. At that time you were very well acquainted with John W. Dorsey and John R. Miner?—A. Certainly; I was with them every day.

Q. Now, had you knowledge of any conspiracy to defraud the Government by getting up false petitions for the increase of service?—A. No petitions were gotten up when I was in the concern.

Q. But did you ever hear of such a conspiracy. Were you ever in such a conspiracy?—A. No, sir; I was not.

Q. Was there any conspiracy, so far as you know, to decrease the time or expedite it, as it is called, by virtue of any false petitions or any false letters?—A. Up to the time that I went out of the concern I never knew that there were any petitions one way or the other gotten up or to be gotten up.

Q. Or to give any false or fictitious names, or anything of that kind?—A. No, sir.

Q. Or was there, so far as you know, any arrangement, or did you have any talk with Miner, Peck, or John W. Dorsey, or any of these defendants about any arrangement or understanding with any official of the Post-Office Department not to have fines assessed when there was a failure to perform the service?

Then there was some little discussion, and then I asked him again :

Now, then, so far as you know, Mr. Boone, was there any conspiracy on the part of any of these defendants with you, or with anybody else, to your knowledge, in respect of these routes mentioned in the indictment or of any routes bid for and awarded to them during that time—any conspiracy to defraud the Government in any way?

And he answered :

No, sir.

That was a Government witness, acquainted with all the transactions during that time. He was swearing under the shadow of power, with the sword hanging over his head, and yet he swears he never knew or heard of any such thing.

Let us go on. On page 1589 he swears that Mr. Dorsey told him to fix the blanks and make them up and to write what he wanted done in Arkansas, and that while he, Boone, was engaged in so doing he said to Dorsey, "Had you not better write a note so that I can attach it to the blanks?" And Dorsey did so. Dorsey told him to fill up what he wanted in Arkansas, and what was necessary to be executed there, and he did so. Boone indicated exactly what he wanted put in. I showed you the Clendenning bonds yesterday and showed you just what Boone did. He filled up the blanks that he wanted to have filled down there. Of course, the blanks that were already filled in he did not want interfered with. That is what he says. There is another part of his testimony. I want to call the attention of the gentlemen to it. "I hand you," said they, "32 X." Mr. Bliss did the handing. What was that? That was the Chico letter. What did they want to introduce that for? To show that S. W. Dorsey was interested personally in these routes in 1878. That was a magnificent piece of testimony for them to show that Dorsey in 1878 was writing to Rerdell to watch the advertisement of these routes. So they introduced that letter.

The COURT. Will you allow me to see that letter and the envelope with it at this point? I did not see it very carefully before. [Letter and envelope submitted to court.]

Mr. INGERSOLL. Mr. Boone looked at it. He was a Government witness. The noose was around his neck and the other end of the rope was in the hands of Mr. Bliss. What did Mr. Boone say? "Mr. Dorsey never wrote that letter." Then said Mr. Bliss to him, "That is not Mr. Dorsey's writing?" And Mr. Boone said "No, sir." And at the same time threw the forged scrap away contemptuously. What else? On April 3, 1878, Mr. Dorsey was here. Then the court asked him a question:

Q. Do you know in whose handwriting that Chico Springs letter is?—A. I hate to say. It is not Stephen W. Dorsey's though.

Mr. MERRICK. Was Mr. Dorsey here at that time?

The WITNESS. He was here, sir; and I was in communication with him on that very day.

That is the evidence of a Government witness; a man who was depended upon to show that not only my client, but that Mr. Miner entered into a conspiracy in the fall of 1877 to defraud this Government. I want you to remember one thing which I was about to forget. Mr. Ker I believe spoke six or seven days and I do not remember of his having mentioned the Chico letter. He acted as if it had a contagious disease. He was followed by Mr. Bliss in another week, but he did not mention the Chico letter; at least I have never happened to read it in his speech. Both of them are as dumb as oysters after a clap of thunder. Not a word. They did not, either of them, have the courage to refer to it. They did not have the nerve to ask you to believe it. I tell you one thing, gentlemen, I would either admit that it was a forgery, or I would swear that it was genuine. I would do something with it. I would not allow that paper, blown by the wind, to scare me from the highway of the argument! I would do one thing or the other. I would either admit that Mr. Rerdell forged it, or I would insist that it was the handwriting of Stephen W. Dorsey. Why was it left where it was, gentlemen? They could not get anybody to swear that it was Dorsey's handwriting. That is all.

Now we will take the next step. They had so much confidence in that witness that they concluded they would prove the pencil memorandum by him. They had such a clutch on him. So they stuck that up to him. Recollecting the position he was in, recollecting the danger, recollecting all that might probably follow speaking the truth, here is what he says:

Everything above "profit and loss" in that memorandum favors the handwriting of S. W. Dorsey.

What else?

And everything below favors the handwriting of M. C. Rerdell.

Fit conclusion for a Government witness, brought here to show that Stephen W. Dorsey was the arch-conspirator. And they ended the witness; dismissed him from the stand, after he had shown that Dorsey did not conspire; after he had shown that he himself fixed the sub-contracts, with the exception of only one; after he had shown that he himself filled out the blanks to send to Clendenning; after he had shown that he did everything without being advised by S. W. Dorsey, and then he swore that their principal witness was a forger. Then they dismissed him. That was the end of the Government witness who was to brand the word "conspirator" upon the forehead of Stephen W. Dorsey's reputation. But instead of putting "conspirator" there, he put the word "forger" upon the principal witness for the Government. Magnificent exchange! Now, gentlemen, you know as well as I do that Mr. Boone knew all that was happening during that entire time. You know as well as I do that he did not swear anything for the defense that he could help swearing.

What else? Mr. Bliss, on page 303, says that:

Parties conspiring make an informal verbal agreement.

When did we make that agreement? When does the testimony show that we made an informal verbal agreement? Who were present at the time? Where were we? Do you recollect the number of the house? Do you recollect the day of the month? Has any one of you ever had in his mind which side of the street that was on? What town was it in? Could you locate it if you had a good map?

Parties conspiring make an informal verbal agreement.

I do not care whether it is informal or formal. Did we make one? In order to make a verbal agreement you have to use some words. Is there any evidence as to the words we used? Not a word that I have heard, not a word.

What else? He says that this is necessarily secret and intended to be secret. The first thing done was that Dorsey told it to Moore. Then, for fear it would get out, J. W. Dorsey told it to Pennell and to thirty fellows around the camp-fire out in Dakota. And then there was a suspicion in Brady's mind that somebody might hear of it, and so he told Rerdell. He says, "Get the books copied; this is a secret thing." Then Dorsey wrote it to Bosler, and he was so awfully afraid that it would get out that he kept a copy of the letter. You see, Mr. Bliss says the object was to keep it secret. Then Miner and Vaile told it to Rerdell for fear he would not believe it when Brady told him. They were bound the thing should not get out. Yes, sir. And then Rerdell, just bursting with the importance of keeping that secret, told it to Perkins and Taylor; went away out there for that purpose. And then Moore, he gave it away to Major and McBean for the purpose of keeping it secret. Then Miner told Moore. From whom did they keep it secret? Nobody in God's world but Boone. He is the only fellow that nobody told. Boone went through it all, saw all the plan and heard all the whispering, and he is the only man in the country, I think, that did not suspect it. And on the 7th day of August he left the concern because there was not a conspiracy, and admits to you that if he had had even a suspicion of it he would have staid—staid or died.

Now, was there ever a conspiracy published so widely, that one end of the country kept so secret from the other? Was there ever a conspiracy like that, the news of which ran through the West like wild-fire, while the fellows at the East never heard of it? Everybody knew it out on the plains. All you had to do was to subpoena a fellow that wanted to come to Washington, and he would remember it. And yet that is the evidence that the prosecution desires you to believe. I do not believe it. I do not think I ever shall. But then they promised so much at the beginning, and they have done so little in many respects.

Something had to be said, and so Mr. Bliss, on page 265, in a little burst of confidence to the jury, says :

At least one United States Senator was the paid agent of these defendants.

Who was the Senator?

Mr. BLISS. Did I say that, sir?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Look at page 265 and see whether you did.

Mr. BLISS. Read all that I said there.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will do that.

But we shall show to you that at least one United States Senator, urging such increase, was the paid agent of these defendants. [Page 265.]

Mr. BLISS. I then went on and said we should show it if you put him on the stand.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes, if we furnished you the evidence.

Mr. BLISS. No, sir; that is not what I said.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Why didn't you produce the Senator?

Mr. BLISS. Why didn't you put him on the stand?

Mr. INGERSOLL. How did I know what Senator you meant?

Mr. BLISS. Did you have two?

Mr. INGERSOLL. No, sir; and we did not have the one. If you could have proved it, it was your duty, as the attorney of the United States, to do it, and if you did not do it, you did not do your duty in this case.

Mr. BLISS. Whose name is expressed in the memorandum?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Why did you not say that to the jury? You dared not do it. That is like what was said here the other day before this jury, and taken out of the record. We will come to it. These are the gentlemen who did not wish to stain the names of citizens. These are the gentlemen who did not wish to bring anybody into this case that had not been indicted. And yet Mr. Bliss, in his opening, says that he would show you at least one Senator who was the paid agent of these defendants; and now, having failed to do it, he stands here before you and asks whose name was on the pencil memorandum, meaning that J. H. Mitchell was the paid agent of these defendants.

Ah, gentlemen, I would not, for the sake of convicting any man on this earth, stain the reputation of another in a place and in a way where that other could not defend himself. I would not do it. I do not think there is any wrong beyond that. It is as bad to stab the reputation as it is to stab the flesh; it is as bad to kill the honor of the man as to put a dagger into his heart.

There are so many things in these papers that I would never get through, if I commented upon them all, if I talked forty years. I now refer to page 4509. I have to swap off from one of these lawyers to the other. Now, on this subject of subcontracts, showing how we are endeavoring to cheat and defraud the Government, Mr. Ker says, at page 4509 :

Acting upon Stephen W. Dorsey's advice he put in this clause giving the subcontractors 65 per cent. of the increase. I want you to remember the 65 per cent., because I will show you some subcontracts with that amount in, but I do not want you to think for one moment that the subcontractors ever got a dollar out of it.

Gentlemen, the evidence is that the subcontractors were paid the amount mentioned in their subcontracts. I believe all of them are on file in this case, and on all that were filed in the department the money was paid directly to the subcontractor. And yet Mr. Ker tells you that he does not want you to think for a moment that the subcontractors ever got one dollar out of it. Is it possible, gentlemen, that there is any necessity for resorting to such statements? Can you conceive of any reason for doing it, except that they are actually mistaken, except for the fact that they know they have not the evidence to convict these defendants?

We are not begging of you. We are not upon our knees before you. But we do want to be tried according to the evidence and according to the law. We do not want your mind, nor yours, nor yours [addressing different jurors] poisoned with a misstatement. We want to be tried, and we want the verdict rendered by you when every fact is as luminous in your mind as the sun at mid-day. We want every fact to stand out like stars in a perfect night, without a cloud of doubt between you and the fact. That is the kind of a verdict we want. We want a verdict that comes from a clear head and a brave heart. We do not want a verdict simply from sympathy. We want a verdict according to the evidence and according to the law. And when the verdict is given we want every one of you to say, "That is my verdict; I found it upon the evidence and upon the law; dig beneath it and you will not find used as the corner-stone a misstatement, or a mistake, or a falsehood; it stands upon the rock of fact, upon the foundation of absolute truth."

Do you know that if I were prosecuting a man, trying to take from him his liberty, trying to take from him his home, trying to rob his fire-side and make it desolate, and if I should succeed and afterwards know that I had made a misstatement of the evidence to the jury, I could not sleep until I had done what was in my power to release that man; and after he was released, or even if he were not released, I would go to him when he was wearing the prison garb, and I would get down on my knees and beg him to forgive me. I would rather be sent to the penitentiary myself, I would rather wear the stripes of eternal degradation, than to send another man there by a misstatement or a mistake that I had made. That is my feeling. I may be wrong.

It may be that I am guilty, according to Colonel Bliss, of sneering at everything that people hold sacred. But I do not sneer at justice. I believe that over all justice sits the eternal queen, holding in her hand the scales in which are weighed the deeds of men. I believe that it is my duty to make the world a little better, because I have lived in it. I believe in helping my fellow-men. I do not sneer at charity; I do not sneer at justice, and I do not sneer at liberty. And why did he make that remark to you, gentlemen? Is it possible that for a moment he dreamed that he might prejudice your minds against the case of my client, because I, his attorney, am not what is called a believer? Is it possible that he has so mean an opinion of a Christian that a Christian would violate his oath when upon the jury, simply to get even with a lawyer who happened to be an infidel? Is that his idea of Christianity? It is not mine; it is not mine. I stand before you to-day, gentlemen, as a man having the rights you have, and no more; and I am willing to work and toil and suffer to give you every right that I enjoy. And I know that not one of you will allow himself to be prejudiced against my client because you and I happen to disagree upon subjects about which none of us know anything for certain. I do not believe you will. And yet, that remark was made, gentlemen—I will not say that it was made, but may be it was—hoping that it would lodge the seed of prejudice in your minds, hoping that it might bring to life that little adder of hatred that sleeps unknown to us in nearly all of our bosoms. I have too much confidence in you, too much confidence in human nature to believe that can affect my client.

Now, gentlemen, there is no pretense, there is no evidence that every subcontractor did not get the per cent. mentioned in his subcontract, except one, and that was Mr. French, on the route from Kearney to Kent; and the evidence there is that Miner settled with him, I believe, and gave him a certain amount of money in lieu of expedition. That is the solitary exception.

Now, gentlemen, I come to a most interesting part of this discussion, and I hope we will live through it. In the first place, what is a conspiracy? Well, in this case, they must establish that it was an agreement entered into between the persons mentioned in this indictment, or two of them, to defraud the Government. How? By the means pointed out and described in the indictment. While it may not be absolutely necessary to describe the means, I hold that if they do describe them, tell how the conspiracy was to be accomplished, they are bound by their description; they must prove such a conspiracy as they describe. If a man is indicted for stealing a horse and the color of the horse is given, it will not do to prove a horse of another color. If they describe the offense they are bound by the description.

Now, this is a conspiracy entered into, as they claim, by the persons mentioned in the indictment, to do a certain thing. What is the object of the conspiracy? To defraud the Government. And, gentlemen, I believe the court will instruct you that the conspiring is the crime. The object of the conspiracy is to defraud the United States. What are the means? According to this indictment, false petitions, false oaths, false letters, false orders. What I insist is that the means cannot take the place of the object; that the means cannot take the place of the conspiracy described. When you describe a conspiracy by certain means to defraud the Government, and set out the means so that the Second Assistant Postmaster-General is a necessity, then you cannot turn and shift your ground, and say that it was not the conspiracy set out in the indictment, but that it was a conspiracy to do some of the things recited as means in the indictment; you cannot say that it was not a conspiracy entered into with the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, but was a conspiracy entered into with some others to make a false petition or a false affidavit. The ostrich of this prosecution will not be allowed to hide its head under the leaf of an affidavit. They must prove, in my judgment, the conspiracy that they describe in the indictment, and none other.

Now, what else? You must be prepared, gentlemen, when you make up a verdict, if you say that there was a conspiracy, to say when it was entered into and who entered into it. And I suppose when you retire, the first question for you to decide will be: Was there a conspiracy? Has any conspiracy been established beyond a reasonable doubt? If you say yes, then the next question for you to decide is, who conspired? Who were the members of that conspiracy?

After you do that there is one other thing you have to do: You have to find that one of the conspirators, for the purpose of carrying the conspiracy into effect, did something; that is called an overt act. You have to find that at least one of them did something to effect the object of that conspiracy. You must remember, gentlemen, that the overt act must come after the conspiracy. In other words, you cannot commit an overt act and make a conspiracy to fit it; you must have the conspiracy first, and then do an overt act for the purpose of accomplishing the object of that conspiracy. The conspiracy must come first, and the overt act afterwards. You all understand that now.

Now, this indictment is so framed that the earliest time within the life of the statute limitations for an overt act is the 23d day of May, 1879. Why? The indictment charges that as the day the conspiracy was entered into. Any overt act in consequence of that conspiracy must have been done after the 23d of May, 1879. Now, get that in your heads, level and square. The conspiracy, according to this, is not back of the 23d of May, 1879, and any overt act done, in order to be considered an overt act, must be done after the date of that conspiracy. If they prove any act done before that time, it shows that it was not an overt act belonging to the conspiracy mentioned in the indictment. If it is an overt act at all, it is an overt act of another conspiracy entered into before the date mentioned in this indictment, and consequently will not do for an overt act in this case. Now, I want you all to understand that.

I forget how many overt acts are charged in this indictment; some sixty or seventy, I think. And understand me, now, gentlemen, no matter what date they fix to an overt act in the indictment, no matter whether there is any date to it or not in the indictment, if it turns out to have been done before the time fixed for the conspiracy it is dead as an overt act; it is good for nothing. The overt act is the fruit of the conspiracy; the conspiracy is not the result of the overt act. Now let me make a statement to you, so that you will understand it.

Every petition, every letter, every affidavit, upon which orders for expedition were based, was filed before the 23d of May, 1879, except on two routes—Toquerville to Adairville and Eugene City to Bridge Creek. If that is true, then not a solitary petition filed in this case can be considered as an overt act; and a conspiracy without an overt act is nothing; it simply exists in the imagination; it is an agreement made of words and air, and never was vitalized with an act done by one of the conspirators for the purpose of giving it effect. Recollect that every petition, every affidavit, every letter filed, was filed before the 23d day of May, with the two exceptions I have mentioned. That is the date when the conspiracy came into being. And consequently an overt act must be after that time.

Now, when they came to write this indictment, why did they not tell the truth in it? I do not mean that in an offensive sense, because a man has the right to write in that indictment what he wants to. That is a matter of pleading. But why did they not tell the facts? Why did they put in the indictment that a certain petition was filed on the 26th day of June, when they had the petition before them and knew that it was filed in April, 1879? Why did they put in that indictment that a certain affidavit was filed on the 26th or 27th of May, I think it was, when they knew that it was filed in April or March? Why? Because if they had put that in the indictment the indictment would have been quashed, so far as their overt acts were concerned. The court would have said, "I cannot allow you to put on paper that a man entered into a conspiracy on the 23d of May, and then did an act to carry that conspiracy into effect in April before that time. I cannot allow you to do that, because that is infinitely absurd, and pleadings have to be reasonable on their face." But you see they stated that this was done after the conspiracy. They had to do it or they would be gone. I believe there is no dispute about this law that if they describe the overt act—and they must describe it, because it is a part of the offense—that is, the offense is not complete without it—they must prove it exactly as they describe it. If they describe it with infinite minuteness, they must prove it with infinite minuteness. If they set out that an affidavit was written on bark, they must produce a bark affidavit. If they were foolish enough to say it was written in red ink they must produce it in red ink. If they allege that an oath was sworn to twice before two notaries public they must produce an oath sworn to twice. They are bound to prove exactly what they charge, and if they were too particular about it that is their fault, not ours.

I say that all these, with the exception of the two routes I have named, were filed too early to play any important part in this case. Now, I will come to those routes. Remember, that every overt act must be after the conspiracy. There are two exceptions, and those two exceptions include petitions and affidavits. And there is a splendid kind of justice in the way this thing is coming out, so far as that is concerned.

The petitions filed on the Toquerville route and on Bridge Creek route, I believe, are genuine; I believe the Government admits that they are honest; and they were not attacked except upon one point, and that was that a daily mail did not mean seven times a week. The point made by the Government was that a daily mail meant six trips a week—that is, where you have them every day. We took the ground that daily mail meant a mail every day, and that in the western country, as here, they have seven days in a week. We contended that you cannot have daily mail without having seven trips a week. I think that was the only point made against these petitions—that they were for a daily mail, and that somebody put in a figure 7.

No petition for increase of service alone was ever attacked by the Government in this case, except 25 L, on The Dalles route, and 20 H and 29 H, on the Canyon City route. 25 L was filed April 23, 1879. That was two months too early, before the conspiracy had life.

Mr. CARPENTER. One.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes; one month before the conspiracy had life. Consequently that is mustered out of this case as an overt act.

23 L was filed June 27, 1879, and is in time, provided it had been a dishonest petition. And it is the only petition filed on the date alleged in the indictment, and it was not attacked. It was signed by the business men of Baker City, and is set out, I believe, on page 1617.

20 H was filed May 7. That is not in time. That is gone.

29 H has no file mark, and never was proved. So that goes.

All the allegations as to false petitions for increase of service—and by that I mean additional trips—are shown to have been genuine, honest, true petitions.

There are but two affidavits, one correctly described. Both were made by Peck. Mr. Bliss admits that Peck had nothing to do with any of these routes after April 1, 1879, and both of them were made by Peck, and were sworn to before that date.

The affidavit on the Toquerville route was filed by M. C. Rerdell, who swears that he was not in any conspiracy to defraud the United States; that he was not in a conspiracy with Vaile and Miner and John W. Dorsey, nor with anybody else. It was filed by the subcontractor of record, M. C. Rerdell, and it is the same route on which Mr. Rerdell, by virtue of his subcontract, appropriated about $5,000 of money belonging to other people.

The other exception is on the Bridge Creek route, and, strange as it may appear, that was also filed by Mr. Rerdell. And, strange as it may appear, it has not been successfully impeached as to the men and horses necessary under the existing and proposed schedules. The overt act is not proved, because the oath is not proved to be false, and because Peck and Rerdell, according to Mr. Bliss's admission and according to Rerdell's oath, were not in the conspiracy, and the overt act has to be done by one of the conspirators, of course.

The COURT. I understood—I do not know whether I have been under a delusion all this time or not—that the indictment charged that these affidavits and false petitions were the means by which the conspiracy was to be carried into execution; that they were not the overt acts. If they had been set out as overt acts in the indictment, the court would have seen that they antedated the time, and if an objection had been made to them the court would not have received them as overt acts. The reason why they have been admitted and regarded as in the case all along, to my mind, was that they were acts tending to prove, so far as they tended to prove anything, the nature of the combination between these parties anterior to the 23d of May.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Before the conspiracy.

The COURT. Before the conspiracy. So that whatever character belonged to that association anterior to that time, if it was continued on after that time, carried out with overt acts done subsequently to that time, they were properly received as evidence going to establish the conspiracy—not as overt acts, but as means to show the character of the combination amongst the parties anterior to that date.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That saves me a great deal of argument. Now, I understand, gentlemen, that the court will instruct you that you cannot take any petition, any letter, any oath, any paper of any kind that was filed or written, or used prior to the 23d of May, 1879, as an overt act; that all that evidence is for is to show you the relations sustained by the parties before that time.

The COURT. Yes; you are right.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Now, that saves a great deal of trouble.

There are on the Toquerville and Adairville route, and on the Eugene City and Bridge Creek route, petitions filed after the 23d of May, 1879, set out in the indictment as overt acts. I shall insist, if the court will allow me, that if there is no evidence that those petitions were dishonest, no evidence going to show that they were not genuine, those petitions cannot be used as overt acts for the reason that they are charged in the indictment as false and fraudulent petitions. So, gentlemen, I take that ground, that as to the petitions filed after the 23d day of May on the only two routes left for these gentlemen to find overt acts upon (Eugene City to Bridge Creek, and Toquerville to Adairville), if those petitions have not been proved to be false they cannot be regarded as overt acts for the reason that they were described in the indictment itself as false and fraudulent petitions. It is perfectly clear, is it not?

What else have we left? A couple of affidavits. Who made them? Mr. Peck. When? Before the 1st day of April, 1879, and Mr. Bliss admits that from that time on he never had anything to do with this business. Mr. Rerdell filed them, and Mr. Rerdell swears that he was never in any conspiracy; and Mr. Bliss admits that Peck, after the 1st of April, had nothing to do with this business. That substantially knocks the bottom out of that dish.

Now they attacked the affidavit on the Bridge Creek route, but they did not succeed in showing that it was not an honest affidavit.

Now, gentlemen, after what the court has decided I want to call your attention to another thing. Do not forget what the court has decided—that all these things are not overt acts, but that they simply show the relations of the parties. Now, let us take them that way—that these affidavits and petitions, these letters and papers, are put in to show the relations of the parties.

The COURT. The nature of the combination.

Mr. MERRICK. Certainly.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is what I mean—the business relations; that is, what they were doing.

Mr. MERRICK. Certainly.

Mr. INGERSOLL. And how they were doing it. Now, if you go and find Vaile and Miner getting up petitions on their routes, and you also find Dorsey getting up petitions on his routes, then they claim that that is the result of an agreement between them. That is not the law. Neither is there in that the scintilla of common sense. If I find you plowing in your field and your neighbor plowing in his field, I have no right to draw the conclusion that you have conspired to plow or to help each other. But if I find your neighbor and you plowing in your field, and I afterwards find you and your neighbor plowing in his field, I have the right to conclude that you have swapped work and that you have something in common. If I find you plowing in your field and your neighbor walking behind you sowing grain or dropping corn, and then I find you in the fall shucking out the corn together, and I find your neighbor taking half of it to his barn and you taking half of it to your barn, I make up my mind that you have had some dealings on the corn question.

Now, we find that on May 5, 1879, these parties absolutely divided, and after that, when Vaile and Miner got up a petition on their route, Dorsey did not help them; and when Dorsey got up one on his, Vaile and Miner did not help him. That shows what the relations of the parties were. Does that show that they were then in a conspiracy? Does it show that they had any conspiracy before that time? They had separated their interest; they had ceased to act together; one did nothing for the other. If there had been a conspiracy before that time that conspiracy died on the 5th of May, 1879; and if it did, then there is no possibility of any conviction in this case, no matter what the evidence is—not the slightest.

Now, I want you to understand that ground exactly. I am not begging the question. I am not afraid to meet every point, every paper, every scratch, in this case. But I want you to understand it. All those things were allowed for the purpose of showing the relations of the parties, the relations that the defendants sustained to each other; and the evidence is that they sustained no relations to each other after 1879; that each went his own road to attend to his own business in his own way. That is the evidence.

Now comes the next point. What are the overt acts in the indictment? Really they are the orders made by Mr. Brady, unless you take this poor little affidavit made by Peck and filed by Rerdell.

Then comes the next point. You cannot treat anything as an overt act unless it was made by one of the conspirators. Is there any evidence in this case that Mr. Brady ever conspired with anybody? Not the slightest. And unless he conspired with us any order made by him cannot be regarded as an overt act in this case. I think everybody will admit that. Unless Brady conspired with us, and we with him, any order of his cannot be regarded as an overt act. I ask you, gentlemen, what evidence is there in this case that Mr. Brady ever conspired with any of these defendants? I will answer that question before I get through, and I think I will answer it to your entire satisfaction.

I will go a step further in this case, and I may go a little further than the court will go. I say that when they state in that indictment that an order is made for the benefit of Miner, Vaile, and Dorsey, and the evidence is that it was made for the benefit only of Vaile and Miner, that is a fatal variance, and it cannot be treated as an overt act for any conspiracy. And when the indictment charges that an order was made for the benefit of S. W. Dorsey, and Vaile, and Miner, and it turns out that it was made for the sole benefit of S. W. Dorsey, I claim that that is a fatal variance.

Gentlemen, I was going through all these overt acts and all these terrible false claims. But the decision of the court has utterly and entirely relieved me from that duty. So I will turn my attention to another person.

The next defendant to whom I may call your attention is Mr. John W. Dorsey. My opinion of Mr. Dorsey is that he is an honest man; that he is a plain, straightforward man. It is claimed that John W. Dorsey was one of the original conspirators; that he helped to hatch and plot this terrible design. Let us see what interest John W. Dorsey had. You have heard me read the agreement he made, have you not, with Miner? Now, let me read to you the agreement that he made on the 16th day of August, 1878, I believe. Now, we will find out what interest John W. Dorsey had in all this conspiracy. On the 16th of August, 1878, there was no reason for telling any lie about it. They could not get on the routes in August, 1878; they had not the money, and so they took in Vaile. At that time, gentlemen, there was no reason for them writing anything in this paper that was not true, not the slightest. And I take it for granted that most people tell the truth when there is no possible object in telling anything else, if their memory is good:

This agreement, dated the 16th of August, 1878, by and between H. M. Vaile, of Independence, Missouri; John R. Miner, of Sandusky, Ohio; John M. Peck, of Colfax County, New Mexico; and John W. Dorsey, of Middlebury, Vermont, witnesseth as follows:

1st. A copartnership is hereby formed by and between the above-mentioned parties, for the purpose of managing certain mail routes in the Western States and Territories. Said routes are all those which have been awarded to said Miner, Peck, and Dorsey for the contract term from July 1st, 1878, to June 30, 1882.

Now, I go on to the fourth paragraph for the purpose of finding out what interest one of my clients, John W. Dorsey, had at that time in this great conspiracy:

4th. The profits accruing from the business shall be divided as follows: From routes in Indian Territory, Kansas, Nebraska, and Dakota, to H. M. Vaile, one-third.

That is all out there in the Indian Territory, Kansas, Nebraska, and Dakota.

To John R. Miner, one-sixth; to John M. Peck, one-sixth, and to John W. Dorsey, one-third.

From routes in Montana, Wyoming, Colorado, New Mexico, Arizona, Utah, Idaho, Washington, Oregon, Nevada, and California, to H. M. Vaile, one-third; to John R. Miner, one-third; to John M. Peck, one-third. [Page 4014.]

And to John W. Dorsey nothing. That is dated on the 16th day of August, 1878. The entire interest of John W. Dorsey in the whole business was one-third of the profits on routes in the Indian Territory, Kansas, Nebraska, and Dakota. This is signed by H. M. Vaile, John R. Miner, John M. Peck, and John W. Dorsey, and I believe these are all admitted to be the genuine signatures of the parties. In the fourth paragraph of this agreement, as I told you, John W. Dorsey was to have one-third of the profits accruing from the routes in the Indian Territory, Kansas, Nebraska, and Dakota; while of the profits arising from the routes in Montana, Wyoming, Colorado, New Mexico, Arizona, Utah, Idaho, Washington Territory, Oregon, Nevada, and California he was to have nothing. The only routes mentioned in this indictment in which John W. Dorsey on the 16th day of August, 1878, had any interest whatever were: Kearney to Kent in Nebraska, Vermillion to Sioux Falls in Dakota, and Bismarck to Tongue River in Dakota. Remember that, gentlemen. That is very important. The evidence is that he sold out his interest in the following December, made a bargain for $10,000, and the evidence is that he received the money, and the evidence is that after that he never had any interest in the profits, no matter how much was made. And yet these gentlemen say that he was part and parcel of a conspiracy formed on the 23d of May, 1879. Long before that time he had sold out every dollar's interest he had, and had no more interest in it than though he had never existed. He got his $10,000; that was all. Now let us see what he did when the routes were divided.

Mr. MERRICK. When did you say he sold out and got the money?

Mr. INGERSOLL. The bargain was made in December, and his brother wrote to him at first that Vaile would not give it to him, and then that he would. Don't you recollect the two letters you asked Dorsey so much about?

Mr. MERRICK. I recollect these letters, but I do not recollect—

Mr. INGERSOLL. [Interposing.] What I say is, that Mr. Vaile had agreed to it, and then backed out of it.

Mr. DAVIDGE. That is so.

Mr. INGERSOLL. And it was finally consummated, if the court please, after Mr. Dorsey came out of the Senate.

The COURT. That is what I understood.

Mr. INGERSOLL. It had been agreed to once, and then after S. W. Dorsey came out of the Senate John W. Dorsey was paid $10,000, and Miner swears that the division was absolute, perfect, and complete; and that nothing was signed by one for the other after the 5th of May, 1879.

Mr. BLISS. Miner does not say when. He swore that he signed no papers after the 5th of May.

Mr. INGERSOLL. He says that he signed no papers for the other side, and that the other side signed none for Vaile and Miner.

Mr. BLISS. No. Mr. John W. Dorsey says that he signed papers afterwards. Mr. Miner says that he does not know what other people may have done, but he signed no papers after the 5th of May.

Mr. DAVIDGE. You are talking of two different things.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will show you after a while that you are wrong, as I always do. I never made a mistake on you yet.

The only routes mentioned in this indictment in which John W. Dorsey on the 16th day of August, 1878, had any interest whatever were from Kearney to Kent, in Nebraska; Vermillion to Sioux Falls, in Dakota; and Bismarck to Tongue River, in Dakota. And I will say right here that if at any time I do injustice to Mr. Bliss or anybody else, if it is pointed out I will take it back cheerfully, and if it is not pointed out, and they show that I did it, I will get up and admit it and say that I was mistaken.

Mr. BLISS. You will have a great deal to admit.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Very well, I will do it, for I have the courage of conviction, and I have the courage to say that I am mistaken when I am.

Now, the evidence is that John W. Dorsey sold out his interest for $10,000, and that he received the money, and that after that he had no interest in the profits when the three routes were divided, and the only three were the ones I have mentioned.

On the first route, from Vermillion to Sioux Falls, John W. Dorsey was the subcontractor, and he gave Mr. Vaile the entire pay for all increases and all expeditions. John W. Dorsey had the right to subcontract, and Mr. Vaile had the right to make the contract. The statement on page 726 shows simply that John W. Dorsey never drew a dollar upon that route. That is one route fairly and squarely disposed of. Understand, I cast no imputation upon Mr. Vaile for having the contract and for getting the money. When I come to it I will show you that he had a right to.

The next route is from Kearney to Kent. John W. Dorsey had an interest in that route, according to the agreement of August 16, of one-third. You will see from page 726 of the record that the first quarter John M. Peck got the money, $245.06; it was much. John W. Dorsey was entitled to one-third of that, if it was profit. The next quarter was paid on the 22d of January, 1879—that is, for the fourth quarter of 1878, and that was paid to H. M. Vaile. And never another solitary cent was paid to anybody in such a way that John W. Dorsey was entitled to any part or portion of it. That gets that route out of trouble, so far as John W. Dorsey was concerned, no matter what the increase may have been after that, no matter what the expedition was, no matter whether French carried it for nothing, no matter what happened to Cedarville or that city of Fitzalon; it was no interest to John W. Dorsey, no matter whether the road ran direct from Fitzalon to Cedarville or not. He was entitled to one-third of the profits on one payment to Peck, and that payment was $245.06; whether he ever got it I do not know.

Let us see how he came out on the next route, from Bismarck to Tongue River. He went out there to build stations. I will come to that in a little while. Now, I call attention to page 727. The third quarter from July 1 to September 30, 1878, was paid November 8, 1878, to H. M. Vaile. Never a solitary dollar on the route was paid to John W. Dorsey, according to this record, if you can rely on these books.

That is the state of the case on those three routes. And yet it is solemnly averred in the indictment that all the orders on these routes were made for the joint benefit of John W. Dorsey and others. Now, before another payment was made the division of the routes had been completed, and John W. Dorsey sold out his interest in these routes and all others for $10,000. So that he never received a dollar upon the Bismarck route and the Vermillion route except as it is included in the gross sum of $10,000 which he received for his entire interest, and that entire interest is described perfectly in the contract of August 16, 1878. Now, if John W. Dorsey had no interest in any route except as stated in the contract, of course nothing was done upon any other route for his benefit; nothing was done in which he, by any possibility, had the slightest pecuniary interest. How were the petitions filed for his benefit? How were the affidavits made for his benefit? How were the orders made for his benefit? He had no interest; he had parted with it, and had nothing more to do with it than the attorneys for the prosecution in this case.

It is claimed by Mr. Bliss that when John W. Dorsey sold out he agreed to make the necessary papers for the routes, and he tried to impress upon your minds the idea that the bargain was that John W. Dorsey knew that for that $10,000 he had to commit perjury and forgery and several other cheerful crimes, from time to time, as he might be called upon by the gentlemen who had been his coconspirators. J. W. Dorsey frankly and cheerfully swore that he agreed to make the necessary papers. He did not swear that he agreed to commit any frauds, perjuries, or forgeries. Nothing of the kind. He agreed to execute, of course, the necessary legal papers—the papers that, as contractor, were necessary for him to make to vest title of the route in the person to whom he had sold—just the necessary papers that would allow the man who had paid him for the route to draw the money from the Government if he performed the service. If I were to sell you a piece of land it would be necessary to make a deed; and if I found that the title was defective and forged a deed, so as to make the chain of title complete, I would be responsible for that, but the man who bought the land of me in good faith would not be responsible for the fraudulent deed that I made.

Now, what were the papers? I say right here, gentlemen, that under the law as it was then, under the law as it is now, it is impossible for a contractor to assign his contract so as to be relieved from responsibility to the Government; the Government will not permit it. The Government will permit him to make a subcontract, and that is what John W. Dorsey did; that is one of the things he agreed to do. In order to make that subcontract absolutely certain; in order to put it beyond his power to do anything with it, that subcontract was made for the entire pay, for the entire increase and expedition. And what more? In order to make that absolutely perfect, so they would not have a loop-hole anywhere, he signed blank drafts upon the Post-Office Department for the entire pay of every quarter during the contract term. And then, if they were fined—and nobody knew how much they would be fined—they had the right to fill up that order for the amount due them from the Post-Office Department after deducting fines.

He sold out in March, 1879. The regulation or order making it necessary for the contractor to make an oath as to additional stock and men was not in existence, was not a binding law or regulation, until the 1st day of July, 1879. When he sold out in March, unless he were gifted with prophecy, he would not know what the regulation of the 1st of July following would be.

Now, there were two affidavits made by John W. Dorsey on route 38134, Pueblo to Rosita. Around those affidavits Mr. Bliss hovered and Mr. Ker remained. John W. Dorsey testifies that he received one of those affidavits in the morning and swore to it, and that it was filled up when he swore to it. Mr. Bliss and Mr. Ker, I believe, both say that it was not filled up.

Mr. BLISS. Where does Mr. Dorsey say that it was filled up when he swore to it?

Mr. INGERSOLL. He says it in his evidence.

Mr. BLISS. I would like a reference to it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. You will find it in Mr. Dorsey's evidence.

Mr. BLISS. I have looked in vain.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I have not the page here, but I will give it to you.

Mr. DAVIDGE. He certainly swore that he never swore to any blank affidavits.

Mr. INGERSOLL. He swore that a dozen times, that he never swore to any blank affidavits.

Mr. BLISS. I undertake to say that it cannot be found in his evidence.

The COURT. He testified that he received them both by mail, and that the second one was contained in a letter which said that there was an error in the first, and the second was sent for the purpose of correcting that error.

Mr. INGERSOLL. There could not have been any error in the first unless it had been filled up. You cannot make an error in blank.

Mr. MERRICK. My recollection is that he says he does not know whether they were blank or not.

Mr. INGERSOLL. On page 4838, Mr. Rerdell swore that he left this city on the 17th or 18th of April for the West, and then he adds, "I think on the 18th." Then the Government brought the hotel-keepers from Sidney, Nebraska, and from Denver, and from some other place, nearly as many witnesses as you had about the paper pulp.

The COURT. The other place was Greeley.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes, sir. And they proved that Rerdell was beyond the Missouri River on the 21st of April.

Now see what Mr. Bliss says on page 4914:

And yet, gentlemen, it is beyond dispute that as early as the 15th of April, 1879, Mr. Rerdell had left this city and gone West.

I should have thought that was a mistake of the printer, except for the next lines :

We placed upon the witness-stand here the three hotel-keepers, one from Sidney, in Nebraska, one from Greeley, in Colorado, and the other from Denver. They produced their hotel books, showing Mr. Rerdell's presence at those places respectively on or about the 19th or 20th of April.

The evidence shows that he left here on the 17th or 18th, and Rerdell swears himself that he thinks it was the 18th.

The COURT. Did not the witnesses prove that he was at Denver on the evening of the 24th, and that the same day he took dinner at Greeley?

Mr. BLISS. He was at Sidney earlier, the 21st, I think.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Mr. Bliss says here the 19th.

Mr. BLISS. I think I said the 19th or 20th.

The COURT. I am speaking of the evidence itself.

Mr. BLISS. Mr. Rerdell says the 17th or the 18th.

The COURT. You had three witnesses.

Mr. MERRICK. Two witnesses from the West.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Why did he have it stated on the 15th, gentlemen? I will tell you. Oh, I tell you the human mind is a queer thing when it gets to working. John W. Dorsey was in Middlebury, Vermont; if a letter had been sent from here on the 15th, it certainly would have got up there before the 21st. So they wanted Rerdell out of this town as early as possible, so that it would make it highly improbable that it would take a letter from that time to the 21st to get to Middlebury. Now, the evidence is that he left here, he thinks, on the 18th. When did the letter get up there? I think the 20th or 21st.

Mr. DAVIDGE. There was a Sunday intervened.

Mr. INGERSOLL. They say, gentlemen, that there is no evidence that the blanks were filled, and yet John W. Dorsey swears that he received a letter stating that the first affidavit was erroneous, and the second one was sent to him to correct it. How would you correct one affidavit in blank by another affidavit in blank? How did he ever get those affidavits? I will tell you. We will have that little matter settled.

Mr. CRANE (foreman of the jury). I would like to have this matter settled as to the time it would take for the affidavits to go from here to Vermont, if a Sunday intervened.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Sunday did intervene.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Sunday intervened.

Mr. INGERSOLL. More than that, if they put it in the mail in the evening of the 18th, it might not go out until the morning of the 19th. But here is what Rerdell swears on page 2232—the top line:

Q. When did you leave to go West?—A. I left either on the 17th or 18th of April.

Now, down a little further, near the bottom:

Q. What time did you leave?—A. I left here either on the 17th or 18th of April; the 18th, I think.

Mr. Bliss thinks that it was about the 15th. Now let us see how those affidavits got to John W. Dorsey:

Q. When did you return from that visit?—A. I returned about the 5th of May.

Q. State whether or not after you returned, about the middle of May, as you say, I believe—

A. [Interposing.] I said about the 5th of May.

Q. [Continuing.]—about the 5th of May, 1879, you found blank affidavits among the papers connected with the business?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How many did you find?—A. Well, there were several blank affidavits of John W. Dorsey's and several of John M. Peck's. I don't know how many there were.

Q. Were they blank affidavits?—A. Well, sir, they were blank affidavits similar to that one I sent, leaving out the number of men and animals in each case.

Q. Did they purport to have been sworn to?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Were those affidavits among the papers when you left here to go West?

Now, that was on the 17th or 18th when he left here to go West; he thinks on the 18th.

A. Some of them were. I think those of Peck's were here, probably four or five, or half a dozen, and I had made out, before I left here, a lot of them and sent them to John W. Dorsey. In the mean time, when I returned here, John W. Dorsey was here.

Mr. Rerdell swears that just before he went away he sent the affidavits to John W. Dorsey, and the only question between them is, were they in blank, or were they filled. John W. Dorsey swears that they were filled, because when he received the second he received a letter stating that there was an error in the first, and that error had been corrected in the second. The last nail in the coffin of that doctrine.

Will your honor adjourn now?

The COURT. Adjourn the court.

Thereupon (at 4 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) the court adjourned until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

FRIDAY, MAY 25, 1883.

The court met at 11 o'clock.

Present, counsel for the Government and for the defendants.

Mr. INGERSOLL. [Resuming.] May it please the court and gentlemen of the jury, before finishing what I was about to say in regard to the two affidavits of John W. Dorsey, I will now call your attention to a statement made by Mr. Bliss, on page 304, in his opening speech to you:

Mr. Dorsey, while Senator, was, I think, chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices, and chairman of the subcommittee in charge of all the appropriations. That brought him, of course, directly into connection with the Post-Office Department and its officials, and gave him, as we all understand, necessarily, from the nature of the case, the possession of some exceptional power over officials of the department—greater power than a Senator would have when occupying some other position.

That statement was made to you, gentlemen, for the purpose of making you believe that while Senator Dorsey was a member of the Senate he was also chairman of the Post-Office Committee, and of the subcommittee having power over the appropriations, and that he not only took advantage of being a Senator, but by virtue of being chairman of that committee had exceptional power over the officials of the Post-Office Department. He was wanting to convince you that, finding himself chairman of that committee, finding himself with this power, he thereupon entered into a conspiracy. What evidence did the Government offer upon that point? Nothing. Did Mr. Bliss at that time suppose that Mr. Dorsey was chairman of that committee? The records were all here. The Government had plenty of agents to ascertain what the fact was; and yet, without knowing the facts, Mr. Bliss stated to this jury that he believed that; that Dorsey was chairman of the Post-Office Committee and of the subcommittee; wanting to poison your minds with the idea that Mr. Dorsey had taken advantage of having held that position. Now, the only evidence upon that point I find on page 3992, and that is the evidence of Mr. Dorsey himself. He is asked, Were you a member of the Post-Office Committee in 1877? No. In 1878? No. Or chairman of the subcommittee? Here is what he says, that he had not been on that Post-Office Committee "for nearly two years" prior to July 1, 1878. And yet an attorney representing the United States, representing the greatness and honor, the grandeur and the glory of fifty millions of people, for the purpose of poisoning your minds, there made that statement without knowing anything about it or without caring anything about it. I thought I would clear that point up the first thing this morning.

Now we will go on with the affidavits. You know these terrible affidavits that were sworn to in Vermont. It was stated that the first affidavit was wrong and that the second affidavit was substituted for the first. Now, if the second affidavit took more money out of the Treasury than the first affidavit you might say that there was a sinister motive, a dishonest motive in withdrawing the first and substituting the second, unless it appeared clearly that the second was true. But suppose it turns out that the substitution did not take an extra dollar from the United States? Then what motive do you say they had in doing it? Was it a motive to steal something, or was it a motive simply to be correct? What other motive could there have been? The first affidavit told the number of men and horses then necessary and the number that would be necessary. Now, if that affidavit took less money from the Government than the second affidavit, then you might suspect that the first was withdrawn so that the second might be filed, to the end that more money could be obtained from the Government. But if the second affidavit did not draw an additional dollar from the Treasury, then you have got to look to something besides avarice for a motive, and what other motive could there have been by any possibility, except the motive to be correct? Now, let us see. The first affidavit said three men and twelve animals; for the expedition, seven men and thirty-eight animals; and the proportion was exactly 300 per cent—that is, three times as much. Now, then, they put in another affidavit. The second affidavit says two men and six animals. That makes eight. And on the expedited schedule six men and eighteen animals, which makes twenty-four; and three times eight are twenty-four; exactly the same. Three times fifteen are forty-five, and three times eight are twenty-four, and the amount of money drawn under the second affidavit is precisely the same that would have been drawn under the first affidavit.

Now, do you pretend to tell me that they took the trouble to withdraw the first affidavit and put in the second affidavit when it would not give them another dollar? Do you pretend to tell me they took that trouble because they were trying to defraud somebody? On the contrary, they took that trouble because there was a mistake made in the first affidavit and they wanted to correct it, not for the purpose of getting more money, but for the purpose of getting a correct affidavit.

Mr. CRANE (foreman of the jury). Was not that first affidavit interlined?

Mr. INGERSOLL. No, sir. He first said they would require three men and fifteen animals, and on the expedited schedule it would take forty-five animals. Consequently, on the expedited schedule they would draw three times as much money from the Government, because three times fifteen are forty-five. It then took three men and fifteen animals, and on the expedition it would take forty-five animals. Consequently, if it took at first fifteen animals, and subsequently forty-five animals, it would cost three times as much to have forty-five animals as it would to have three men and fifteen animals. That was withdrawn by a letter, although it was not actually withdrawn. If there had been any fraud about it, would they not have withdrawn the paper? They had a right to withdraw it. Yet they left the paper there; they left it there as a witness. Why? Because it did not prove anything against them; it only proved they desired to be correct.

The second affidavit says it takes eight men and horses, and on the expedition it will take twenty-four men and horses. Now, three times eight are twenty-four. So that the pay under the second affidavit is the same precisely as under the first affidavit. My recollection is there were erasures in both affidavits. Let us find them. Before I get through I will endeavor to show you that every erasure and interlineation is an evidence of honesty instead of dishonesty. What are the numbers of these affidavits? [Examining the papers.] They are number 4 C and 5 C. Route 38134. I will read them:

Hon. THOMAS J. BRADY,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General:

SIR: The number of men and animals necessary to carry the mail on route 38134 on the present schedule is three men and twelve animals. The number necessary on a schedule of ten hours, seven times a week, is seven men and thirty-eight animals.

Respectfully,

JOHN W. DORSEY,
Subcontractor.

There does not appear to be any erasure or interlineation or anything else in that affidavit. Now, here is the other one:

Hon. THOMAS J. BRADY,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General:

SIR: The number of men and animals necessary to carry the mails on route 38134 on the present schedule, seven times a week, is two men and six animals. The number necessary on the schedule of ten hours, seven times a week, is six men and eighteen animals.

Respectfully,

JOHN W. DORSEY,
Subcontractor.

That is the second affidavit. The first was withdrawn. That is, they had permission to withdraw it, and in the second affidavit is the interlineation "seven times a week," isn't it? That is simply an interlineation, because there had been an omission to state the service that was then being performed or that was to be performed.

Mr. CRANE (foreman of the jury). That has puzzled me a good deal, to understand the motive of those two affidavits.

Mr. INGERSOLL. There certainly could not be any motive for putting in seven or three times a week, for this is simply to make it agree with the truth. If I give a note to a man for $500 and should happen to write in the word "hundred" and not the word "five," and then should take it back and write in the word "five" above it, that is not a sign of fraud.

Will somebody give me number 18 K; I just happened to see something there which may be worth something, or may not.

Now, gentlemen, here is a petition marked 2 A, that Rerdell swears that the words "schedule thirteen hours" were written in by Miner. In one of these papers I happened to see the word "schedule." Just notice the word "schedule" on this paper [exhibiting to the jury], and then have the kindness to look at the word "schedule" in this other one [exhibiting to the jury], and see whether you think one man wrote them both. Rerdell says he wrote the word "schedule" in that one [indicating], and that Miner wrote the word "schedule" in this other one [indicating].

Now, gentlemen, there is another charge against John W. Dorsey, on route 38145, and upon that route he made two affidavits. You remember that Mr. Bliss took the ground that the first affidavit that stated the number of men and animals was false, because that was a matter not of opinion, but of fact, and that consequently a man had to swear to the number of men and animals then actually in use. Whereas, I took the ground, and still take it, that you swear to the number of men and animals required and necessary; and by that I mean reasonably necessary. Now, in two affidavits on route 38145—and that is another crime laid at the door of John W. Dorsey—in the first affidavit he swore it would require three men and seven animals on the schedule as it then was, and that makes ten; that with the proposed schedule it would take eleven men and twenty-six animals, making thirty-seven. Now, if it took ten on the schedule as it then was, and thirty-seven on the proposed schedule, then the Government, which accepted that affidavit, would have to pay him three times and seven tenths as much, which is the relation between ten and thirty-seven. The proportion then is three and seven-tenths. On the first affidavit his pay would have been $12,935.52 a year.

Now I come to the second affidavit, which said that for the schedule as it then stood it would take twenty men and animals. The first one said ten, and the second one said it took twenty, as it then was. On the second affidavit he swore it would take five men and fifteen animals on the then schedule, making twenty! On the first affidavit he said ten; and on the proposed schedule he said it would take twelve men and forty-two animals, making fifty-four. Now, the ratio of the second affidavit was as twenty is to fifty-four. The ratio in the first affidavit was as ten is to thirty-seven, so that under the second affidavit, which they say was willful and corrupt perjury, he got $8,457 a year instead of $12,935.52. There were three years for the contract to run, and a little over. Under the first affidavit he would have received $13,992.75 during the contract term more than he took under the second. An affidavit was put in there that he thought was erroneous. He withdrew that affidavit and put in a second one. If he had allowed the first to remain and they had calculated the amount on the first he would have received $13,992.75 more than he did under the second affidavit. But he withdrew the first and put in the second, and took from the Treasury $13,992.75 less, and they charge that as a fraud, as an evidence of conspiracy and perjury. Now, that is all there is against John W. Dorsey.

On page 4090 John W. Dorsey swears that General Miles wanted to know how far apart he (Dorsey) was building the stations on the Tongue River and Bismarck route. Let us turn to page 4090. You know they were trying to prove that when John W. Dorsey went out there and built the ranches that he was going to build them about fifteen or seventeen miles apart, because it was claimed that they knew there was to be increase and expedition. You remember that. Now, when John W. Dorsey came upon the stand he swore that when they went out there they started to build those stations, I believe, somewhere in the neighborhood of thirty or thirty-five miles apart, as they could get water. Then he swore that when he went himself over, I think, to Miles City, where General Miles was, that General Miles asked him how far he was building his stations apart. John W. Dorsey told him. Then General Miles gave him his advice. Now, I want to read this to you. I asked him this question :

Q. When you got to Fort Keogh did you go to see General Miles?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you have any conversation with him with regard to this route, with regard to the needs of the country for mail service; and, if so, what was it?

Now, let us see what General Miles said. But before that I stated this to the court, that—

When he left Bismarck, or before that, he gave instructions to the men that were to build the stations to build them from thirty to thirty-five miles apart, according as they might find water. When he got to Fort Keogh he had a conversation with General Miles, in which General Miles told him that he knew that they would never get along with a weekly service there; that it would have to be three or four times a week anyhow, and that it would be put on shorter time, and that they would need at least twice as many stations; that he was wasting his time to build stations that far apart. Consequently, when they got through they turned around and went back, building stations between those they had already built.

Now, it has been claimed here that the orders were, when Rerdell or somebody else left the city, to build the stations fifteen to seventeen miles apart; that although they would not need them at first, they would need them when the increase came. I want to show by this witness that he was building these stations thirty to thirty-five miles apart, but that he made the change and built the intermediate stations on account of his conversation with General Miles.

Then came a little discussion on the propriety of admitting that evidence, and Mr. Bliss said :

Will your honor permit me to interrupt you? I merely wish to say that we do not object to the witness saying that in consequence of information received from General Miles he did so and so. But they seek to have given in evidence the alleged statement of General Miles in the conversation that he knew there would be an increase of that kind. That cannot be evidence.

The COURT. The evidence would be worthless without the statement of General Miles to the witness; and if it is to be admitted at all it is only efficient in the light of the advice given by General Miles. I think it is admissible. As to the weight of the evidence, of course the jury will have to decide that, whether it is one way or the other.

Then Mr. Bliss says :

If this is to be admitted you will understand that we have the right to recall General Miles to go into that subject.

Mr. CARPENTER. We do not object.

Mr. BLISS. From the conversation I have had with him—that is, General Miles—instead of testifying to anything of that kind, I think General Miles would contradict him.

The COURT. Whenever you offer that evidence the court will decide.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I hope the witness will not be frightened.

Now the witness gives the conversation on page 4091, and this is it :

A. As near as I can recollect it, I applied to him in the first place for an escort; told him what my business was; that I wanted a scout to find my way through; that I did not know anything about the country. He said that there was a surveying party out at that time who had an escort, and that as soon as they got in he would send the escort with me. He then went on to inquire about what we were expecting to do. I told him all about the business generally. He seemed to understand it pretty well. He wanted to know how far apart we were building stations. I told him. He wanted to know how often the mails would run, and I told him it would be weekly service, I thought. "We have been pent up here two or three years," he says, "with mails from eighteen to twenty days apart, reaching us by the way of Ogden and Bozeman." And he says, "We can get it in seven or eight days over this line." And now I would like to say that he did not say that he knew there would be an increase, but he said he should like to have it increased to three trips a week, or daily, and fifty hours' time. I told him there was no use to try to get it at all; that it could not be done at present; that nobody knew the distance through that country; that we expected to have it measured; that it was claimed by everybody that it was a good deal more than two hundred and fifty and probably over three hundred miles, and nobody would undertake to carry it. Said I, "If you extend it the contractor can throw up his contract and you will be without any mail." He said, "We are going to ask for what we want, but we will take what they will give us."

Q. Did he say whom he would ask?—A. Yes, he said "I am going to write to General Key."

The COURT. This conversation does not relate to the point.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes.

The WITNESS. And he said he would write to General Sherman.

The COURT. He has not come to the point.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes, that he would have to build more stations.

Mr. MERRICK. He has come to the point, as I understand, where I object. I object, your honor.

The WITNESS. I will give it just as short as I can to make it intelligible.

The COURT. The court does not mean to say that everything that General Miles told the witness in that conversation is admissible.

The WITNESS. I have not told one-tenth of it.

Mr. MERRICK. How much can he give?

The COURT. So much as relates to the establishment of these posts.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is it.

The WITNESS. He says: "Your stations are too far apart; you can't run any fast time with your stations so far apart; you want more stations, and nearer together." The result was that when I went back I met Mr. Pennell, who had built the stations thirty to thirty-five miles apart, and going back we put in intermediate stations. We only carried out lumber enough from Bismarck to build eight or nine stations, for the windows, &c.; we did not think of building any more at that time. Mr. Pennell says the order was to build the stations seventeen to twenty miles apart in going out. That is no such thing. There was not a station built going out closer than thirty to thirty-five miles.

Q. What, if anything, did General Miles say that convinced you that you ought to build stations nearer together?

Then he testifies that on account of what he said he did this, and that he had no instructions from Washington. He is asked, "Did General Miles give you any escort?" "Yes, sir; a large number of men, in eight or ten days."

That is the testimony. Mr. Bliss endeavored to frighten the witness by stating in his presence that he (Bliss) did not believe General Miles would swear to any such thing, judging, of course, from the conversation that he (Mr. Bliss) had had with General Miles. But they did not bring General Miles here to contradict John W. Dorsey. Notwithstanding that threat, John W. Dorsey went right on and told the story, and said that General Miles advised him to put his stations about fifteen miles apart, and that it was in consequence of that advice that he did build the stations that distance apart. Mr. Bliss intimated to the witness that General Miles would swear the other way, and that he (Bliss) knew it because he had had a conversation with General Miles. But John W. Dorsey, confident that he was telling the truth, knowing that he was telling the truth, told his story, and the Government never brought General Miles to contradict him.

Mr. CARPENTER. I do not believe he was here.

Mr. INGERSOLL. He was here, but not a word from him. Now the next thing about John W. Dorsey is the conversation that he had with some men in July or August out on the road, that I have spoken to you about before. Nothing could be more perfectly improbable. It may be that he did tell some man that he was a brother of Senator Dorsey, and, perhaps, he did say that if he got into a tight place or hard up for money he could borrow money from his brother. I do not know what he may have said on that subject. But, gentlemen, there is not a man on this jury, not one of you, who has the slightest suspicion that John W. Dorsey at that time told those men substantially that his brother was in a conspiracy with the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and that he, John W. Dorsey, was also a conspirator. There is not one of you who believes that, not one, and you never will. Why not? Because it is so utterly and infinitely unreasonable and absurd. Now, that is the evidence against John W. Dorsey. My attention is called to one other point in his case, and so I will call your attention to it.

Mr. Bliss, gentlemen, on page 243, in speaking of the two affidavits on the Pueblo and Rosita route, says :

We find this extraordinary condition of things. On route 38134, from Pueblo to Rosita, which, I think, is the same route upon which the obliging Mr. John W. Dorsey, as I have just stated to you, was allowed to make the affidavit instead of Mr. Miner.

Now, he goes on to describe these two affidavits, and then he says :

Those two affidavits were before Mr. Brady, made by John W. Dorsey on the same day, and yet Mr. Brady chose to pick out one or the other of them and say, "I believe that as the absolutely conclusive statement of the number of men and animals that are now in use upon that route, and upon that affidavit I will make my order taking from the Treasury thousands of dollars of money." You will see that the first affidavit made the number two men and six animals, making eight as the number of stock and carriers then in use; but the other one called for three men and twelve animals, making fifteen as the number then in use, and, therefore, according as he accepted one or the other, by the rule of three, to which I called your attention just now, there would be twice the amount of money allowed from the Treasury under the one affidavit that there would be under the other.

Just think of that, gentlemen. The number of men and animals then in use has nothing to do with the number of men and animals stated in the other affidavit; those amounts bear no relation to each other. The number of men and animals in use in the first affidavit, and the number that would be necessary on the next schedule, do bear a relation to each other. The number of men and animals on the second affidavit on the then schedule bears relation to the proposed number on the proposed schedule, and not to the number on the other affidavit. And yet Mr. Bliss stood right before you, with those two affidavits that would take the same amount of money out of the Treasury, to a fraction, precisely the same—not the difference of the billionth part of a farthing—and stated to you that one would take twice as much money from the Treasury as the other. You will think that he is as defective in mathematics as in law. I say to you now that the amount that would be taken out of the Treasury on those two affidavits is precisely the same. I did not think that anybody could excel Mr. Ker in mathematics, but Mr. Bliss bears off the palm. He bears off the palm even in misstatement, and bears off the palm in mistake. The two affidavits would call for the same amount of money precisely, and yet Mr. Bliss stands up before you and says there is twice as much on one as the other. Now, what is that for? That is to prejudice you; that is all.

Gentlemen, you saw John W. Dorsey; you heard his testimony; you know whether he is a man to be believed. It is for you to judge whether he is honest or dishonest, and I leave his testimony with you. It was direct; it was to the point; and his manner on the stand was absolutely and perfectly honest.

Now, there is another point made. You know you have to think of these things as you can, and step on them and then go on. Another point is made, and it was urged by Mr. Bliss day after day. And what is that? That Mr. Brady took the affidavits of all these men as absolutely true; that he allowed them to fix the limit of the money they would take out of the Treasury: that he allowed interested men to make the affidavits, and then he took the affidavits as absolutely true; that he allowed the contractors themselves to fix the sum they would seize. Now let us see what that is. Mr. Brady swears that he regarded the affidavit as the honest opinion of the man who made it, but not as necessarily true; that he had a standard of his own. Your views upon all such questions, gentlemen, will depend upon which side of human nature you stand—whether you are a believer in total depravity, or whether you think there is a little virtue left in human nature. If you stand on the side of suspicion, if you allow the snake of prejudice to forever whisper in your ear, why, your idea will be that every man is a rascal; and whenever he does a decent action you will say, “This action is a little velvet in the paw for the purpose of covering the claw of some devilment that he has in store.” If you judge from that side you can torture any act, no matter what it is, into evidence of guilt. But you may judge from the other side and say that men, as a rule, are decent; that they would rather do a kind act than a mean thing; that they would rather tell the truth than tell a lie. I tell you to-day that there is an immensity of good in human nature. There are hundreds and thousands and millions of men to-day who are honest, who would not for anything stain the whiteness of their souls with a lie. They are laboring-men, it may be, working by the day for a dollar or a dollar and a half, and only taking enough of it to keep life and strength in their bodies and giving the rest to wife and child. And there are battles, as grand as were ever won by a celebrated general, and just as bravely fought, with poverty day after day; and the man who fights the battles gains the victory and goes down to the grave with his manhood untarnished. You know it, and so do I. And yet you are all the time told to suspect everything, no matter what it is. There is a flower there; ah, but there is a snake under it! Always making that remark; accounting for every decent looking action by a base motive. That is not my view of human nature.

Now, Mr. Brady says that he had a standard of his own; that he let these men make their statements, and he took their statements as being what they believed to be the truth. And why not? Suppose I say to a man “What will you take for that horse?” And the man says, “That horse is worth a hundred dollars.” Suppose he goes and swears to it; that would not make any difference in the price I would give for the horse, not a bit. You see I am not buying an affidavit, I am buying a horse. So, when Brady says to the contractor, “What will you carry the mail at six miles an hour for?” and the man says, “$25,000,” and he swears to it, Brady is not buying the affidavit; it is the service. If he does not believe the service is worth that much, he says, “I can’t do it,” and that is all. But they say “No; that is not what Brady did.”

Now, as a matter of fact, there are nineteen routes in this indictment, and I believe eighteen of them were expedited. I have made a calculation for the purpose of showing that the amount to be paid was a matter of bargain; that it was a matter talked over between the parties; that it was the result of agreement, and that Mr. Brady did not take the affidavit as the actual amount, and that they were not bound to take the amount that he actually said. Now, I have deducted what was allowed from what could have been allowed on the affidavits, and I find that the price did not depend upon the affidavits. I find that there was a difference between the amount called for by the affidavits and the amount granted of over $300,000. And yet these gentlemen say to you that Brady allowed the men who made the affidavits absolutely to fix the amount. Gentlemen, that will not do. It was a matter of agreement, a matter of bargain, the same as any other agreement or any other bargain.

Now, gentlemen, suppose they had had a conspiracy and said, "We want to get all the money we can out of the Treasury." They would have agreed upon a per cent.; they would have had all those affidavits showing substantially the same per cent., wouldn't they? Because they would have wanted harmony in it. They would have said, "It won't do for you to make an affidavit on that route with 1,200 per cent., on this route with 500, on that route with 220 per cent., and on the other route with 340 per cent. That won't do; that is nonsense; we are in a conspiracy and we want all these things to agree and harmonize." And the result would have been that they would have had about the same per cent. in all those affidavits. And yet those affidavits vary in per cent. all the way from 220 to 1,200. They say, "Result of conspiracy." I do not look at it in that way.

It is also claimed that the persons who sold out—that is to say, John M. Peck and John W. Dorsey—agreed to make the necessary papers that the other parties required. That being so, why should not affidavits have been made in blank? Now, I ask you if the other parties were willing to swear to anything that these men would write, why were they made that way? Why not avoid the suspicious circumstance of blanks and put the amount in at first, knowing that the men would not hesitate to swear? Of what use was it, gentlemen, to have an affidavit suspiciously made, to have blanks suspiciously left, when the men were willing to swear to any numbers they would put in? Why did not the parties who made the affidavits write in the amounts? Does not that very fact, that blanks were left, show that they were to take the judgment of the men who were to do the swearing? Why would they leave blanks? Why did they not fill them up at the time and have them sworn to?

Why were they not continuously written? That is another point, if this was a conspiracy. Guilt is always conscious that it is guilty. Guilt is always suspecting detection. Guilt is infinitely suspicious. Guilt would make all the papers as nearly right as possible. Guilt would look out for erasures. Guilt would abhor blots. Guilt would have avoided having blanks filled in with different colored inks. Guilt would want everything fitting everything else, nothing to excite suspicion. Innocence is negligent. The man with honest intentions is the one that does not care. But the guilty man does not travel in the snow. He wants no tracks left.

Now, another thing: The fact that no effort was made to have the affidavits in the same handwriting, no effort to have the blanks apparently filled at the same time, that they were interlined, that there were erasures—all those things tend to show that the parties were honest in what they did. It was just as easy to have one without an erasure as with it; it was just as easy to have one continuously written as to have the blanks filled up; just as easy to have one without any interlineations as with it. And yet these parties, knowing that they were conspirators (according to these gentlemen), Mr. Brady occupying a high and responsible position, were so careless of their reputation, that they did not even endeavor to make the papers passable upon their face.

Another thing : These very routes were investigated by Congress in 1878—this very business. If the parties at that time had been conscious of guilt, why were any suspicious papers left on file ? Why were not others substituted that had no suspicious interlineations, no suspicious erasures, no suspicious blanks that had been filled ? Why were these very affidavits at that time reported to Congress ?

Mr. GREENE (a juror). What time was that ?

Mr. INGERSOLL. The first investigation was in 1878, and on account of that investigation the contractors for about a month and a half were left in doubt as to whether they would go on with their contracts or not. Then there was another investigation in 1880. I have forgotten what the first investigation was about, but it was about these routes, and I remember that, according to the evidence, the contractors were delayed about a month and a half.

Now, I ask if the parties had been conscious of guilt why did they report these very identical affidavits and petitions to Congress, with all the erasures that they talk about, with all the interlineations, and with the blanks suspiciously filled ? General Brady at the time had absolute control of every one of those papers.

Mr. MERRICK. Is there any evidence that they were all reported to Congress ?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I think so ; I think that is here in the record. I understand the evidence to be that it was all reported to Congress.

Mr. MERRICK. The investigation of 1880 was general, and not as to these particular routes.

Mr. INGERSOLL. In 1878 there was a special investigation growing out of these Clendenning bonds and out of the Peck bids, and out of the connection that they said Stephen W. Dorsey had with this business. That is what it grew out of. Now, in the light of that investigation, let us take it for granted for one moment that according to their statement the parties had conspired. If anything on earth would make them afraid about papers I think it would have been that investigation ; and yet no effort was made to conceal one, not the slightest.

Then we will go another step. General Brady was Second Assistant Postmaster-General. All these papers were absolutely in his power. He could have called for them at any time. Every suspicious paper could have been destroyed or an unsuspicious one substituted for it.

Now I want to know if it is conceivable that General Brady, under these charges, when the new administration came in, under the threat of the Government, would voluntarily leave those papers upon the files if they had been dishonest and he knew it.

Take another step. So far as we have learned from the prosecution I believe there is one paper claimed by them to have been lost. They do claim that there was a second affidavit on the Bismarck and Tongue River route. One is gone and one remains. Which remains ? The affidavit for one hundred and fifty men and one hundred and fifty horses. It seems to me absolutely capable of demonstration that we did not take the one that is gone. Had we been going to take anything we would have taken the one for one hundred and fifty men and one hundred and fifty horses, and left the other. But the other, about which nobody ever did complain, was taken, and the one upon which they build their great argument of fraud upon that route was left. And then it turned out that General Brady only allowed 40 per cent. of that affidavit.

Now this prosecution was not begun in a moment. It was talked about for weeks and months, I might almost say for years. Talk, talk, talk in the papers everywhere. These men were not suddenly charged with this offense. They understood it; they knew it. I think I have been engaged in this suit, or suits growing out of this business, for two years. It was a matter of slow growth. Mr. Brady retired, I believe, some time in April, 1881, knowing at that time that these charges had been made and that the charges were being pressed. Mr. Dorsey knew it at the same time. All these defendants knew it. Now they say that at that time we were in conspiracy with Mr. Brady, and they say that at that time we were in conspiracy with Mr. Turner. We had the papers in our power.

Now, if Mr. Dorsey was wicked enough to conspire, if Mr. Brady was villainous enough to conspire, I ask you whether they would have left behind the evidence of their conspiracy? Why were the papers left? Because General Brady never dreamed that one of them was dishonest. Why did not Vaile and Miner, John W. Dorsey and Peck and Stephen W. Dorsey ask for the papers? Because they believed every one to be honest, and they had no use for them. They were willing that the Government should make out of them what it could. I ask again, is it conceivable that John R. Miner, if he knew there was on the files of the department a petition that he had changed, that he had erased, that he had interlined or forged, is it conceivable, if he had been wicked enough to enter into the conspiracy, that he would have been foolish enough to leave the paper there? Would he not have gone to Brady and said to him, "I conspired; you know it; I changed the petition, and I want it; I erased a word in a petition, I want it; I signed a name to a petition, I want it?" And Brady would have said, "Yes, and you ought to have called for it long ago; you can have it." If S. W. Dorsey had interlined an affidavit or had filled a blank, if S. W. Dorsey had made an erasure or an interlineation, he, of course, must have known it, and if he conspired with Brady he must have known it, and he must have gone to General Brady and said, "I want that affidavit on such a route; we can write another, and I want that; I want that petition;" and it would have been given. You cannot conceive of such infinite stupidity as to say that those people knew that those papers were dishonest, and that they still left them on file as weapons for their enemies. You cannot do it.

So much, gentlemen, for the affidavits, and so much for the papers.

Now, there is another question, and I have no doubt but that you have asked it yourselves. It has been asked a great many times by the prosecution. That question is this: Why did Dorsey retain Rer-dell in his employ after the 20th of June, 1881? These gentlemen tell you that it is evidence of guilt that he did it. I will tell you why he did it. At that time the public mind was almost infinitely excited on this question. At that time the public was ready to believe anything. It had its mouth wide open, like a young robin, ready for worms or shingle-nails—it made no difference—anything that dropped in. Every newspaper was charging that these defendants were guilty, that Stephen W. Dorsey was a conspirator, that millions had been taken from the Treasury, and there were nearly as many mistakes in the press then as in the speech of Mr. Bliss now. But I can excuse that, because it was before the evidence. Now, what was Mr. Dorsey to do in the then state of the public mind? That man, no matter how bad he was, how base he was, had the power to have him indicted. That man could have gone before the grand jury and had Mr. Dorsey or any other public man indicted in the then state of excitement and feeling of the public. What was the result of his going even to James and MacVeagh? I believe Mr. Turner says that on account of the statement of this man Rerdell, he (Turner) was turned out of his office. That is the effect. What became of McGrew? What became of Lilley? What became of Lake? What became of twenty or thirty other officials upon whose reputation this man had breathed the poison of slander? Stephen W. Dorsey at that time knew that that man in the then state of public excitement was powerful for mischief. That man made the affidavit of June, 1881, at the request of James W. Bosler, as he himself says, and swore that he went to the Government simply to find out the Government's secrets; swore that he was still upon the side of Stephen W. Dorsey; took back what he had said, and swore that it was a lie. The question then was what to do with him? Stephen W. Dorsey made up his mind not to do anything more, just to let him alone, just let him stay as he was. That was the wise course. It was the course that any wise man, in my judgment, would have pursued under the circumstances. What else could he do? Let him alone. Let him alone. He did not at that time expect that he would ever be indicted. He shrank from an indictment, as every sensitive man does, because when you have indicted a man you have put a stain upon him that even the verdict of not guilty does not altogether remove. He did not want that stain. He was a man of power; he was a man of position, a man of social and political standing, a man wielding as much influence as any other one man in the United States. He did not wish to be indicted. He did not wish his reputation to be soiled and stained. And so he allowed that man to stay where he was. He may have made a mistake, but whether a mistake or not, that is what he did.

There is another question. Why did we fail to produce our books and papers? I will tell you. The notice to produce them was given to us on the 13th day of February. We had noticed curious motions. Two days afterwards, Mr. Rerdell went on the stand. What did they want the books and papers for? For Mr. Rerdell to look at. Why did he want to look at the books and papers? To stake out his testimony. He hated to depend upon his memory. We took the responsibility of letting the witness swear to the contents of the books and papers, and let them call that secondary evidence. We took that responsibility rather than to furnish the books and papers to be looked at by that man in order that he might make no mistakes in his testimony. What happened afterwards justified our course. If we had shown to him the books and papers, and checks, and stubs, do you think he would have made any mistake about that $7,500 check? Would he have said that he went with Dorsey, and that Dorsey drew the money, and that he looked over his shoulder, and that then he and Dorsey walked down to the Post-Office Department, if he had known that that check was drawn to his order? If he had known before he swore, that he indorsed that check, he would have said he went down and got the money himself; he would not have said that Dorsey did. He would have made no mistakes there. He would not have been driven into the corner of saying, "stub" or "stubs," "check-book" or "check-books," "amount" or "amounts." No, sir. And that one thing justified absolutely the wisdom of our course.

Then the court decided that, having failed to produce our books on notice and allowed the other side to introduce secondary evidence of their contents, we would not be allowed then to produce them. I insisted that we had the right then to produce them, and the court decided that we had not. We took the responsibility of refusing, and we took that responsibility because we made up our minds that we would not allow that man to look over the books, checks, and stubs for the purpose of manufacturing his testimony.

The COURT. Where did you offer to produce the books?

Mr. MERRICK. Where did you offer the production of the books? That is just what I was about to ask.

Mr. CARPENTER. The court said we could not.

Mr. MERRICK. Where did you make the offer?

The COURT. I want to know.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. Ingersoll did not say he made the offer.

Mr. MERRICK. I think he did.

The COURT. I think he did.

Mr. CARPENTER. Just read it, Mr. Stenographer. He says nothing of the kind.

The STENOGRAPHER. [Reading:]

I insisted that we had the right then to produce them, and the court decided that we had not.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is exactly what I say.

The COURT. The court did not give any intimation at that time, but after that point in the trial had passed, several days, several weeks, I think, the attention of the court was called to this question, and the court remarked, in the course of the opinion, that it understood the law to be that after a party, upon whom notice had been given to produce books, had failed to produce the books and the other side had given secondary evidence, then the court would not allow the party having the books to produce them for the purpose of contradicting the secondary evidence.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is all I claim.

The COURT. But there was no such offer made, so far as I recollect.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Why should we make the offer after your honor had decided that we could not do it?

Mr. MERRICK. I will answer the question. Because whether it would have been accepted or not was a question for the counsel for the Government when the offer was made. And again, the learned counsel will recollect that after the notice was given, when S. W. Dorsey was on the stand on cross-examination, I demanded those books and those stubs, and he asked leave to consult his counsel. The court denied that request, and then there was a peremptory refusal to produce any book or any paper.

The COURT. Oh, yes. Mr. Ingersoll and Mr. Davidge repeatedly announced to the court that they were not going to produce books to assist the prosecution.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes; I said that twenty times, and the court, as I understood it, held that after we had refused to produce the books and driven the other party to secondary evidence, we could not then produce the books.

The COURT. You made no offer to produce the books.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I resisted the opinion of the court and made the best argument I could, but the court said that was not the law.

The COURT. The court's remark at that time was not upon any offer you made to produce the books; you made no offer.

Mr. INGERSOLL. No, sir; we said we would not produce them, and the court warned us at the time that if we refused to produce them we could not do so afterwards; and then I undertook to argue with the court that we could.

Mr. MERRICK. You will find what took place on on page 4438, in the cross-examination of Mr. Rerdell.

By Mr. INGERSOLL:

Q. What did you say your name was?—A. M. C. Rerdell.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is all.

Mr. BLISS. [To defendants' counsel.] Have you made an examination, gentlemen, for that Clendenning letter?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I have never thought of it since.

Mr. MERRICK. Have you made an examination for the stubs of the checks?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes.

Mr. MERRICK. You are going to keep them, are you not?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes.

And subsequently the cross-examination of Mr. Dorsey did away with all the inferences of the preceding notice given in the progress of the testimony in chief. So that the case stands before us upon the demand made upon the cross-examination.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do not understand it that way.

The COURT. The remark of the court, to which counsel has just referred and to which the court has referred, arose upon an argument on the part of Mr. Ingersoll, and, if I am not mistaken, upon the effect of the refusal to produce the books and papers, Mr. Ingersoll contending that there was no presumption against his client on account of the refusal to produce the books and papers, and that the jury ought to be instructed that the only effect of refusing to produce the books and papers was to leave the case upon the secondary evidence; and in that course of that discussion it was that the court remarked, I think, that the secondary evidence would be left for the consideration of the jury under all the circumstances of the case, and that the credit of the witness was to be weighed; but that if the party withheld primary evidence, the secondary evidence, as a general rule, was to stand, and that that rule was carried so far that the party having the books would not be allowed to produce them for the purpose of contradicting the secondary evidence.

Mr. MERRICK. That was it.

The COURT. I think that was the occasion when that remark was made by the court.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Do you mean during the argument of the case?

The COURT. During the argument of the question.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Before the jury?

The COURT. Yes.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Do you mean since I have been arguing the case before the jury?

The COURT. Oh, no; it was before you began, I think.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Long ago, while the evidence was being given. We will find it.

The COURT. No, no; it has been since the closing arguments began, I think.

Mr. INGERSOLL. It has been referred to by me during my present argument to the jury. I brought up the question, you know.

The COURT. Yes.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I brought up the question whether this evidence could be patched up by presumptions. But I am not referring to that discussion, nor to that decision of your honor; I am referring to the decision you made during the trial.

The COURT. That was the only occasion since this trial began, in which the court referred to that rule of law which denied the right to introduce primary evidence for the purpose of contradicting the secondary evidence, after the primary evidence had been withheld in the first instance.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Of course, I am not absolutely certain, I never am; but I will endeavor to find in the record exactly what you said on that subject.

And now, in order that we may be perfectly correct, and in order to show, too, how easy it is to be mistaken, Mr. Merrick just said upon that very subject of the books and papers, that while Mr. Dorsey was upon the stand, he asked leave to consult his counsel. If Mr. Merrick will read the testimony he will find that Mr. Dorsey made that remark when he was asked about the affidavit of June 20, 1881.

Mr. MERRICK. You are right.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That just shows how easy it is to make a mistake when it comes to a matter of recollection.

Mr. MERRICK. I think it was upon a question of the insertion of the change in the character of the affidavit—its being addressed to the President; and when I asked him if he had not made that change he asked leave to consult his counsel. For the moment I thought it was upon the books. But the substance still remains, that, on the question of the books, I asked him on his cross-examination—and the counsel will state his recollection to be the same—about the stubs and the books, and called upon him to produce them, and the counsel replied, "We will not."

Mr. INGERSOLL. I presume I did. I made that reply a good many times.

Mr. MERRICK. Will the counsel be frank enough to state when that decision was made?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Which decision?

Mr. MERRICK. When he was on the stand on cross-examination.

Mr. INGERSOLL. And I said we would not produce them?

Mr. MERRICK. After the testimony in chief and Rerdell was gone.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Then I said we would not produce them. And now I will say that the decision of the court was made before that time that we could not produce them, and if I do not show it then I will publicly take it back.

The COURT. I do not think you can show it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. If I do not, then I will beg your honor's pardon, and if I do—if I do—[Laughter.]

Now, I think what happened afterwards in this case with that very witness justifies the course that we pursued. He also stated at the time that we had, I believe, some twenty thousand pages of letters on all possible subjects to a great number of people. We knew that there was a spirit abroad—and some of it in a part of the prosecution—to find something against somebody else somewhere. We made up our minds that our private books and correspondence never should be ransacked by this Department of Justice. We took the consequences, and we are willing to take them. We say that the inference from our refusal is an inference of fact, and must be decided by the jury, and is not an inference of law.

We have been asked a good many times why we did not put James W. Bosler on the stand. The prosecution subpoenaed Mr. Bosler. They appeared to have an affection for him. They subpoenaed him, and he came here. Afterwards they issued an attachment for him. They had him arrested at midnight and brought here. He gave some testimony, and you will find it on page 2611.

Mr. MERRICK. I do not know that there was an attachment.

Mr. KER. He threw an officer out of the house.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I simply understood that there was an attachment. Mr. Clerk, was there an attachment issued for Mr. Bosler?

Mr. WILLIAMS (the clerk). I do not remember.

Mr. WILSON. He was certainly formally called in open court for the purpose of laying a foundation for the issue of an attachment, whether they took one out or not.

Mr. INGERSOLL. You know you have a right to prove things by circumstances. Now, it is said that he put the marshal out of the house; I think that is evidence tending to show that an attachment issued.

Mr. KER. And kept him out with a club.

The COURT. I understood also that Mr. Dorsey kicked somebody else out of his house about the same time.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Oh, yes; it has been a very lively term of court.

There were two very important things that they were to prove by Mr. Bosler, and they were patting him on the back here for weeks. Friendship sprang up between them. It was a very young plant at first, but the Bosler ivy grew upon the oak of the prosecution. I saw him sitting here, everything delightful. The prosecution, I hoped, began to flatter itself that Mr. Bosler was on their side; I hoped that was so. Finally they put Mr. Bosler on the stand. What did they want to prove by him? That Dorsey wrote a letter to him on the 13th of May, 1879, telling how much money he had given to Brady; that is one thing they wanted to prove by him. The second thing was that Rerdell had written a letter to Bosler, I believe, on the 20th of May or 22d of May, 1880, stating that he (Rerdell) had been subpoenaed to go before the Congressional committee and take his books and papers; that he got very much frightened; that he had taken the advice of Brady and got a very valuable suggestion from Brady, which he was going to follow. They wanted to prove that by Mr. Bosler.

Mr. MERRICK. Were any questions of that kind asked him?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes; I think so; we will see.

Mr. MERRICK. Please point them out.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I am going to read it right now. Now, Rerdell had been examined. Rerdell had already sworn that Dorsey sent a letter to Bosler on the 13th of May, 1879. Rerdell had sworn to the contents of that letter; that the contents were that he had paid Brady so much money, &c., which you remember; and then that he, in 1880, had written a letter to Mr. Bosler, and I believe he pretended to have a copy of it. Now, here comes Bosler's testimony, on page 2611:

Q. Do you know Stephen W. Dorsey?—A. I do.

Q. Were you subpoenaed to produce here certain letters?—A. I was, sir.

Q. Have you made a search among your papers to find a letter alleged to have been written to you by Stephen W. Dorsey, and dated on or about the 13th of May, 1879?—A. Yes, sir.

That is the letter that Rerdell swore about.

Q. Have you searched?—A. I have.

Q. Did you find it?—A. No, sir.

Q. How thoroughly did you search?—A. I went through every letter that I had in my office.

Q. Is it now in your possession?—A. No, sir.

Q. If you ever had such a letter, is it, so far as you know, in existence?—A. No, sir; or I should have had it.

Q. And you did not find it?—A. I did not find it.

Q. You know Mr. M. C. Rerdell?—A. Very well, sir.

Q. Have you made search for a letter purporting to have been written by him to you, and dated on or about the 22d of May, 1880?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you find that letter?—A. I did not.

Q. Did you make a thorough search?—A. I did.

Q. Is the letter in your possession?—A. No, sir.

Q. If you ever had such a letter, is it, so far as you know, in existence?—A. No, sir.

Now they are going to drop him. The object then was, having proved that the letter was lost, to prove the contents. This excited the curiosity of the court, and his honor said:

Was there ever such a letter?

Bosler replied :

There never was such a letter received by me.

Then the court asked him another question :

And the same question as to the other ?

And the witness replied :

The same [answer] as to the other.

Then Mr. Bliss came back at him :

By Mr. BLISS :

Q. You say you never received such a letter ?—A. I never received such a letter, or I would have it.

Q. Do you mean to say you have kept all the letters received by you from Mr. Dorsey ?—A. No ; I have kept all letters pertaining to business.

Q. All letters ?—A. All letters pertaining to business.

Q. And you have made thorough search and do not find it ?—A. I do not find it.

Q. And the same is true with Mr. Rerdell's letter, is it ?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Your statement that you did not receive it is derived from the fact that you do not find it ?—A. It is.

Mr. BLISS. That is all.

CROSS-EXAMINATION.

By Mr. INGERSOLL :

Q. Have you been shown what purported to be a copy of the first letter about which you have been questioned ?—A. No, sir ; but simply as to the date ; there is where I am in the dark.

Q. Have you been told by any one substantially what the contents of the letter claimed to be ?—A. No ; I was told by counsel for the prosecution—

Mr. INGERSOLL. [Interposing.] I do not care by whom.

The WITNESS. By Mr. Bliss—

Mr. INGERSOLL. I am not asking that.

The WITNESS.—when I was subpoenaed, that he wanted a letter of that kind if I had it, and I told him I would make a search for it.

Q. What I want to get is, were you told what the contents purported to be ?—A. No.

Q. Were you of the second letter about which you have been questioned ?—A. I was, in a general way. In a general way for both of them ; and for that reason I made it my business to make a thorough search.

Q. Now, do you say that you never received either of those letters ?—A. That is, from the best of my information. I have no recollection of it, and I cannot find them ; the fact that I cannot find them is, to my mind, evidence that I never received them.

Q. After having been told in a general way what was claimed as the contents of the letters, did that furnish any other reason in your mind for knowing whether you had or had not received them ?—A. Please be a little more explicit.

Q. I understood you to say, in a general way, that you had been told the contents—that is, what they claimed as they contents ?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Had you received a letter of the kind described, would you have remembered it ?—A. I certainly should have.

Q. Is that also true as to the second letter ?—A. It is.

Q. Now, there are two facts, what the contents were claimed to be, and the further fact that you had no such letters in your possession. Do you now say that you are satisfied from those facts that you never received any such letters ?—A. I am.

Q. Are you perfectly satisfied of that ?—A. I am, sir.

There is the testimony of Mr. Bosler, and on that testimony the two letters of May 13, 1879, and May 22, 1880, turn to dust and ashes.

Now they say, "Why didn't you put Mr. Bosler on?" Not much necessity of Mr. Bosler after that. And besides, gentlemen, I believe I will take you into my confidence just a little bit. The evidence of Rerdell as to the affidavit of June 20, 1881, and the affidavit of July 13, 1882 (an affidavit in which he swore that there was nothing against Mr. Bosler, an affidavit that was made apparently for the benefit of Bosler), all that evidence, the evidence of Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey upon those questions, advertised the prosecution that Mr. Bosler knew of many circumstances ; that he was present a portion of the time, and I did not know but finally the prosecution would get so much confidence in Mr. Bosler that they would call him. I was hoping they would. They did not. It did not work quite as I expected. That is all there is about that.

Now, there is one further point to which I wish to call your attention. I want you to remember that a partnership is not a conspiracy, although all the facts about a partnership are consistent with the idea of a conspiracy up to a certain point; and all the facts about a conspiracy are consistent with a partnership up to a certain point. The fact that men act together does not show that they have conspired; does not show that they have a wicked design. The fact that they are engaged in the same business does not show that they have a wicked design or that they are there by conspiracy. In other words, I want your minds so that you will distinguish between a fact that may be innocent, and generally is innocent, and a fact that must be evidence of guilt. I want you to distinguish between the facts common to all partnerships, common to all agreements, and those facts that necessarily imply a criminal intent. If you will do that, gentlemen, you will have but little trouble.

[At this point a volume of the report of the trial was handed up to the court by Mr. Ingersoll with a reference to a certain page.]

The COURT. Without looking at the book I take risk of saying that the court never announced its opinion on that question until the case referred to a few moments ago.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I just gave my memory on the subject. It does not make any great difference in this case, of course.

The COURT. This refers to the occasion that I spoke of.

Mr. CARPENTER. This is during the cross-examination of Rerdell.

Mr. INGERSOLL. During that very cross-examination.

Mr. CARPENTER. Your honor expressly decided that we could not produce the books.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Now, gentlemen, what is meant by corroboration? You will hear a great deal before you get through, probably, about corroboration.

The COURT. Yes, the court did state on that occasion:

That is not the point here. If they are allowed to go on and cross-examine this way without the production of the books, they cannot contradict the witness afterwards by producing the books.

Mr. CARPENTER. Further on you discuss the question at considerable length and cite authorities.

Mr. MERRICK. Without reference to what the court may have said, the point is that they could not, according to the principles of law, introduce the books to contradict the secondary evidence after having made it necessary that we should introduce secondary evidence. But they could produce their books to the prosecution and let the prosecution offer them if the prosecution chose to do it.

The COURT. That was exactly the point referred to by the court—that you could not produce the books to contradict the witness after having driven them to secondary evidence.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is what I said.

The COURT. That was the opinion of the court announced then. I had forgotten that I had announced it twice.

Mr. INGERSOLL. If the court please, I did not want to bring this up, because I knew you had, and so I thought I would slip you the book and let you off easy.

The COURT. I do not think it weakens the position at all that the same announcement has been made twice instead of once. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARPENTER. We thought it made it stronger.

The COURT. Still, the books were not produced.

Mr. MERRICK. And not offered.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Now, if the court please, I am not arguing——

The COURT. [Interposing.] I will leave you to the jury.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Your honor knows that I have always shown great modesty about trying to do anything against any decision.

The COURT. I do not dispute that.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Now the next question, gentlemen, is what is meant by corroboration? If you tell a man that he is not a great painter, he does not get angry. He says he does not pretend to paint, or is not a great sculptor. But if you tell him he has no logic, he loses his temper. Yet logic is perhaps the rarest quality of the human mind. There are thousands of painters and sculptors where there is one logician. A man swears, for instance, that he went down to a man's house in the morning at 6 o'clock, and that Mr. Thomas was standing just in front of the house, and when he went in the dog tried to bite him, and that after he got in he had such and such conversation. Now there are thousands of people who have brains of that quality that they think the fact that he did go there at 6 o'clock in the morning, and did see Mr. Thomas standing out in front of the house, and especially the fact that the dog did try to bite him, is a corroboration of the conversation that took place in the house. [Laughter.] There are just such people. In this case, for instance, in Mr. Brady's matter, they say that the fact of Walsh being in his house is important. Suppose that he was, what of it? Is that corroboration? Corroboration must be on the very point in dispute. It must be the very hinge of the question. Then it is corroboration, if the question is what did the man say. It is not corroboration to prove that the man was there unless the man swears that he was not there. Then the inference is drawn that if he would lie about being there he might lie about what he said.

Now, understand me. They will say, for instance, "Here is an affidavit, and these blanks have been filled up. Rerdell says they were filled up, and he says they were filled up after they were sworn to." Now, the fact that the affidavit is there and that the blanks are filled up is not corroboration, because the point to be corroborated is that it was done after it was sworn to. And so the existence of the affidavit, while it is necessary, is no corroboration; the filling up of the blank is no corroboration; its being on file is no corroboration. Why? The point to be corroborated is not that the blanks were filled, but that they were filled after the paper had been sworn to! That is the point. And when they begin to talk to you about corroboration I want you to have it in your minds all the time that to be corroborated about an immaterial matter is nothing; it has nothing to do with the question; but there must be corroboration on the very heart of the point at issue!

There is another thing, gentlemen. It does not make any difference what I say about this man, or that man, or the other man, unless there is reason in what I say. If I tell you that the evidence of a witness is not worthy of belief, I must tell you why. I must give you the reason. If I simply say the witness is a perjurer, that shows that I either under-rate your sense, or have none of my own, because that is not calculated to convince any human mind one way or the other. You are not to take my statement; you are to take the evidence, and such reasons as I give, and only such as appeal to your good sense. If I say, "You must not believe that man," I must give you the reason why. If the reason I give is a good one, you will act upon it. If it is a bad one I cannot make it better by piling epithet upon epithet. There is no logic in abuse; there is no argument in an epithet.

And there is another thing. An attorney has a certain privilege; he is protected by the court. He is given almost absolute liberty of speech, and it is a privilege that he never should abuse. He should remember if he attacks a defendant, that the defendant cannot open his mouth. He should remember that it does not take as much courage to attack, as it does not to attack. He should remember, too, that by the use of epithets, by abuse, that he is appealing to the lowest and basest part of every juror's head and heart. It is on a low level. It is a fight with the club of a barbarian instead of with an intellectual cimeter. There is no logic in abuse. There is no argument in epithet. Remember that. The weight and worth of an argument is the effect it has upon an unprejudiced mind, and that is all it is worth. Therefore I do not want you, gentlemen, to be carried away by any assault that may be made—I do not say that any will be made—but any that may be made, that is not absolutely justified by the evidence.

There has been one little thing said during this trial; that is, about the testimony of defendants. I believe Mr. Bliss takes the ground that you cannot believe a defendant; that defendants cannot be believed unless they are corroborated. Mr. Bliss has the kindness to put the defendants in this case on an equality with his witness Rerdell. Gentlemen, you cannot believe any witness unless his evidence is reasonable. Every witness has to be corroborated by the naturalness of his story. Every witness is to be corroborated by his manner upon the stand and by the thousand little indications that catch the eye of a juror, or of a judge or of an attorney. Congress has passed a law allowing defendants to swear when they are put upon trial. Will you tell me that that law is a net, a snare, and a delusion, and the moment a defendant takes the stand the prosecution is to say, "Of course he will lie?" Why do they say that? Because he is a defendant, and you cannot believe a word that he says; he is swearing in his own behalf. There is that same low, slimy view of human nature again, that a defendant who swears in his own behalf must swear falsely. I do not take that view. The defendant has the same right upon the stand that anybody else has, and if his character is not good his character can be attacked; it can be impeached by the prosecution precisely as you would impeach the reputation of any other witness. If he tells a story which is reasonable you will believe it, and you will believe it notwithstanding he is a defendant and notwithstanding he has an interest in the verdict. In old times they would not allow a man to swear at all if he had the interest of a cent in any civil suit. They would not allow him to testify when he was on trial for his own liberty and his own life. That was barbarism. The enemy—the man who hated him—he could tell his story, but the man attacked, the man defending his own liberty and his own life, his mouth was closed and sealed. We have gotten over that barbarism in nearly all the States of this Union, and now we say, "Let every man tell his story; don't allow any avenue to truth to be closed; let us hear all sides, and whatever is reasonable take as the truth, and what is unreasonable throw away." And, gentlemen, let me say here that it is not your business to go to work picking a witness's testimony all apart and saying, "Well, I guess there is a little scrap now that there is some truth in," or "here is a line, and I guess that is so, but the next eleven lines I do not believe; the next sentence, I think, will do." That is not the way to do. If a witness is of that character you must throw his entire evidence to the winds, for it is tainted and the fountains of justice should not be tainted with such evidence, and a verdict should not be touched and corrupted with such testimony. You will take the evidence of these defendants as you would take that of any other man, and it is for you to say whether that evidence is true. It is for you to say that.

If corroboration was so necessary why were not their witnesses corroborated? Why didn't they call Mr. Bosler to corroborate their witness?

Now, one of the defendants in this case is Mr. John R. Miner, and I want you to think of the terrible things they have against him. One of the charges made against him is that he wrote a petition and wrote in six names attached to it. His explanation is, that if he did anything of that kind it was because he received a petition which was so worn that it could not be presented, and he copied it, and that the six names were found on that petition. There was no other way on earth for him to get those names, and we find them on the same route in, I believe, seven other petitions which were filed; we find that those very names are on the other petitions, and I think Mr. Hall's name—the one the most trouble was made about—was on three or four petitions of the other kind.

Mr. CARPENTER. He admitted that he wrote them.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes; Hall admitted that he wrote them. But I believe this petition was never filed in the department. I think Mr. Woodward said he found it among the papers at some other place.

There is a petition called the Utah petition that has some names in Utah. I think Mr. Woodward swore that he found it in room No. 22 or 23.

Mr. MERRICK. In the case itself, in the department.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes; but it has no file mark. Mr. Woodward says he does not now remember how it got in there. As I was about to remark, there was a petition called the Utah petition with some names of persons living off the route, I believe—two or three sheets. The petition itself was genuine, and was indorsed, I believe, by Senators Slater and Grover and by Congressman Whiteaker. Now, then, how did these names come in there? The petition is ample without those names; large enough. I will tell you what I think. I think that it is a part of another petition, and that it was the result of an accident. I think it was done in the Post Office Department, not intentionally, but as an accident. The evidence is that they kept three routes in one pigeon-hole, and that the papers sometimes got mixed; that is Mr. Brewer's testimony. A very strange thing happened to that petition. While it was before this jury it came apart again. [Laughter.] And if some clerk not absolutely familiar with the papers had taken it up, he would have been just as liable to put it on the wrong petition as on the right one. My plan is to account for a thing in some way consistent with evidence, if I naturally can. I do not go out of my way hunting for evidences of crime. And when there was a petition, large enough, with a plenty of genuine names on it, I cannot imagine anybody would go and get names from any other petition and paste them on to that. But being in this same country, and the testimony being that they had three of these routes in one pigeon-hole, my idea is that the papers got mixed and mingled sometimes, and I say the probability is that it was an accident. That is the best way to account for it. If Miner had known that that petition was there that he had made, would he have allowed it to stay there? Why would he want to do such a thing if he was in a conspiracy with Brady? Why would he have to resort to perjury and interlineation in order to get Brady to make orders that he, Brady, had conspired to make? Absurdity cannot go beyond that. Here is the doctrine: "I have conspired with the Second Assistant Postmaster-General. He will do anything for me that I want. Now, I will go and forge some petitions." That seems to me perfectly idiotic. This petition was indorsed by Senators Grover and Slater and Congressman Whiteaker.

Then, there is another petition; that one I showed you this morning, with the words "schedule thirteen hours," and the evidence was (that is, if you call what Rerdell stated evidence) that Miner wrote the words "schedule thirteen hours." I have shown you, this morning, those words, and without any other particle of argument I want to leave it to you who wrote those words—whether Rerdell wrote them or Miner.

Then, there is another wonderful thing about that petition. It is not on any of the routes in this indictment, and has no business here—I mean the Ehrenberg petition. The one I spoke of was the Kearney and Kent.

The next petition is the Ehrenberg and Mineral Park. They say that there has been some word erased and another written in. Nobody pretends that it is not a genuine petition. Nobody pretends that it was not signed by every one of the persons by whom it purports to be signed. Then, another peculiarity; it is not on any route in this indictment, and has no more to do with this case than the last leaf of the Mormon Bible; not the least.

Let us see if they have any more of these terrible things. Here is petition 2 A, on the Kearney and Kent route. That is the petition that has the words "schedule thirteen hours." That is the one indorsed by Senator Saunders. Petition 18 K, on the route from Ehrenberg to Mineral Park, is not a route in this case. It turned out that the names on it are genuine, and the genuineness of the petition has not been challenged. The only point made is that the word "Ehrenberg" has been written by somebody else. There is no evidence to show that the petition was not properly signed; that the persons on there did not sign their names or authorize somebody else to do it. The probability is there may have been some mistake in the name, or it may have been misspelled. There was some mistake made, and the word "Ehrenberg" was written in. On page 4186 Mr. Miner swears positively that in regard to the petition 2 A he never wrote the words "schedule thirteen hours."

Then, there is another petition, I think it is on page 1247, the Camp McDermitt petition. There are the words "ninety-six hours." And they get that down there to a fine point. Mr. Boone swore that he did not know who wrote the word "ninety," but that Miner wrote the word "six." Well, that is too fine a point, gentlemen, to put on handwriting. It seems there is an interlineation there of the words "ninety-six," and they say they do not know who wrote the word "ninety" and that Miner wrote the word "six." But Miner swears that he did not write it at all.

Now, then, you take away the evidence of Mr. Rerdell as to Miner, and what is left? The evidence left is that of A. W. Moore. And what is that? It is that Miner instructed him to get up false petitions. This was the first time he ever went out. But Moore swore that he made arrangements to do what Miner instructed him to do; that he made such arrangements with Major; but Major swears he did not. Moore swore that he made some arrangement with McBean, and the Government did not ask McBean whether he did or not, but I will show that he did not. The testimony shows that on the first trip, at the time he saw Major, he did not see McBean. Now just see. He swore, in the first place, that he made that arrangement with Major and McBean. I find afterwards that his evidence shows that he did not see McBean on the first trip, but he did see him on the second. On page 1408 we find that when Moore went West the second time—when he left here and had made a bargain with Dorsey for one-quarter interest in his route, and Miner told him to go West and let Dorsey's routes go to the devil, and he said he would, and never notified Dorsey that he was going to do it—that man comes here now and swears that he made a contract with Dorsey for one-quarter interest, and then started West and made a contract with Miner, letting Dorsey's routes go. He did not have the decency to even notify Dorsey that he was going to do so. That is the man. On the first trip he did not agree with anybody about petitions. Now, understand my point, because it kills Mr. Moore again. We have to keep killing these people—keep killing them. It is something like the boy who was found pounding a woodchuck. He was pounding him away in the road with all his might, and a man came along and said to him, "What are you pounding that woodchuck for?" He said, "Oh, I am just pounding him." "But," the man said, "he is dead." "Yes, I know it," said the boy, "but I am pounding him to show him that there is punishment after death." [Laughter.]

Now, on page 1408, we find that this man Moore went to the West a second time. I have shown you that the first time he swears that he did not see McBean at all. He saw Major and made the arrangement with him, he says. Major swears that he did not. They do not put McBean on the stand. Now he goes a second time. He is asked this question:

Q. Then you went and sublet the Miner routes?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How many of them did you sublet?—A. I sublet the Umatilla and Pendleton route.

Q. Did you tell them about how to get up petitions?—A. No, sir; I didn't stop for petitions at all. I was in too big a hurry.

Q. You were in too big a hurry to explain the petition business?—A. Yes, sir.

Now, on the second trip, he says he had nothing to do with the petition business at all, and did not explain the petition business to anybody because he had not the time, and on the first trip did not see McBean at all. And yet he swears that he made an arrangement with McBean about these very petitions. The proof that he did not see McBean on his first trip is found on page 1398.

At this point (1 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the court took its usual recess.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. INGERSOLL. There is one other point about which we have heard an immensity of talk and upon which a great deal of air has been wasted, and that is, that there was a bargain that Brady was to have 50 per cent. of all the fines that he remitted. In other words that he made a bargain with his coconspirators that if he fined them a thousand dollars and then remitted it, that he was to have $500 or one-half of that fine. That is a nice bargain; for me to put myself in the power of a man and say "Now, you fine me what you want to, and then if you will take it off, I will give you half of it." It seems to me that that would be quite an inducement for him to fine me. There was a man bitten by a dog, and there was another man said to him, "I will tell you what to do; what will cure that. You take a little bread and sop it in the blood of the wound and give it to that dog, and you will get well." "Oh, my," he said, "but when the other dogs hear of it, I will be eaten up."

[Laughter.] Yet, here is a man who makes a bargain that Brady may impose a fine upon them and that he may have half of it back—that is, upon their doctrine, although they have never proved it, but they state it just the same as though they had. But here are the facts. Here are the fines and deductions on twelve routes. The fines amount to $89,638.22 and the remissions amount to $7,428.54; that is all. And yet they pretend that we had a bargain. Now, come to the mail routes, and we find that the fines amounted to $61,232.20 and all that they could get their coconspirator to let off of that (although according to the doctrine of the prosecution they were to have 50 per cent.) was $13,850.16. That was all they could get off. There are the figures. There has been talk enough on that subject, but all the air that wraps the earth could not answer those facts. Words enough to wear out all human lips could not change those facts. Fines $89,000, remissions $7,000; fines $61,000, remissions $13,000. And yet they pretend that he had a bargain by which he had 50 per cent. of all he remitted. I need not make any more argument on that point.

The COURT. And that depends, I think, on Walsh's testimony.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes, sir; I will come to Walsh presently. Walsh's testimony was that he was to have half the fines.

The COURT. That is, that Brady told him so?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes, sir. The first charge, as suggested by Judge Wilson, was that he was to refuse to fine; no matter whether they did the service or not, he was to refuse to fine. The evidence is that on twelve of these routes he fined them $89,000. The next evidence is that he was to remit half the money, and he remitted $7,000. Next he agreed not to fine, and he fined $61,000. Then he was to have one-half of the amount, and it was only $13,000. That is not worth arguing, gentlemen.

There have been one or two things in this trial that I have regretted, and one I find in Mr. Ker's speech, and I find frequent reference to it in other places, and that is the blindness of S. W. Dorsey. Affidavits were made by Drs. Marmion, Bliss, and Sowers that Mr. Dorsey had lost at least eleven-twelfths of his vision. And yet it has been constantly thrown out to you that it was a ruse, a device, and I believe Mr. Ker said in his speech that Mr. Dorsey saw a paper in Mr. Merrick's hand, Mr. Merrick, I believe, holding a balance-sheet from the German-American Savings Bank—a paper several feet wide or long—and because Mr. Dorsey said to him, "I believe you have it in your hand," why they said this man is pretending to be blind. His testimony was that he had been in a dark room for three months; that his eyes had not been visited by one ray of light for three months, and that for six months he had not read a solitary word. And yet the prosecution sneeringly pretended that there was nothing the matter with his eyes. They subpoenaed Dr. Marmion, but they dare not put him on the stand. They threw out hints and innuendoes that these doctors had sworn falsely, but they dare not put it to the test. It seems that nothing in the world can satisfy them about Stephen W. Dorsey except to see him convicted, except to have them put their feet upon his neck. Gentlemen, you never will enjoy that pleasure. You never will while the world swings in its orbit find twelve honest men to convict Stephen W. Dorsey—never. This Government may put forth its utmost power; it may spend every dollar in its Treasury; it may hire all the ingenuity and brain of the country, and it can never find twelve men who will put Stephen W. Dorsey in the penitentiary—never, and you might as well give it up one time as another. Try it year after year; poison the mind of the entire public with the newspapers; get all the informers you can; bring all the witnesses you can find; put all of those whom you call accomplices on the stand, and I give you notice that it never can be done, and I want you to know it. Spend your millions, and you will end where you start. As long as the average man runs there will always be one or two honest men in a dozen, so that you cannot convict one of these defendants. Go on, but it will never be accomplished.

There is one other thing which perhaps may be worth noticing. I believe that they proved by Mr. Dorsey that he wrote an account of his relation to this business, and published it in the New York Herald. They asked him if he wrote it or if he authorized it. I believe he said he did; and the only point with which Mr. Merrick quarreled in that entire paper was the statement that Peck was a large contractor, and when Dorsey was put on the stand he explained that while Peck had not many routes in his own name, that he was the partner of a man named Chidester. That is the only thing of which he complained, and yet that communication pretended to tell the relation that Dorsey sustained to this entire business, and if that had not accorded precisely with Dorsey's testimony on the stand every word of it would have been read to you again and again. And Mr. Ker says that letter was written for the purpose of poisoning public opinion. Was the letter of the Attorney-General of the United States, written just before this trial began, written to bias public opinion also?

Mr. MERRICK. Is there any evidence of that letter in this trial? If not I object to any reference to it.

The COURT. You cannot refer to that, because it is not in the case.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I take it back. Was Dickson indicted to bias public opinion?

Mr. MERRICK. I object to that also. He was indicted by the grand jury on competent testimony.

The COURT. There is no evidence in this case that he was indicted.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will take it back then. I would ask the court, however, after the attorney for the Government has said that Dorsey wrote that letter to bias public opinion, if I have not the right to say that he wrote that letter because letters had been written by others.

Mr. MERRICK. Not unless those letters are in proof.

The COURT. The fact that he wrote the letter is in evidence in the case. That of course makes it the proper subject of comment on either side. Anything else not in evidence is not a subject of controversy.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will take it for granted, however, that the jury understands what is going on in this case.

Mr. MERRICK. Yes, they understand the evidence.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I understand that the jury, as members of this community, as citizens of the United States, have at least a vague idea of what the Department of Justice has done.

It is also claimed, and has been claimed, and I have answered it again and again and again, that S. W. Dorsey is the chief conspirator. Why? Is it possible that it is because he was the chief man politically? Is it possible that any politician was envious of his place and power? Is it possible that any politician was envious of the influence he had with President Garfield? Is it possible that he had interfered with the career of some piece of mediocrity? Why is it that he is made the chief figure? These are questions that are asked and questions that you can answer. How does it happen that his name never figures in any division? That his name never figures in any paper made in regard to this business? How does it happen that when he was contending with the German-American National Bank that he must be paid, how is it that it never occurred to Miner or Vaile to tell him, "Why, this is a conspiracy of your own hatching. You advanced this money to give life to your own bantling, and you have got to wait until the conspiracy bears fruit, and if you are not willing to wait you can do the next worst thing, have it made public?" If at that time, when he was opposing and fighting Vaile because he had cut out his security, Vaile had known that Dorsey was in the conspiracy, one word from him and Stephen W. Dorsey's mouth would have remained shut forever. But it did not occur to Miner, it did not occur to Vaile. That won't do. Why didn't Vaile say to him, "Mr. Dorsey, you are making a great deal of fuss about a few thousand dollars. You are in the Senate; you are interested in these routes, and I want to hear no more from you." Why didn't he say it? Because it was not true; that is why.

Now, gentlemen, if what the prosecution claims is true, not only Stephen W. Dorsey, not only Thomas J. Brady, not only John R. Miner, not only H. M. Vaile, and John W. Dorsey are guilty of conspiracy, but hundreds and hundreds of other people. Do you believe it is possible that all the persons who petitioned for an increase of service, who petitioned for expedition—do you believe they were in a conspiracy? Do you believe they were dishonest men, and do you believe they asked for what they did not want? Do you believe that these defendants had at their beck and call the representatives of the entire great Northwest? Do you believe that members of Congress of the Lower House and of the Senate were their agents and tools? Was Senator Hill a conspirator? Was the present Secretary of the Interior a conspirator? Were Senator Grover and Senator Slater also conspirators? Were generals, judges, district attorneys, members of State and Territorial legislatures—were they all conspirators? Did they indorse false petitions for the purpose of putting money in the pockets of these defendants? Let us be honest. Do you believe that General Miles was a conspirator, or that General Sherman, whose title is next to that of the President, and whose name is one synonymous of victory, entered into a conspiracy? Do you believe that he knows as much about the mail business as Colonel Bliss? Do you believe that he knows as much about the wants of the great Northwest as the gentlemen who are prosecuting this case? Was he a conspirator with their Representative in Congress from Oregon? Was Horace F. Page a conspirator? These are questions, gentlemen, that you must answer. Were all these men, these officers of the Army, State officers, Federal officers, and men of national reputation—were they all engaged in a conspiracy; were they endeavoring to assist these defendants in plundering the Treasury of these United States? These are questions for you to ask and questions for you to answer. Is it not wonderful that such a conspiracy should have existed in all the Western States at one time?

Gentlemen, is it wonderful that all the people of the West want mails? Do you not know, and do I not know, that the mail is the substantial benefit we get from the General Government? Don't you know that the mail is the pioneer of civilization? Do you not know that there ought to be a mail wherever the flag floats? Do you not know that the only way to keep a great country like this together, a vast territory of three million square miles—three million five hundred thousand square miles—is by the free distribution of the mail? If you are going to keep the people who populate that territory together, if you are going to keep them of one heart and one mind, if you are going to make them keep step to this Union and to the progress of this nation, you must have frequent intercourse with them all. The telegraph must reach to the remotest hamlet; the little electric spark, freighted with intelligence and patriotism, must visit every home ; and the newspaper and the letter, bearing words of love from home and news from abroad, must visit every house, so that every man, whether digging in the mine or working on the farm, may feel the throb and thrill of the great world, and be a citizen of a mighty nation instead of an ignorant provincial. I am in favor of frequent mails everywhere, all over the plains, all through the mountains, everywhere, wherever the flag flies, I want the man who sits under it to feel that the Government has not forgotten him ; that is what I want. I take pride in this country. I am one of the men who believe that there is only air enough in this entire continent to float one flag. I am one of the men who believe that it is the destiny of the United States to control every inch of soil from the Arctic to the Antarctic, and that when a nation loses its ambition to grow, increase, and expand it begins to die. And what right has a man who is carrying the mail to interfere with the policy of the Post-Office Department ? These are large questions, gentlemen of the jury, and I want you to deal with them in a large and splendid American spirit. I want you to feel that we are citizens of the greatest government on this globe. I want you to feel that here, to every man, no matter from what clime he may come, no matter of what people, no matter of what religion, the soil will give emolument, the sun will give its light and heat, the Government will give its protection. I like to feel that way about the Government. And yet, because the department adopted a splendid and generous policy, it is tortured into evidence of conspiracy.

Now let me speak just a moment about these people—the defendants in this case. First, there is Stephen W. Dorsey. I take a great interest in this case ; I admit it. I would rather lose my right hand than have you convict Stephen W. Dorsey. I admit it. I admit that if he were convicted I would lose confidence in trial by jury ; I would believe that there were no twelve men in the world that had the honor and the manhood to stand by what they believed to be the evidence and the law. I would feel as though trial by jury was a failure. I admit I have that interest in it—all that anybody can have in any case. You can only convict that man by the testimony of A. W. Moore and M. C. Rerdell. That testimony withdrawn from the record and there is not one word against him. I want you to know and I want you to remember what kind of a man he is. You have seen him ; you know him ; and you know something of him. It is for you to decide whether you will take the testimony of Rerdell as against that man. It is for you to decide whether you will take the testimony of A. W. Moore as against that man.

Time hath, my lord, a wallet at his back
Wherein he puts alms for oblivion,
A great-sized monster of ingritudes:
Those scraps are good deeds past: which are devour'd
As fast as they are made, forgot as soon
As done.

These men who are prosecuting him seem to forget who he is and what he has been. Yet men disgrace the position that Stephen W. Dorsey helped to give them by attacking him.

John W. Dorsey can be convicted by the testimony of nobody. There is no testimony against him, except that of one man. He is an honest man. He told exactly what he did, and he told it like an honest man. He told why he did not put his money in the bank at Middlebury, Vermont, because they thought that he owed a debt which he did not think he owed. He need not have told it, but he is an honest man, and that is the reason he told it. The prosecution does not appreciate that kind of man, that is, they say they do not.

The only witnesses against Miner are Rerdell and Moore, and they being dead, that is the end of it.

What evidence is there against Harvey M. Vaile? One witness, Mr. Rerdell. What did Harvey M. Vaile do? At the solicitation of Mr. Miner he advanced money to prevent his having a failing contract. What else did he do? He wrote a letter saying that he was trustee for S. W. Dorsey, and he was, because the concern owed S. W. Dorsey a few thousand dollars, and agreed out of the profits to repay Stephen W. Dorsey. That is all. That is all. You have seen Mr. Vaile here from day to day. You know that he is a man of mind. I think he is an honest man. I think he testified to the exact truth. He did what any other man had the right to do, he helped a man, not entirely from charity, but believing after all that it might be a good investment, as you have done if you have ever had the opportunity. And there is not the slightest scintilla of evidence against him, not the slightest. I believe every word that he testified, and so do you.

And then they come to Thomas J. Brady, and they tell you that that man is to be convicted upon the testimony of whom? Mr. Walsh. And who else? Mr. Rerdell. You have some idea of human nature. You have a little and I have a little. Here is Mr. Walsh, an athlete; a man who, had he lived in Rome in ancient times, might have been a gladiator. [Laughter.] He loans Mr. Brady twenty-five thousand or thirty thousand dollars. For some of this money he has notes, for other portions he has not. He sends word to Brady that he would like to fix the interest. He goes there and Brady takes these notes and puts them in his pocket and they part as philosophers. If we believe that, we must believe it as idiots. You do not believe it. You do not believe any man ever allowed another to take $25,000 in notes belonging to him and put them in his pocket and walk off, he taking off his hat at the door and you bowing and wishing him a happy voyage. [Laughter.] My mind is so constructed that I cannot believe that; I cannot help it. I imagine your minds are built a little after the same model. I do not believe the story; you do not.

What is the next witness against Mr. Brady? Mr. Rerdell. It is sufficient for me to speak the name. I need argue no further. That is enough. You saw Mr. Brady on the stand and you heard him give his testimony. No man could listen to it without knowing it to be true. I say now to each one of you that when you heard it you believed it, and every one of you believed it was the truth. Take from this record the testimony of Rerdell, Walsh, and Moore, and what is left? Some papers, petitions, orders, affidavits, all made, signed, and filed in the cloudless light of day. That is all that is left. Where is your conspiracy? Faded into thin air, nothing left.

I presume it will be said by the prosecution that I spent about three days on Mr. Rerdell. I admit it. Why? Because I regarded Rerdell as your case. Because I made up my mind that when I killed Rerdell the case had breathed its last. That is the reason. And had it been necessary to spend a few weeks more I should have done so. But it is not necessary. Probably I wasted a great deal of time upon the subject, but if he is not dead I do not want it in the power of any human being to say that it was my fault. I went at him with intent to kill, and I kept at him after I knew that he was dead. [Laughter.] I admit it.

Now, gentlemen, let us see what I have proved. Let us see what up to this time I have substantiated in my judgment. First, I think I have shown that John W. Dorsey, John M. Peck, and John R. Miner agreed in 1877, to go into the mail business. That Peck wrote a letter to Stephen W. Dorsey, who was then a United States Senator, asking him to get some competent man to get reliable information as to the cost of service on routes in the Western States and Territories then advertised by the General Government. That S. W. Dorsey gave that letter to A. E. Boone. That he told him to say nothing about it to other contractors. That Boone sent out circulars for the purpose of getting the requisite information; that is, the cost of corn and oats and the wages of men.

That John R. Miner came to Washington on the 1st of December, 1877. That he went to the house of Stephen W. Dorsey, as had been the custom for several years. That he occupied a room in that house, and that he and Mr. Boone went on with the business of making proposals and getting up forms of contracts.

That John W. Dorsey came here in the early part of January, 1878. That after his arrival the partnership was formed between him and A. E. Boone, and that the partnership was dated the 15th day of January, 1878.

That S. W. Dorsey, at the request of his brother and brother-in-law, advanced the amount of money necessary to pay incidental expenses. That he gave his advice whenever it was asked. That he assisted the parties all that he conveniently could.

That the last bids or proposals were put in by these parties on the 2d of February, 1878. That the awards were made on the 15th day of March of the same year. That Miner, Peck, Dorsey, and Boone received about five times as many awards as they had anticipated. Thereupon another partnership was formed with the style of Miner, Peck & Co., and that the partners in this firm were John R. Miner, John M. Peck, and John W. Dorsey. That thereupon John W. Dorsey and John R. Miner went West for the purpose of subcontracting the routes. That John R. Miner on his return from the West met Stephen W. Dorsey at Saint Louis about the 16th of July, 1878. That Stephen W. Dorsey up to that time had advanced eight thousand or nine thousand dollars. That he then gave to Mr. Miner notes amounting to about $8,500 to be by him discounted at the German-American National Bank of Washington. That Stephen W. Dorsey then told Miner that he would advance no more and would indorse no more. That Stephen W. Dorsey went from Saint Louis to New Mexico; that John R. Miner came to the city of Washington, arriving here about the 20th of July. That John R. Miner then found that service in Eastern Oregon was not in operation, although it had been subcontracted; but he then applied to Thomas J. Brady for an extension of time. That Brady refused to give it. That Miner, Peck & Co. had not the money to stock the routes not then in operation, and that Stephen W. Dorsey had refused to advance further means. That John W. Dorsey was then in the West and that John M. Peck was then in New Mexico. That thereupon Mr. Miner applied to Harvey M. Vaile, and that Mr. Vaile went to Mr. Brady and asked whether an extension of time could be given, provided he undertook to put the service on those routes. That Brady then gave him until the 16th day of August, 1878. That thereupon Miner, under the authority of powers of attorney from John M. Peck and John W. Dorsey, agreed upon the terms on which H. M. Vaile should advance the money necessary to put the service in operation.

That the contract bears date the 16th day of August, 1878, and was duly executed by all the parties on the last of September or first of October of that year.

That the service was not in operation by the 16th of August, and that in August Brady telegraphed to H. M. Vaile to know what routes he was going to put service on.

That thereupon Vaile replied that he would see that all the service of Miner, Peck, and Dorsey was put in operation. That through the assistance of Mr. Vaile the service was put in operation.

That before that time Stephen W. Dorsey had been secured by Miner, Peck, and John W. Dorsey executing Post-Office drafts upon the routes that had been awarded to them.

That on the 17th day of May, 1878, an act was passed by the Congress of the United States allowing subcontractors to place their subcontracts on file.

That after Vaile came in and agreed to furnish the money necessary to put the service in operation, John R. Miner having powers of attorney from Peck and John W. Dorsey, executed to H. M. Vaile subcontracts for the purpose of securing him for the money he had advanced.

That H. M. Vaile put these subcontracts on file, thus cutting out and rendering worthless as security the Post-Office drafts that had been given to S. W. Dorsey for the purpose of securing him.

That John W. Dorsey returned from the Bismarck and Tongue River route in November, 1878, and that he then offered to sell out his entire interest in the business to Vaile for $10,000, and left instructions authorizing his brother, S. W. Dorsey, to make such sale for such amount. That John W. Dorsey then returned to the Tongue River route.

That Stephen W. Dorsey returned to Washington in December, 1878, and for the first time found that the subcontracts had been given to Vaile. That he and Mr. Vaile had a quarrel with the German-American National Bank on that question.

That afterwards Dorsey was to give $10,000 to John W. Dorsey, and $10,000 to John M. Peck. That he then concluded not to do so.

That on the 4th day of March, when S. W. Dorsey's Senatorial term expired, he immediately wrote a letter to Brady insisting that the subcontracts that had been filed by Vaile were in fraud of his rights. That thereupon the parties in interest came together. That S. W. Dorsey acting for Peck, his brother, and himself agreed with Vaile and Miner to a division of the routes.

That S. W. Dorsey paid Peck $10,000 for his interest, paid John W. Dorsey $10,000 for his interest, and took substantially 30 per cent. of the routes, and paid himself the money that was owing to him by Miner, Peck & Co.

That the parties at the time executed to each other subcontracts and such other papers as were necessary to vest, as far as they then under the law could vest, the routes so divided in the parties to whom they fell.

That on the 5th of May, 1879, the division was completed, and that from that time forward Vaile and Miner had no interest in the routes that fell to Stephen W. Dorsey, and that from that time forward Stephen W. Dorsey had no interest in the routes that fell to Vaile and Miner, and that John W. Dorsey and John M. Peck had no interest in any route from that date forward until the present moment. That S. W. Dorsey took entire and absolute control of his routes, and that Miner and Vaile took entire control of their routes. That from that time until the present neither party interfered with the routes of the other.

That Vaile and Miner made no paper of any sort, character, or kind for Stephen W. Dorsey after the 5th of May, 1879, and that neither John W. Dorsey, nor John M. Peck, made any papers of any kind, sort, or character for Miner or Vaile after that date, no matter what date papers bear that were made before that time. That S. W. Dorsey made no papers for Miner or Vaile after that date. And that Miner and Vaile made no papers for S. W. Dorsey after that date, May 5, 1879. That all the papers bearing date after the 5th of May, were in fact signed by the parties at or before that time. That they were so signed for the purpose of making the division complete.

That Vaile and Miner on their routes got up petitions that they had a right to do. That S. W. Dorsey upon his routes got up petitions, as he had a right to do.

That the routes were increased and expedited by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General in accordance with the policy of the department and in accordance with the petitions filed and the affidavits made, as he had a right to do.

That it was not for the contractors to settle the policy of the Post-Office Department.

That the evidence of A. W. Moore is unworthy of belief, and that his statement that he settled with S. W. Dorsey is demonstrated to be false by the receipts that he afterwards gave in final settlement to John R. Miner, as admitted by himself. That his testimony as to the existence of a conspiracy is rendered worthless and absurd by the fact that he sold out not only his interest but his services up to that time for $682. That his conversations with Miner could not have taken place. That he never made or offered to make such contracts with Major as he pretended he was instructed to make, and as he swore that he did make. That his conversation with S. W. Dorsey never occurred.

That the testimony of Rerdell is utterly and infinitely unworthy of credit. That he is not only contradicted by all the evidence, but by himself, and how can you corroborate a man who tells no truth? There must be something to be corroborated.

That the red books never existed.

That the pencil memorandum was forged by himself.

That the Chico letter was written by him.

And that the letter from Dorsey to Bosler, said to have been dated May 13, 1879, was born of the imagination of Mr. Rerdell.

That Rerdell's letter to Bosler of the 22d of May, 1880, was never sent, was never received, and was never written until after this man made up his mind to become a witness for the Government. That Bosler never received that letter, nor the letter pretended to have been written by Dorsey on the 13th of May, 1879.

That the tabular statement in which 33½ per cent. was allowed to Brady never existed. That Rerdell did not visit Dorsey's office in New York in June, 1881, and that he had no conversation with Torrey. That Rerdell was not there. That he did not have the conversation detailed by him with Dorsey at the Albemarle Hotel. That Dorsey did not write the letter of the 13th of June, 1881.

That Rerdell swore in June, 1881, that Dorsey was entirely innocent. That he swore to three affidavits of the same kind. That he again swore to the same thing on the 13th of July, 1882. That he admitted by his letter of July 5, 1882, that S. W. Dorsey did not even ask him to make the affidavit of June, 1881, but that he was persuaded to do it by James W. Bosler. That he was not locked up at Willard's Hotel. That he was not threatened with a prosecution for perjury. That he was not shown the letters he had written to a woman. That the whole story with regard to the making of that affidavit was utterly and unqualifiedly false. That he never had the conversation with Thomas J. Brady that he claimed. That Brady never suggested to him to have any books copied. That there were no books of Dorsey's that needed to be copied. That he did not see S. W. Dorsey draw any money at Middleton's bank at the time he states. That he, Rerdell, drew the money himself. And that his entire testimony is absurd, contradictory, and utterly unworthy of credit.

Let me say another thing to you, gentlemen, right here. It would be better a thousand times that all the defendants tried in the next hundred years should escape punishment than that one man should be convicted upon the evidence of a man like this—a man who offered to the Government to make a bargain while the trial was in progress, that he would challenge from the jury all the friends of the defendants, and help the Government to get the enemies of the defendants upon the jury. You never can afford to take the evidence of such a man. It turns a court-house into a den of wild beasts. You cannot do it.

I have shown that the story of Walsh is improbable, and that all that Boone swears against these defendants cannot be believed. That Walsh never loaned the money to Brady that he claimed, and that Brady never took from him the notes as he says. That Brady never made in his presence the admissions that he swears to. Think of it; Brady robbing Walsh, and at the same time saying to Walsh, "I am a thief and public robber."

I have shown to you, gentlemen, it seems to me, that no reasonable human being, taking all this evidence into consideration, can base upon it a verdict of guilty. It cannot be done.

Now, gentlemen, the responsibility is upon you, and what is that responsibility? You are to decide a question involving all that these defendants are. You are to decide a question involving all these defendants hope to be. Their fate is in your hands. Everything they love, everything they hold dear, is in your power. With this fearful responsibility upon you you have no right to listen to the whispers of suspicion. You have no right to be guided or influenced by prejudice. You have no right to act from fear. You must act with absolute and perfect honesty. You must beware of prejudice. You must beware of taking anything into consideration except the sworn testimony in this case. You must not be controlled by the last word instead of by the last argument! You must not be controlled by the last epithet instead of by the last fact. You must give to every argument, whether made by defendant or prosecution, its full and honest weight. You must put the evidence in the scales of your judgment and your manhood must stand at the scales, and then you must have the courage to tell which side goes down and which side rises. That is all we ask. We ask the mercy of an honest verdict, and of your honest opinion. We ask the mercy of a verdict born of your courage, a verdict born of your sense of justice, a verdict born of your manhood, remembering that you are the peers of any in the world. And it is for you to say, gentlemen, whether these defendants are worthy to live among their fellow-citizens; whether they shall be taken from the sunshine and from the free air, and whether they are worthy to be men among men.

It is for you to say whether they are to be taken from their homes, from their pursuits, from their wives, from their children. That responsibility rests upon you.

It is for you to say whether they shall be clothed in dishonor, whether they shall be clad in shame, whether their day of life shall set without a star in all the future's sky ; that is for you.

It is for you to say whether Stephen W. Dorsey, John W. Dorsey, John R. Miner, Thomas J. Brady, and H. M. Vaile shall be branded as criminals.

It is for you to say, after they have suffered what they have, after they have been pursued by this Government as no defendants were ever pursued before, whether they shall be branded as criminals.

It is for you to say whether their homes shall be blasted and blackened by the lightning of a false verdict.

It is for you to say whether there shall be left to these defendants and to those they love, a future of agony, of grief and tears. Nothing beneath the stars of heaven is so profoundly sad as the wreck of a human being. Nothing is so profoundly mournful as a home that has been covered with shame—a wife that is worse than widowed—children worse than orphaned. Nothing in this world is so infinitely sad as a verdict that will cast a stain upon children yet unborn.

It is for you to say, gentlemen, whether there shall be such a verdict, or whether there shall be a verdict in accordance with the evidence and in accordance with law.

And let me say right here that I believe the attorneys for the prosecution, eager as they are in the chase, excited with the hunt, after the sober second thought, would be a thousand times better pleased with a verdict of not guilty. Of course they want victory. They want to put in their cap the little feather of success, and they want you to give in the scales of your judgment greater weight to that feather than to the homes and wives and children of these defendants. Do not do it. Do not do it.

I want a verdict in accordance with the evidence. I want a verdict in accordance with the law. I want a verdict that will relieve my clients from the agony of two years. I want a verdict that will drive the darkness from the heart of the wife. I want a verdict that will take the cloud of agony from the roof and the home. I want a verdict that will fill the coming days and nights with joy. I want a verdict that, like a splendid flower, will fill the future of their lives with a sense of thankfulness and gratitude to you, gentlemen, one and all.

The COURT. Let me inquire of the counsel for the defense if there are to be any other arguments upon their side.

Mr. HENKLE. May it please your honor, inasmuch as I alone represent two of the defendants, it is perhaps due to this jury and to myself to explain why I do not propose to argue the case. I had prepared myself, with a good deal of labor and painstaking, to submit an argument to the jury. But after the exhaustive and able argument of my Brother Wilson, I and my colleagues were of the opinion that there was room but for one more argument on the part of the defense, and with entire unanimity we selected our colleague, Brother Ingersoll, to make that argument. And how grandly he has justified the choice, the jury, your honor, and the spectators will determine.

I saw some time ago a little paragraph in a paper in this city, which represents the interest of the Government, in which it was said that the defendants' counsel were afraid to argue this case because they would come in collision with each other ; that each would try to throw the conspiracy at the door of the others and exonerate himself, and that therefore they were afraid to argue the case. I want to say to your honor that so far from being afraid to argue the case, I should have been very happy to pursue the argument, so far as I am concerned. But out of tender consideration to the jury, who have been kept for six long months from their business and their interests, which I know are suffering, we have unanimously concluded that we would close the argument with that which your honor has just heard. And I simply want to say further, that I not only do not antagonize with anything that has been said by my Brother Wilson, or by my eloquent friend who has just concluded, but I indorse most fully and cordially every word that has been uttered. And so far as my clients are concerned, gentlemen of the jury, the case is with you.

Mr. DAVIDGE. May it please your honor, perhaps I ought to add a single word. It was understood among counsel when Colonel Ingersoll, as stated by General Henkle, was unanimously selected to represent the defendants, that both Colonel Ingersoll and myself should have the privilege of addressing the jury if, in the judgment of either, it should be necessary. I have felt such a deep interest in the present case that I have almost hoped he might leave unoccupied some portion of the field of argument. I have listened to every word that has fallen from his lips. He has filled the whole area of the case with such matchless ability and eloquence that I have no ground upon which I could stand in making any further argument. He has so fully uncovered the origin of this so-called prosecution, its methods, and the character and weight of the evidence upon which a conviction is sought, that I can add nothing whatever to what he has said. I need not add that every syllable he has uttered receives my grateful indorsement, as well as that of all the defendants and their counsel in this cause.

The COURT. The arguments for the defendants are closed, therefore?

Mr. DAVIDGE. Yes.

The COURT. I shall expect the Government to commence the closing argument on Monday.

Mr. MERRICK. I hope it will not be long after Monday when I shall finish. I shall, of course, be ready to proceed on Monday.

The COURT. I cannot hope for a very brief argument from you, because you have a great deal of matter to consider.

Mr. MERRICK. I do not think I shall occupy a very long time.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Well, they have all said that, upon both sides.

Mr. MERRICK. There is a great deal in number to answer, but not a great deal in quantity.

The COURT. I shall be agreeably disappointed if the argument is brief.

Mr. CARPENTER. Presuming that it will be agreeable to Mr. Merrick not to begin his argument until Monday, I hope the court will now adjourn.

The COURT. I should not ask him to go on at present. It is Friday afternoon, and is now 20 minutes past 3.

Mr. MERRICK. I am much obliged.

The COURT. Adjourn the court until Monday morning.

Thereupon (at 3 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the further hearing of this case was adjourned until 11 o'clock Monday morning, May 28, 1883.

MONDAY, MAY 28, 1883.

The court met at 11 o'clock.

Present, counsel for the Government and for the defendants.

HON. RICHARD T. MERRICK addressed the jury on behalf of the prosecution, as follows :

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR HONOR, AND GENTLEMEN OF THE JURY: This case has been so elaborately and ably argued on both sides, and those arguments have gone so much and so thoroughly into all the minutiae of the facts, that it will be hardly necessary for me to spend much time in dealing with them. I propose to submit or to spread this case before you in such a manner, by a generalization of the facts, together with an enunciation and application of the principles of law, that each one of you will fully understand it from the beginning to the end. In performing this duty I shall deal with you in the same spirit of candor, frankness, and earnest sincerity which I believe you, the people among whom I live, recognize as the controlling rule of my conduct in all the transactions of my life. I shall shrink from nothing that, in my judgment, I ought to say or ought to do, and shall speak without regard to counsel or parties or consequences, and whilst I shall call things by their proper names, after I have shown what they are, I shall carefully abstain from straining any point of law or overstating any fact even in the estimation of a hair, for the purpose of showing guilt where I do not sincerely and without a doubt believe it to be.

I declared in open court before the last trial of this case, that, as an Assistant Attorney-General, representing the United States in this prosecution, I should, when the evidence was concluded, frankly and openly announce the fact as to any and each of the defendants in regard to whose guilt that evidence left any doubt upon my mind. In conformity with this declaration, and in execution of what I regarded as my duty, I did at that trial, after the evidence was closed, and after I came to argue the case, request the jury to bring in a verdict of acquittal as to William H. Turner. This was accordingly done. That verdict, which is before you, found M. C. Rerdell and John R. Miner guilty as indicted, and the jury failed to agree as to the other defendants. On the motion for a new trial I said to the court that I did not deem it consistent with the dignity of the United States that such a verdict should stand upon the records of one of its courts. It was a verdict convicting the subordinates but withdrawing in craven fear the hand of justice from the masters. The verdict was set aside and no longer stains by its cowardice or corruption the records of the court, and the case is now before you for trial as though it had never been tried before.

On the threshold of this argument, in view of the evidence in the case, its clear, distinct, and unequivocal character, acting on behalf of the Government of the United States, and in the name of the whole people of the United States, I demand from you a verdict of guilty against all these defendants.

The counsel for the defendants who last addressed the jury with so much eloquence, said, in a tone of warning, which he would have been wiser had he heeded himself, that there is no logic in abuse, that there is no argument in epithet, and that the weight and worth of an argument is the effect it has upon an unprejudiced mind. I agree with the counsel entirely, and will add that there is no logic in appeals to a jury in behalf of a prisoner's wife and home, and that there is no reasoning in tropes and metaphors and figures of speech. The prisoners wives and homes are not on trial. The prisoners themselves, and they alone, are on trial, and to attempt to assail the heart of the jury by tears and tear-provoking pathos is the ingenious device of an advocate conscious that he cannot reach the mind of the jury by reasoning upon the law and the facts, and appreciating that he cannot constrain sound and solid judgment by legitimate argument.

The counsel have ascribed to us the anxiety and the heat that belongs to a contest where victory is the ultimate end and object. He said we want a little feather of success, and that we want you to give, in the scales of justice, greater weight to that feather than to the homes and wives and children of these defendants. If he supposes that in the performance of my solemn duty in this case I am moved by sentiments of ambition and vanity to gain a triumph against justice he greatly mistakes and unjustly wrongs my character. The end I seek here is simple justice, plain, cold, stern, and unadorned. A contest for victory and feathers to decorate counsel in such a case as this when a great Government is seeking to vindicate the majesty of its outraged laws and protect its people by punishing crime should be beneath the thoughts of a man whose heart can throb with the noble sentiments that ought to inspire every American citizen. But what does he mean by saying that we want that feather to outweigh in the scales of justice the homes, the wives, and the children of the defendants? What have feathers and wives and children and homes to do in those scales? What have decorations and tears, maudlin tears, or even tears of blood from the heart, to do in those scales? Cast all these things out, gentlemen, they are temptations held up to you, and beckoning you on to infamy and disgrace. The scales of justice must contain nothing but the cold and naked facts and the rules of law as given to you by the court, and they must be held up with a firm and rigid arm and the balance noted with an unmoved heart by a clear and steady eye, unmoistened by tears and uninflamed by passion. Thus and thus only can you discharge with honesty and to the satisfaction of your consciences the solemn duty imposed upon you by the law of the land. See when you hold up these scales that on neither the one side nor the other shall there be any make-weight against what they ought properly to contain. We may sorrow, we may grieve, we may weep for affliction, but our sorrow, our grief, and our weeping are not for the solemn offices that belong to a jury. It is true there is hardly a more melancholy spectacle than a man wrecked and a home blackened and hearts crushed; but who wrecked the man, who blackened the home, who crushed the hearts? Not the verdict of the jury, but the commission of the crime which the jury by its verdict under oath finds that the defendant has committed. Appreciation of the dignity and obligations of virtue and performance of duty under the law should be always present to a man when he is in safety. It comes too late when he stands before a jury. It is the inevitable law that where guilt is sorrow shall answer it. If the husband and father brings guilt upon himself that instant sorrow that follows guilt and guilt blackens the home and crushes the heart. It is not your verdict that does the work. It is the crime that does the work. It is better a defendant's home should be blackened, better that hearts there should be crushed, than that by a verdict which speaks your sympathies and not your judgment you should commit a yet higher crime and give to conscience the stinging voice of an eternal and ceaseless remorse.

I have said, using nearly the language of counsel, that there is hardly anything more melancholy than a home blackened and destroyed. But there is one thing sadder still, one thing which must appeal more earnestly to thoughtful men and to the hearts of all who love their country. It is to see a country moving downward to destruction, as manifested by the impossibility of obtaining a jury to convict a criminal because of his high standing and social position. The saddest thing on earth for me would be to realize the fact that in this tribunal, or any tribunal of justice, there should appear such a degree of corruption or weakness in the hearts of the people that the voice of their Government demanding retributive justice for crime should be hushed by appeals for sympathy for wife and children.

The counsel further says that Stephen W. Dorsey can never be convicted, and adds this defiance to the Government:

This Government may put forth its utmost power; it may spend every dollar in its Treasury; it may hire all the ingenuity and brain of the country; and it can never find twelve men who will put Stephen W. Dorsey in the penitentiary—

Never find twelve men that will put Stephen W. Dorsey in the penitentiary! Then he continues—never, and you might as well give it up one time as another. Try it year after year; poison the mind of the entire public with the newspapers; get all the informers you can; bring all the witnesses you can find; put all of those whom you call accomplices on the stand, and I give you notice that it never can be done, and I want you to know it. Spend your millions, and you will end where you start. As long as the average man runs there will always be one or two honest men in a dozen, so that you cannot convict one of these defendants. Go on, but it will never be accomplished.

What does this rodomontade mean? The great figure standing out in it all is Stephen W. Dorsey. You may put other men in the penitentiary, you may convict other men of their crimes, but you can never convict Stephen W. Dorsey. His prominence places him beyond the reach of justice, away up above ordinary men and even above the law—places him where the very tips of the fingers of the hand of justice cannot soil his sacred robes by a touch.

It is emphasized when the counsel adds:

These men who are prosecuting him—

Stephen W. Dorsey—

seem to forget who he is and what he has been. Yet men disgrace the position that Stephen W. Dorsey helped to give them by attacking him.

We who are prosecuting Stephen W. Dorsey forget who he is and what he has been. What of it, in a court of justice, that a man has been high; what of it, in a court of justice, that a man has intellect and power? Why should we remember who he is or what he has been? What have you to do with what he has been or who he is? Your task is with him as you find him at the bar of justice, arraigned by his country for crimes against her laws. If you should remember what he has been, it ought to be a memory stimulating you the stronger on the act of justice. The low and the needy, the homeless and the starving may violate the law, and may be led astray by their associations and surroundings. Their love of life is little; their love of country is little. They pass on to the place of doom and expiation without a murmur or sigh from any one. But is not their crime less than the crime of him who has been raised by the voice of his country to high position, and robed by the people in that sacred mantle which it should be his pride and glory to preserve pure and unspotted? Is the crime of these myriads less than the crime of that intellect which the people chose to guide them and help to make their laws, when the possessor of that intellect in his high position forgets the sacred trust the people gave and violates the solemn obligations that he took when he entered upon the people's service? It is painful to see a great man fall; painful to see a great mind corrupted and poisoned by immorality and crime. But it is sadder still to see a jury let him go unwhipped of justice because he was a great man.

Counsel gave some loud outburst of patriotic devotion to his country and its liberty. I cannot rave with him. In my heart of hearts I cherish for that country and that liberty as earnest a love as any man that walks upon its soil or looks up to its flag. But if the judicial power of that country is made only for the low and humble of our land, I would tear its flag to tatters and trample its constitution under my feet. I believe in the equality of human rights before the law. No man is high enough to put his head in the heavens where the hand of justice cannot reach him. Thank God! my country is not yet on that downward way.

Your verdict may possibly mark an epoch. Your verdict must and will mark an epoch in one of two events. If, yielding to sympathy, you should grant all that the eloquent counsel has asked, it will mark a very sad epoch. It will also mark an epoch in another direction; it will designate a period of time when official peculation shall have been sanctioned instead of being denounced by law. Acquit these defendants, and all the rings of the time will accept the acquittal as their charter to assail the Treasury of the people. Convict them—but mark you, only on the facts—and from the temple of justice throughout the whole land goes the ringing sound, “official peculation shall answer for its crime, and henceforth honor and integrity in office are declared to be the rule of conduct and the moral code of America.”

But what does the counsel mean when he says that two or three honest men can be found on the jury that will never convict the defendants. I will not speculate about his possible meaning, but it may be that he reasons that what has been done once can be done again and repeated indefinitely. I think not, gentlemen; I think not.

What did he mean by a Government disgracing itself by prosecuting such a man as Stephen W. Dorsey? He says:

These men who are prosecuting him seem to forget who he is and what he has been. Yet men disgrace the position that Stephen W. Dorsey helped to give them by attacking him.

Is an effort by a citizen to help a man to the Presidential office to condone the crime of that citizen? Does the counsel mean that Garfield disgraced his position, which Dorsey helped him to get, by putting this investigation on foot and directing its prosecution through his Attorney-General, MacVeagh? Does he mean that Arthur, Garfield's successor, disgraces his position by prosecuting Dorsey for his crimes through his Attorney-General, Brewster? Are two administrations disgraced because they prosecute Stephen W. Dorsey? Gentlemen of the jury, my humble judgment and my candid and earnest sentiment is that they would be disgraced if they had not done it. All honor, then, to these slandered men—all honor to Garfield in his grave—all honor to Arthur, the Chief Magistrate of the nation,—who rising above political prejudices, beyond individual preference and personal affection, have, from a simple sense of the obligations of their high office, prosecuted for their crimes against the law the man that helped them to get that office. In the performance of that duty their tears may flow, their hearts may bleed; but, it is a proud and pleasant thought that our country has officers whose judgments and sense of duty are not beguiled or stained by considerations of love or hatred, friendship or antipathy. Do you so, likewise.

But to recur for a moment to the counsels warning given to the Government, and to his gauntlet thrown down before this jury, that Dorsey would never be convicted! I take it up. I may never try this case again. I hold that gauntlet till this trial is over, and it may be longer, but I hope not—I trust not—I believe not. But I tell the gentleman that this effort to secure justice will be pursued so long as this Government lives in an atmosphere of purity.

Mr. INGERSOLL. We will be there.

Mr. MERRICK. No, sir; after this verdict is rendered you will be somewhere else.

Mr. INGERSOLL. No, sir.

Mr. MERRICK. Now, gentlemen, I will proceed to show my reason for my belief in the guilt of Stephen W. Dorsey and of the other defendants. I may have to carry you to the grave of Rerdell, and if I cannot make you hear him from the sod, I may make another grave by his side which will call the learned counsel to his favorite entertainment, of lachrymose lamenting at a funeral. [Laughter.]

The COURT. The audience must preserve order. No laughing.

Mr. MERRICK. Gentlemen of the jury, it becomes imperative upon me to tax your patience by a somewhat dry discussion. We have been so long in this argument; you have listened to so much that was entertaining and interesting in the profoundly learned and able addresses of my Brothers Ker and Bliss in reference to the minutiae and details of the facts; and you have heard so much of the resounding eloquence of Mr. Ingersoll, that I feel that I ought in justice to you and to the case to call you back for a little while to the principles and rules that lie at its foundation. And when I have done that I shall take up such facts, generalized, as I think you desire to hear discussed, and go over them with as much brevity and conciseness as I can, having all the while a due and sympathetic regard for your much-burdened patience.

First, I propose to say something of Mr. Brady, only as incidental, however, in the first part of my argument, to the laws which contained his grants of official power and which constituted the limitations upon his trust. I believe, gentlemen, that you have heard nothing of these laws since December's snows saw you called into this box and December's blast beat against that window; and now, in the spring time, near the month of roses, it is wise to recall your attention to them, in view of the natural lapses of the memories of ordinary men.

I submit, in the first place, that the policy of the law of the United States in reference to the letting of mail contracts always was, still is, and always ought to be, that there shall be allowed, with a view to the rights of the citizens and the economical administration of the department, free competition for contracts all over the country.

And here I make one remark, to which I may recur in the course of my suggestions to you in reference to public policy. You have heard a good deal about the policy of the Government, about the policy of the department, and about the Jewellian policy. And you have seen a great deal in reference to the Bradyian policy. What is the policy of the Government; of the department? Who makes it? How do you ascertain it? Where do you go to find it out? His honor will tell you that the policy of a government or of a department is the rule prescribed by statute, and that when you want to enlarge the rule prescribed by statute—for a statute is a condensed expression of the legislative will—you must go to that statute, and from that expression of legislative will thus condensed, draw your policy. No man in America can make a policy. No department can make a policy. It is for the legislative department, and that alone, to make a policy. Otherwise the lesser instrumentalities of governmental machinery might override the legislative will by creating a habit against the law and calling it a policy. Statutes, and statutes alone, are the sources to which we must look to find the policy of the Government and the policy of any department of the Government. I submit that the statute provides that all mail lettings shall be by public advertisement; and the policy derived from that law is this: that every citizen of the United States—you, every member of the jury, and I—should have an opportunity, each for his own individual benefit, if he desires, to enter upon that field of enterprise, to compete for the contract under a public advertisement; and that, for the benefit of the Government, we should all have the right to compete in order that economy in the administration of the department may be preserved by getting the work done at the lowest price. The policy then, derived from that law, which I will presently read to you, was double—a policy looking, first, to the citizen, inviting the citizens to come in and bid, the one against the other, each on an equal footing, and with special and unfair advantage to none. The policy was for the benefit of the Government in order that by competition the Government should have its contracts executed at the lowest price. Section 3941 of the Revised Statutes—in which Revised Statutes, as you are aware, gentlemen, are embodied the laws of the United States existing from the organization of our Government, and still remaining in force—provides as follows:

The Postmaster-General shall cause advertisements of all general mail lettings of each State and Territory to be conspicuously posted up in each post-office in the State and Territory embraced in said advertisements for at least sixty days before the time of such general letting.

There is the rule of law, and there is the policy. I believe such has been the policy of the Government from its organization down to the present day. The exceptions I will call your attention to presently. The statute now operative makes some changes of an immaterial character. Another section (3949) provides that:

All contracts for carrying the mail shall be in the name of the United States, and shall be awarded to the lowest bidder tendering sufficient guarantees for faithful performance.

The lowest bidder in the competition shall have the contract. The competition is for the benefit of the citizen, the lowest bidder, as well as for the benefit of the United States. And that the lowest bidder should have the contract, is the policy, for the benefit of the United States, with a view to the economical administration of the department. It was designed that everything in regard to these contracts should be open, public, and in the full light of day. Where there was failure to execute the contract as originally made, the department had the right to suspend such contract; and where the service was needed, to engage temporary service without advertisement. But since the date of the law that I have read, there is a provision giving wider powers for advertisement than in the law as it originally stood.

Section 3946—and I do not think there is any modification of that section—provides that:

Each bid for carrying the mail shall hereafter have affixed to it the oath of the bidder, taken before an officer qualified to administer oaths, that he has the pecuniary ability to fulfill his obligations, and that the bid is made in good faith and with the intention to enter into contract and perform the service, in case his bid shall be accepted.

This act shows also the further policy of the law to have been that good and responsible bidders only should become contractors, and that the bidder himself was expected to perform the service. He was required to swear that he had the pecuniary ability to perform the service. This is directly opposed to the system adopted by these defendants, of organizing a band of contractors and copartners, who were to sit here in Washington and draw large sums of money from the Treasury, whilst paying a comparatively small allowance to the men to whom they might farm out the service and who were to, and who actually did, perform the work. Brady knew this, and knew it when he passed his orders of increase or expedition giving to the contractor a clear profit of some $10,000 after providing for the payment to the man who did the work, according to the terms of his contract, some small sum. I am now considering the policy of the law as to competition by public advertisement, as that declared by Congress, and shall return to Mr. Brady in due course.

The general power is a power to advertise and let to the lowest bidder. Now, let us consider an exceptional power granted by Congress in regard to these contracts, which was intended to be used, like all exceptional powers, with great delicacy and only in the particular emergencies they were designed to meet. Exceptional powers do not change the policy of the law. They rather prove the rule and restrict the general power with greater particularity.

Sections 3960 and 3961 provide for additional trips and for expedition. Those are the sections in which you are most concerned. Having it clear in your minds what was the general rule and the general policy, you apply yourselves to consider the exceptional rule under the exceptional power. Peculiar and pressing emergencies are liable to arise in the course of the running of a contract, and these exceptional powers were given to meet those peculiar and exceptional emergencies. For instance, during the progress of the contract term a Leadville may spring up in the wilderness, necessitating daily trips where one, two, or three, at the time of the advertisement, were sufficient. That you can readily appreciate. A single trip would have been enough at the time of the letting, but gold or silver may be discovered, and the enterprise of America may throw its citizens in vast masses around that discovered mine. A new emergency has arisen; an exceptional case has occurred; and the wisdom of the law provides the power to meet that exceptional case.

Or, another exceptional case may occur—two railways approaching each other in process of construction, a railway coming from the Pacific coast, leaping or undermining the Rocky Mountains, as the case may be, finding its outlet on this side, whilst another railway, going from the Atlantic and seeking the Pacific, may come within a reasonable distance of the other (say one hundred or two hundred miles) and, uniting the termini there, may be a star route. Now, as between the termini of these two approaching railroads, whilst one trip a week on slow time might have been sufficient when the advertisement was made, this changed and exceptional condition may call for the exercise of the exceptional power, so that there may be three or four or five or six trips made to connect these two incomplete but approaching roads. Hence the origin of these statutes to meet these exceptional emergencies.

But General Brady practically repealed the fundamental law of the land in reference to the award of mail contracts by the gross perversion of two subordinate sections of the law intended only to provide for unforeseen and urgent contingencies. He made these two subordinate sections, according to the evidence in this case, to override the general rule and policy of the law, by using the authority that these sections gave him, not to meet the exceptional and extraordinary emergencies they were intended to meet, but to gratify his moods. And he tells you he had his moods; he had his increasing and decreasing moods. And he used these powers not only to gratify his moods, but, as I will show you pretty conclusively, to gratify a baser passion than a mood can be called.

Brady became Second Assistant Postmaster-General in July, 1876. Service on the routes embraced in this indictment went, or should have gone, into operation July 1, 1878, two years later. I want you to bear this fact in mind, and the reason why I want you to bear it in mind is this, gentlemen: I want you to understand that he had two years in which to learn, in which to study the course of departmental business, to know all its windings, all its various and multiform phases, its open and secret passages; two years in which to learn all about the force and effect, under the law, of a particular paper; two years in which to study the law with a view to its application; and two years to practice upon its application.

The abuse of power in ordering increase and expedition occurred mostly during the last six months of 1878 and the first six months of 1879. You see in this the gradual growth and development of the knowledge the student was acquiring at the desk of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General. He had been sixteen months in office before the advertisement of November, 1877, was issued. Of course, therefore, he cannot plead inexperience. On the contrary, I think you see the outcoming in his action in the last six months of 1878, and the first six months of 1879, of mature experience, and large and acute learning. The same public necessities which existed in the fall of 1878, before this wild dance of corruption began, existed also in November, 1877. There was nothing in the history of the country or the circumstances to mark an era and to show that behind the fall of 1877, lay desolation, behind lay a dormant people, behind that period enterprise slept and industry dallied along the primrose path, but that in 1878 all woke up as if Mr. Ingersoll's trump had sounded.

As the fundamental law provides for a full description of the routes to be let, and for free competition, no subsequent change increasing the cost should be made unless its necessity is affirmatively demonstrated. Do you not think so, gentlemen? The policy of the law being advertisement and open competition, and the power to change a contract being an exceptional power to be exercised only in an exceptional and special case, do you not think that before the Second Assistant Postmaster-General undertook to exercise that exceptional power he ought to have had affirmative proof of the exceptional necessity? As an honest man, would not you, before you undertook to exercise an exceptional power like that, taking thousands of dollars from the public Treasury by a secret and quiet contract, when you knew the policy of the law was in all these cases to advertise and secure public competition, feel that you ought to have had before you satisfactory evidence of the exceptional condition, bringing into activity the exceptional power and justifying its exercise? All the presumptions and equities are against increases during the progress of the term of the contract. The contract is intended to be a permanent thing during the term. There is no evidence in this case that Brady ever made an inquiry to ascertain the propriety of a single one of these numerous and costly increases. He tells you so himself. He tells you upon the stand with a pomposity of arrogance that I have seldom seen equaled by any man, "Oh, I don't care. I never bothered about it. They gave me these jackets and I signed them." "Why?" "Let me see the papers and I will probably tell you," or, "I don't recollect. I don't know. I did it because I thought it was right." "But you made a great many more increases than any other other Second Assistant. What did you do that for?" Said he, "I am just so many times a better Second Assistant than the other."

Mr. KER. Twenty times.

Mr. MERRICK. Said he, "I am just twenty times a better Second Assistant." "You did not make any inquiry?" "Oh, no; I had too much to do. I did not look into these things," and then he shelters himself behind petitions and Congressional solicitations. Let me say one word in passing. What had this august personage to do that required the exercise of his vast brain? There was hardly a single thing in that office to be done that required the exercise of the judgment and the supervision of the Second Assistant except the execution of these exceptional powers. It was stated before you that there were some ten thousand star routes, steamboat routes, and routes of all kinds in his office, and that he was master of them all. What had he to do? His clerks prepared the advertisements, his clerks prepared the contracts. The advertisements and the preparation of the contracts and every other duty belonging to that office consisted of routine matter. The only quasi-judicial power he had, as his counsel knew when he talked to this jury about his multitudinous duties, was to attend to these expeditions and these increases. There was not another thing he had to do. All the rest was routine work. When lowest bidders were announced and the contracts were prepared, he had to sign the contracts.

Mr. BLISS. He did not even do that.

Mr. MERRICK. He did not even sign them. I believe some other man signed them for him. But in reference to these expeditions and these increases, there was a case for the exercise of judgment, there was a case for the Second Assistant to inquire into himself. To say that he did not do it simply because he was burdened with other duties is to trifle with the jury in a manner beneath the dignity of an advocate. Suppose his honor—I will not suppose his honor, but suppose a chancellor, a judge upon the bench, is arraigned for having made a corrupt decree in a case, and the inquiry is submitted to you whether that decree is corrupt or not, and the judge comes before you and is sworn, and says, "Oh, yes; I recollect something about that; my clerk did that; I did not bother with these minutiae," would not you say, "What were you put there for? Your clerk kept your books; your clerk kept your record; your clerk filed your papers. Pro forma orders may have been passed without your seeing them; but when rights of property were changed by your decree and Greene's property was taken away and given to Crane under your decree, how dare you say, 'It is a formal matter. I did not look into it.' Tear off his judicial robes and clothe him in the stripes of the penitentiary!" Yet counsel has the audacity to ask to be shown one case where Brady violated the law. I will show them plenty of cases. The exercise of power under these contracts was quasi-judicial in giving expedition and increase; and the exercise of his judgment and his personal supervision over all cases when increase and expedition were asked was a duty that rose paramount to every other in his office, and became his personal duty, which it was criminal for him to assign to a subordinate.

In 1878, then, gentlemen, Brady was not a novice. He was not a simpleton. He is no simpleton now. Nobody accuses Brady of being a simpleton, else why within a brief period should he change his habitation from the humble cottage of the poor to the palace of the rich? How can a simpleton accumulate those vast resources that change the modest, quiet, retired room of the poor man to the highly decorated and gorgeously adorned saloons of the almost millionaire? No; he is no simpleton.

The COURT. We will take our recess now.

At this point (1 o'clock p. m.) the court took its usual recess.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. MERRICK. [Resuming.] Brady, gentlemen of the jury, professes, as I said to you, to shield himself behind petitions and solicitations of members of Congress. In your hearts as men and as members of the jury, do any of you believe that after all the evidence produced on this long trial Brady is now any better informed in respect to the real value of the petitions or other influences to which he seemed to subordinate his actions than he was when he made the orders in question? Having served in that office for two years, having been a public man for nearly all his life, do you believe that he did not know then just as well as he does now what was the real value of those petitions and what was the real value of the solicitations of members of Congress upon this subject? It is easy enough in this country to secure basketsful even of genuine petitions for any purpose. As one of the witnesses said to you on the stand, it is easy enough to secure petitions in the wilderness of the West to have the Government pay some indifferent musician to come out there and blow a horn once a day to break the stillness of its forests and to pierce the calmness of the air on its solitary prairies. I shall have occasion hereafter to speak of the subject of petitions. I mention it now simply to put one or two questions to you. After having explained as I have done Brady's quasi-judicial function in reference to granting expedition, I ask you was it the duty of General Brady, as Second Assistant, to obey the law and guard the interests of the people, or to yield unquestioningly, either from weakness or from wickedness, to importunities which were permitted to serve as a pretext for the multiplication of the cost of the service to an almost unlimited extent? He seems by the evidence of the defense to have considered himself a sort of bounteous Kris Kringle, endowed with illimitable resources, and whose chief function it was to scatter gifts for the asking, and to fill the stockings of the contractors with United States Treasury notes. If an official shovels money out from the Treasury for no better reasons, will he not to a certainty be followed by swarms of petitions?

Now, gentlemen, in connection with this subject, I desire to call your attention to a point arising under the two sections giving exceptional power that I am particularly anxious shall find a lodgment in your minds. I want you to take up those sections and consider their meaning, determine their practical application, and ascertain with me by some fixed rule what would be the necessary result of their practical application; and I want, when you have finished that piece of work, that you should bear it in mind, and carry it with you throughout this case, and apply it to every order that has been presented to you in evidence. Under sections 3960 and 3961 it was the obvious purpose of the law-maker that the compensation for increased service should be exactly proportioned to the increased cost:

Compensation for additional service in carrying mail shall not be in excess of the exact proportion which the original compensation bears to the original service, and when any such additional service is ordered, the sum to be allowed therefor shall be expressed in the order and entered on the books of the department; and no compensation shall be paid for additional regular service rendered before the issuing of such order.

That section applies to increase of trips. I now pass that by and come to the other section which I have indicated as one I desire you to consider with me calmly, quietly, and intelligently:

No extra allowance shall be made for any increase of expedition in carrying the mail unless thereby the employment of additional stock and carriers is made necessary, and in such case the additional compensation shall bear no greater proportion to the additional stock and carriers necessarily employed than the original compensation in the original contract bears to the stock and carriers necessarily employed in its execution.

Bear that in mind as well as you can: that the same proportion in respect to compensation must exist between the stock and carriers necessarily employed under the original contract as is borne to the stock and carriers under the new contract expediting the time. They must each bear the same relative proportion. Thus, a contract which under the original award barely paid expenses would continue to pay expenses after the award, and no more. I want you, gentlemen, Mr. Greene and Mr. Horri-gan, to put down the figures and figure this up when you get a chance. If the original contract yielded a profit it would continue to yield a profit, and a profit to the extent of the same percentage on the enlarged capital required for the new service. Now, taking arbitrary figures for comparison, if the profit was 40 per cent. per annum on $10,000, at which the route was let, it would still continue 40 per cent. on the doubled investment, $20,000, required after expedition. The proportion would have to be the same under the law if it was 40 per cent. profit on the contract as originally let. When expedition was granted it would have to be 40 per cent. on the contract changed by the expedition. It could not be more or less under the law. As the investment expanded from $10,000 to $20,000 the profits would grow pari passu from $4,000 to $8,000, the proportion being exactly maintained. But under section 3961 there is no alchemy whereby, through orders for expedition, A LOSING CONTRACT CAN BE CONVERTED INTO A GAINING CONTRACT. Take the figures and figure it out in any way you can under the law, and you will find that there is no process by which a contract that was a losing contract originally can ever be made a gaining contract by expedition.

I will further explain it to you. The law says:

The additional compensation shall bear no greater proportion to the additional stock and carriers—

I desire that his honor should give me the benefit of hearing this also. I am sure he is reading the section now—necessarily employed than the compensation in the original contract bears to the stock and carriers necessarily employed in its execution.

The COURT. But, Mr. Merrick, I think one or two of the witnesses who were here—practical men, who were examined in this case, testified that when the original service was once a week—

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] Oh, yes. On increased service there may be a difference. I am not talking about increase of service.

The COURT. I will come to that again. When the original service was once a week at a certain sum, and the service was increased say to six times a week, and an allowance of six times the original price of compensation was made, there might be a profit on the additional service of six times a week when, in fact, on the original service there might have been a loss, because there is economy always in the management of increased service.

Mr. MERRICK. That is true. Where there is increase of service there may be a small profit, and if that increased service is then expedited, possibly in that case expedition might give a small profit. But in these cases Brady expedited first and doubled up afterwards.

We have, gentlemen, a simple sum in the rule of three, a sum so simple that any beginner in arithmetic could understand it. As the stock and carriers required for the original service is to the stock and carriers required for the expedited service, so is the compensation for the original service to the compensation for the expedited service. That is the sum. I am now speaking of expedition made under the law and in conformity to the law; that is, an expedition where there is an honest ascertainment of the number of men and animals required on the original schedule, and an honest ascertainment of the men and animals required on the expedited service. Of course, disregarding the law and falling away from morality into the realms of perjury, it is easy enough to make expedition one of the most profitable experiments that man ever entered upon; but within the domain of honesty it is utterly impossible to convert by expedition a losing contract into a gaining contract. In this plain formula that I have given you is embraced the entire theory and philosophy whereby the rate of pay for expedited service is fixed. Expedition when legally paid for can only augment the losses on unprofitable routes as it augments the gain on profitable routes. I am glad to see you all thinking along with me. I do not mean to say by that remark that you are thinking as I think, but thinking while I think. That is all I want. If you do that, you will think as I think when you are through.

The COURT. Suppose there is a slow schedule calling for two miles an hour between two points and that the trip can be made in daylight by the carrier conveying the mail at the rate of four miles an hour. If it is increased to four miles an hour, without saying anything about night, of course it could not be carried except day and night. The men and carriers required for daylight service might be a certain number. For the expedited day and night service might it not require as many more?

Mr. MERRICK. It might, unquestionably. There are more men and carriers required for an expedited service than for an original service I will concede in any case. But the law says that the proportion shall be preserved.

The COURT. The proportion as to the additional men and animals.

Mr. MERRICK. And that the proportion as to the pay——

The COURT. If the time is shortened 50 per cent. and the men and animals required are 75 per cent. upon the original amount, then the compensation for expedition ought to be 75 per cent., according to the rule.

Mr. MERRICK. Take this: The additional compensation, no matter what it is, shall bear no greater proportion, says the law, to the additional stock and carriers necessarily employed than the compensation on the original contract bears to the stock and carriers necessarily employed in its execution. That is, the proportions must be observed. It is an iron mathematical rule, and I will tell you why it was made.

The COURT. Then it just amounts to this: That if the original schedule required ten men and animals, and the hours of that schedule were reduced one-half, and the new schedule required thirty men and animals, the compensation for the expedited service would be twice as much as for the original service; or, in other words, the additional compensation for the proposed schedule would be 66 $\frac{2}{3}$ per cent. upon the original schedule.

Mr. MERRICK. Suppose that on the original schedule he was losing 10 per cent. of his compensation; that he took it too low, and it was a losing contract, and there was an honest statement of the number of carriers necessary on the expedited schedule, and the proportion was preserved, and there were twice as many carriers on the new schedule as on the old, he would lose at exactly the same rate, 10 per cent. on the amount after expedition.

The COURT. That might or might not be.

Mr. MERRICK. That would necessarily be. Your honor can figure it. I have figured it over and tried it in every shape, and it cannot help but come out as I state. I will show your honor that it is so proved by witnesses on the stand.

Mr. GREENE (a juror). When did this law or regulation go into effect?

Mr. MERRICK. There was always, or for many years, a law upon the subject. It was passed, I think, in 1836 originally.

Mr. BLISS. 1825.

Mr. MERRICK. And was embodied in the Revised Statutes.

Mr. BLISS. It appears first in the statute of 1825.

The COURT. The regulation made in pursuance of that law, however, was not promulgated until the 1st of July, 1879. I refer to the regulation in relation to the affidavits.

Mr. BLISS. Yes, sir.

The COURT. The law always provided for the compensation, but the law did not provide for the means of getting at the compensation. The regulation adopted and promulgated the 1st of July, 1879, authorized the Postmaster-General to take the affidavits or to look at the affidavits, although it did not make the affidavits binding. The practice had existed in the department before then.

Mr. WILSON. That is shown by the contracts, your honor.

Mr. BLISS. The question was put as to the law.

Mr. MERRICK. I will explain that when I get along. I will explain the origin and meaning of the law. The question of Mr. Greene was a very proper and natural one, and I anticipated it. I will say now that that law first appeared in 1825.

Mr. WILSON. That is right.

Mr. MERRICK. And appeared occasionally along down and found its way into the Revised Statutes. It was a law to meet emergencies. It was an exceptional power, seldom or never evoked from its place of repose until 1878.

Mr. WILSON. Are you not mistaken in saying it occasionally appeared? It continued as the law.

Mr. MERRICK. Mr. Boone says that in 1878 when he drew these contracts for S. W. Dorsey he had been a mail contractor all his life, and never had a route expedited, and never thought of such a thing, although he then had eleven hundred routes.

Mr. WILSON. I was only speaking of the existence of the law.

Mr. MERRICK. The law existed. I have just said the law existed, but it was a grant of power, it was an exceptional grant of power to be used, in derogation of the general policy of advertisement and competition, only when extraordinary emergencies arose requiring its exercise, such as I have already explained to you. For instance, a sudden springing up in the wilderness of a Leadville, or the approaching of two railroads, one from the Atlantic and one from the Pacific. When they get within one hundred miles of each other the Atlantic mail stops at the point where the Atlantic road stops and the Pacific mail stops at the point where the Pacific road stops. A slow schedule prior to that time between those points might have done, but now the railroad makes it important that there should be expedition between those two termini of the new roads, and that the mail should travel rapidly between them. That condition arises after the letting of the original contract, and to meet that condition this exceptional power comes into exercise; but it never was thought of calling it into exercise except when the exceptional condition of things came about which, as I told you this morning, should be proved, as a condition precedent to the exercise of the power, to the satisfaction of any officer desiring honestly to administer his trust in that regard. Expedition, when legally paid for, can only augment the loss on losing routes, and augment the profits on profitable routes. For service just paying expenses the lines representing income and outgo will continue to run parallel. The proportion must be preserved between them. Let me illustrate. This sheet represents out-go [exhibiting sheet of paper to jury]. This [exhibiting another] represents income. They are just equal. If they, by the law, preserve the same proportions, they must run parallel indefinitely. You cannot change those proportions. If the service just pays expenses, these lines will continue to run parallel after expedition as they did before, because the proportion between them must be preserved. Their relative length must be preserved. If the service is profitable, the lines will diverge after expedition so as to embrace a larger gross profit, still maintaining the same proportion. How and why? Before expedition it was profitable to the extent of a certain percentage. After expedition there is additional work and additional income in the same proportion, and consequently it is still more profitable, because the rule of proportion enlarges the sum. If the service was unprofitable, the lines will diverge after expedition so as to embrace a larger gross loss, the percentage continuing unalterable. The percentage must be unalterable if the proportions are preserved. By no legerdemain or sleight of hand can the lines representing cost on the one side and compensation on the other, if the law is obeyed, be made to so cross each other as to convert a loss into a gain. A. W. Moore understood this. He is one of the numerous men that Mr. Ingersoll kept killing. He had his hands full of killing! It was his business to kill. He not only had to kill Rerdell and to kill Moore and to stun Boone, but he had to kill half a dozen men out on Tongue River, because he knew that nothing but the moral execution of the witnesses could stand as a barrier between S. W. Dorsey and the penitentiary. Moore understood this rule when, at Denver, in the summer of 1878, he told Miner as to the service in Oregon, that the more increase and expedition they had the worse off they would be. That was his exact language. Miner understood what was coming, as I will explain to you, and the process by which the logic of the situation was to be defeated, the law trampled under foot, and the Government defrauded, when he replied, "Expedition, Mr. Moore, depends on the affidavits of the contractors, and we are all good affidavit men." You will see, as I go along, that the given quantities in the sum under Brady's régime depended on the affidavit. Give a Second Assistant a man that is willing to swear to anything, and he will swear so that all the proportions will apparently be preserved under the law, but the given quantities will all be lies, and then the profit comes not from the expedition under the law, but from the perjury in the affidavit. I know, as well as I can judge, what some of you gentlemen have been thinking about in reference to this subject. I will come to the affidavit and answer the inquiries that have been made in regard to them verbally, by one or two of the jury, and by longing expressions from others.

To prevent hardship the contracts were so worded as to permit the contractor to throw down the service, if he so elected, when expeditions were ordered. The Government reserved the right to order expedition under the law, but they understood perfectly well that if the contract was taken at a very small profit, or by blundering, taken at a loss, and the contractor went on to execute his contract, an expedition ordered upon the contract would involve him in a greater loss. Therefore they gave him a guarantee of the means to protect himself against the greater loss by saying he might throw up his contract:

And in case of decrease—

Says the contract with the Government—curtailment, or discontinuance of service, as a full indemnity to said contractor, one month's extra pay on the amount of service dispensed with, and a pro rata compensation for the service retained: Provided, however, That, in case of increased expedition, the contractor may, upon timely notice, relinquish the contract.

Why? Because when expedition was ordered in the exercise of this exceptional authority upon a losing contract or a contract which paid but little, or was equal in outgo and income, the additional amount would involve the contractor in a greater loss or greater labor without adequate pay. Therefore, on expedition being ordered, he was given the right to relinquish his contract. I want you, gentlemen, to get this clearly into your minds. It was fully understood and appreciated that acting strictly under the rules of the law expedition of time on a route might become oppressive to the contractor, and that therefore he was entitled to a remedy or a guarantee of means of self-protection. The department seems to have acted upon the policy of dealing very carefully with this exceptional power until after the awards of 1878.

I am not going to leave this point that I am on, but will now introduce another one along with it that I want you to put away in your minds at the same time. Boone says, in speaking of the preparation of the subcontracts under Dorsey's directions (page 1524), that up to that time in all his business he never had a route expedited, and never thought of having one expedited. The new Bradyian policy was to him a revelation, although he had been a mail contractor from his earliest manhood, had made it the business of his life, and at that time had about eleven hundred contracts, not in the old States, but in that State, which of all others in the Union needed expedition, if expedition was to be granted, that State which is struggling forward with rapid movement and giant strides to claim the position of the empire State of the Union; the State of Texas, more prosperous, developing larger resources, accumulating a larger population, building up more towns and more railroads than any other State in the Union, measuring an area, I think, from three to five times as great as that of the State of New York—an empire of herself! This century will not close until you see millions of people on her soil, and her vote in the electoral college of the country will outbalance the vote of any other State in the limits of the Union.

Boone did not seem to understand it, and certainly did not comprehend this new policy, but S. W. Dorsey did both understand and comprehend it, as is apparent from the clause he required Boone to insert in the subcontracts Boone was writing for him, providing for pay to the subcontractors in case of expedition. Boone had never heard of such a clause. They pretend to combat this piece of Dorsey's pre-knowledge and prophetic vision by saying the clause was inserted because of the act of May 17, 1878, allowing the subcontracts to be filed. Not so. They knew it was not so when they told you so. Why? Boone says he did it under general instructions, and the instructions were given and obeyed long before that law was passed. The contracts were written by Boone long before that law was passed. Dorsey dictated the clause to Boone long before that law was passed. You may ask for my proof. On page 1524 Boone identifies 6 G as a contract. 6 G will be found on page 1223. 6 G is a contract on the route from Redding to Alturas, and was executed on the 1st day of May, 1878. It was in the form of Boone's contracts, says Boone. 6 G is a contract drawn in the form that S. W. Dorsey told him to draw it. It is dated the 1st day of May, 1878, and it was executed on the 1st day of May, 1878, on the Pacific coast, in California. Therefore, long before the 1st day of May, 1878, that contract was sent out to the Pacific coast. This law, gentlemen of the jury, did not pass until the 17th of May, 1878. This contract was certified by the postmaster in California on the 1st of May, and it was filed in the department and recognized as a valid paper, made on the 1st day of May, 1878. The law did not pass until the 17th day of May, and yet these gentlemen have the audacity, have the daring boldness to tell you that that clause for expedition was put in because of the passage of the law. It was put in because Dorsey knew what was coming. Brady had taken the scales from his eyes, and they sat down together in union contemplating what was to be done—

Two souls with but a single thought,
Two hearts that beat as one.

Mr. GREENE (a juror). There have been so many papers shown here that it is impossible to keep them in mind. Did not Mr. Wilson refer to this clause in a previous contract?

Mr. MERRICK. Mr. Greene asks if Mr. Wilson did not refer to this clause in a contract existing previously to the passage of the law.

Mr. BLISS. A Government contract.

Mr. WILSON. All the contracts provided for expedition and increase of service.

Mr. BLISS. With the Government.

Mr. WILSON. With the Government.

Mr. MERRICK. With the Government.

Mr. WILSON. The question was asked me and I want to reply. I did not state that it was in the subcontract. I said it was in the contract.

Mr. MERRICK. With the Government?

Mr. WILSON. With the Government.

Mr. MERRICK. That is right.

Mr. WILSON. The Government contract provided for twenty years before this time for increase and expedition.

Mr. GREENE. That is what I recollect.

Mr. WILSON. That is right.

Mr. MERRICK. The Government, in its contracts since 1825, has provided that wherever there is expedition the contractor may throw the contract up. I read to you just now the clause in the Government contract. Prior to this time there never had been any provision between the contractor and subcontractor for expedition, for the reason that whilst the Government contract provided according to law that he might throw it up if there was expedition, it was so exceptional a power, a power so rarely exercised, that there was no use for the contractor or subcontractor to calculate upon it or make any bargain about it.

Mr. GREENE. I would like to ask another question.

Mr. MERRICK. Ask me anything that you want, gentlemen.

Mr. GREENE. I understood that previous to a certain period, I do not know what year, subcontracts could not be put on file in the department.

Mr. MERRICK. No; they could not. There was no law providing for them to be put on file, but they made subcontracts.

Mr. GREENE. The subcontract was simply, previous to the passage of the law, an agreement between the contractor and the carrier, whoever he might be.

Mr. MERRICK. It was simply a private agreement by which the contractor stipulated to pay the subcontractor just as he does now, but the subcontractor had to look to the contractor to get his pay. The contractor would draw it all, and then he would pay the subcontractor. The act of 1878 provided that the contracts between the contractors and the subcontractors might be put on record, and also that when the department came to pay they should look at the subcontract, and the department itself should pay directly to the subcontractor what was due to him and pay the contractor what was due to him. Do you understand?

Mr. GREENE. I understand.

Mr. WILSON. Will you allow me to ask a question right there?

Mr. MERRICK. No, sir.

Mr. HOWARD (a juror). The contractor then was surety for the subcontractor's pay, wasn't he?

Mr. MERRICK. Yes, sir. You recollect that S. W. Dorsey did not want any of these subcontracts put on file, and that he sent word out West not to put them on file, saying that he would guarantee them, and he did personally guarantee the payment of a great many, so as to keep them off the files. The passage of the law guaranteed to the subcontractor payment by the Government.

Mr. HOWARD. After the subcontract was filed?

Mr. MERRICK. After it was filed. That law was passed in 1878.

Mr. WILSON. It was still, however——

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] Allow me to make my argument. I have no objection to extending a reasonable courtesy, even after your speech.

Mr. WILSON. I do not understand that.

The COURT. Mr. Greene's inquiry suggests to me the thought, how are we to know as to what these subcontracts contained prior to the 17th of May, 1878?

Mr. DAVIDGE. That is the point.

Mr. BLISS. Mr. Boone testified on that subject.

The COURT. They were not filed prior to May 17, 1878.

Mr. MERRICK. We know from Boone's testimony. Boone says he had been a contractor all his life, and he never heard of such a clause.

Mr. HENKLE. Mr. Boone was a clerk in the department in 1875.

Mr. MERRICK. Yes, I know he was.

Mr. HENKLE. And never had a contract before 1876.

Mr. MERRICK. How do you know? He does not say so.

Mr. HENKLE. He says he had not been a contractor before 1876.

Mr. MERRICK. Excuse me, he says no such thing. He says he had been in the business all his life.

The COURT. He was hardly a contractor while he was a clerk in the department.

Mr. MERRICK. I suppose I might reply in the language of Pinafore, "Hardly ever;" yet such things have been. [Laughter.] It does not make any difference whether he had been a contractor all his life or not; he had been a contractor for some years before 1878, and he was taken into the business, as the man most experienced in the business, to attend to it, by Dorsey and his copartners, his coassociates and cosomething else, when I have proved it.

Now, you understand that, according to the testimony, there never was any agreement between contractor and subcontractor as to any expedition prior to 1878.

Mr. HENKLE. Mr. Merrick, excuse me. I want to call your attention to the testimony.

Mr. MERRICK. I do not want to be interrupted.

The COURT. Allow the counsel to call your attention to the testimony.

Mr. HENKLE. On page 1544 Mr. Boone testified:

Q. How long have you been engaged in the business of carrying the mail?—A. Since October 1, 1876.

Mr. MERRICK. I think if you will look in Boone's testimony you will find that he says that he has been engaged since that time in carrying the mail, and had been before. That is my recollection.

Mr. HENKLE. [Reading:]

Q. How long have you been engaged in the business of carrying the mail?—A. Since October 1, 1876.

Mr. MERRICK. That was my impression, whether right or wrong; but I will let you have it as you want it; you can have it just to suit yourself.

Mr. HENKLE. I only want it as it is in the testimony.

Mr. MERRICK. 1876 is long enough. He had been in the department and learned all about the business. Prior to 1878 he had never heard of any such arrangement between contractor and subcontractor, and the reason was that, although the Government contract with the contractor stipulated that when the Government ordered expedition the contractor might throw it up, yet it was a power so rarely exercised, so rarely brought into force, that it did not enter into the calculation between contractor and subcontractor when they were making their stipulation. At that time the contractor had to pay the subcontractor and had all the money. On the 17th of May, 1878, Congress provided that the subcontracts might be filed, and that when they were filed and the pay on them became due, the department itself should pay the subcontractor what he was entitled to by the subcontract, and pay the balance to the contractor.

Mr. SHIELDS (a juror.) I forget the point you were trying to make.

Mr. MERRICK. The point I am trying to make is this: that that clause was written in there by Boone under Dorsey's direction, because Dorsey and Brady knew exactly what was coming and how it was to be done. You remember I showed you one paper (6 G) made out in the Pacific States.

Mr. SHIELDS. Do you mean that there was no law at that time governing the subcontracts?

Mr. MERRICK. Not at all; at the time he ordered that expedition there was no law governing subcontracts. Their pretense of a defense on that is the merest nothing.

Now, gentlemen, a new and previously unthought-of line of departure was to be made in the spring of 1878 in this power of expedition; this exceptional power; this extreme medicine of the service was to become its daily food. Prior to that time this power was exercised only to meet unforeseen and abnormal conditions, as medicine meets abnormal conditions in the human system. But in the spring of 1878, just before these contracts were to go into effect, a revolution takes place, as I have said to you, and this extreme medicine of the department, to meet its diseases, was to become its daily bread. And S. W. Dorsey foresaw what was coming.

I have been led a little away from the point I was discussing, to mark an epoch in the history and practice of the Second Assistant's office, in order that this new departure might be known to you before I entirely left the subject of converting losing into gaining contracts. I want you to understand this matter, and then you can much better apply the evidence. Mark down this new epoch.

Now, I have explained to you how, under the law, a losing contract cannot be turned into a gaining one by expedition, and I want you to comprehend it; I want you to make it part of your own knowledge. I do not want you to say that one of the counsel says so. I want you to digest it and make it part of your mental possessions, and comprehend it. It is not necessary that I should reread the section to you or again examine its provisions. But if you have a contract to carry the mail at $1,000, and there are two men and horses required to perform the service, and you find that you are losing 10 per cent. a year, will you, Mr. Foreman, or any one of you, tell me how that proportion of loss can be changed by a resort to expedition in which greater number of men and horses must be employed? I am talking about an honest transaction now, not one of Mr. Miner's affidavits, for he, in the line of solemn oaths, is the most extensive moral acrobat that ever performed in an executive department or before a court of justice.

Mr. CRANE (foreman of the jury). I think it might be done somewhat on the principle that a man who sells goods at wholesale makes more money than if he sold them in a small jobbing way.

Mr. MERRICK. Where you are keeping shop it might be true, but if the proportions have to be observed it is not. The outgo must be in proportion to the income. You may say that you can keep four horses a little cheaper for each horse than you can two. I do not think that is so out West. I do not think you can hire two men for less in proportion than you can hire one. If the loss is 10 per cent., and you double your investment, you double your outgo, and you lose 20 per cent.

Mr. CRANE. I thought perhaps it might be figured out.

Mr. MERRICK. You can do it; I know you can.

Mr. CRANE. You have to take into account the stable room, &c.

Mr. MERRICK. If you are running two horses and are getting $1,000, you have to have stable room for two horses; then, if you want to run four horses, you have to have stable for four horses. If your loss was 10 per cent. with two horses, with four horses and the extra stable room and extra number of men the loss would be just double.

Mr. HORIGAN. I am a little stuck in that; I do not understand it.

Mr. MERRICK. Suppose I ask you to shoe a horse for me; I agree to give you a dollar a nail; you put in five nails at that price, and then promise me that you will do horse-shoeing for me in the same proportion; but you find out after you have put in five nails that you have lost 5 per cent. (twenty-five cents); then I say to you, "Look here, Horigan, you bargained with me to put in as many nails as I wished at the same price; now I want you to put in five more;" but you say, "Oh, Mr. Merrick, I cannot do that; I lost twenty-five cents on the other." I then say to you, "You made your bargain with me, and I have got the right to insist upon it. You have the right to throw up my business if you want to, but as long as you are doing my business you must stick to the bargain." So if you put in another five nails in the same proportion you would lose fifty cents.

The COURT. Mr. Horigan cannot understand how he would lose money on a dollar a nail.

Mr. MERRICK. That is rather hard, but I am only trying to make it agreeable to Mr. Horigan, for his long absence from his business, confinement on the jury, and consequent pecuniary heavy loss, by letting him imagine a case where he could shoe a horse at a dollar a nail.

The COURT. If you should ask him to put a shoe on your horse for five cents, which is less than the cost, and you wanted him to shoe the horse all around, that would be a case that he could understand better.

Mr. MERRICK. That is the same thing.

The COURT. A proposition of that kind he could understand.

Mr. MERRICK. Suppose I ask Mr. Horigan to shoe my horse——

Mr. HORIGAN. [Interposing.] You must give me a reasonable price.

Mr. MERRICK. How much do you charge for such horses as I drive?

Mr. HORIGAN. Two dollars.

Mr. MERRICK. Two horses all around?

Mr. HORIGAN. Four dollars.

Mr. MERRICK. That is fifty cents a foot. Now, suppose I say to you, "Mr. Horigan, here I have advertised for a blacksmith to shoe my horses, and you are the lowest bidder; you agree to shoe them at fifty cents a foot; I want you to shoe two feet every month." And suppose that in that contract you agreed that you would put on as many shoes as I wanted, provided the outlay that you made in putting the shoes on should bear the same proportion to the compensation as the outlay you made in putting on the two shoes bore to your compensation for these two.

Mr. HORIGAN. I would not have made that contract.

Mr. MERRICK. No, you would not make it; I know you would not; but that is this contract. Putting on two shoes at fifty cents a shoe, you get $1, and after figuring up everything you find that you have lost 5 per cent. (twenty-five cents).

The COURT. He does not understand.

Mr. HORIGAN. That I would not do. I don't do business that way. [Laughter.]

Mr. MERRICK. I know you do not, and those contractors could not do it that way if their affidavits were honest.

The COURT. You cannot make Mr. Horigan understand how he is going to lose money in shoeing horses at fifty cents a nail. [Laughter.]

Mr. MERRICK. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. HORIGAN. I do not understand it, and that is the reason why I asked; I thought I was justified.

Mr. MERRICK. Certainly.

The COURT. If Mr. Horigan had undertaken to shoe the horse for twenty cents a foot, and had had to pay a journeyman twenty-five cents a foot, then the more feet he had to shoe, of course the more money he would lose.

Mr. MERRICK. Mr. Horigan, may it please your honor, will never lose money on shoeing horses. He is probably the best man at his trade in this city to-day, and has more of it than he can do, and is making plenty of money. He cannot comprehend these propositions which involve the possibility of his losing by his labor.

The COURT. You give him a price upon which he would lose money.

Mr. MERRICK. He would not take it; I have asked him to do it, but I cannot get him to.

The COURT. Give him twenty cents a foot for shoeing your horse, so that he will lose five cents a foot.

Mr. HORIGAN. I wouldn't touch no man's horse for that. [Laughter.]

Mr. MERRICK. Suppose all you have to pay out in the first instance is for the labor, feed, and care of one horse; and after you have paid that, you receive $1,000 from the Government, which you find is just $100 short; then you get expedition on which the number of men and horses necessary to be employed is four, and for which you will receive $2,000. If the one man and one horse cost you $1,100 for carrying that mail, then it follows that the four required on the expedition will cost you $2,200, and you cannot get out of it in any possible way.

Mr. DAVIDGE. A man counts as an animal, but does it take the same amount of money to keep him?

Mr. MERRICK. It depends on what sort of an animal it is. I do not know how they would count you. Now, allow me to make my speech.

Mr. DAVIDGE. Let me say——

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] No, sir; I will not let you. You have retired apparently from the argument of the case, and I do not choose to have your argument interpolated into mine. Now, I defy the jury, when they come to calculate it, to make it any other way than as I represent it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Will you allow me to ask a question?

Mr. MERRICK. No; I will not consent, may it please your honor, to be interrupted, except to be corrected if I misstate the testimony.

You will then be out of pocket just $200, being in exact proportion to your original outlay.

I prefer, instead of being interrupted by the counsel on the other side, to take their witnesses, and I will now come to them.

The COURT. Counsel on the other side have no right to interrupt the counsel for the purpose of meeting his argument to the jury.

Mr. DAVIDGE. I concede it.

Mr. MERRICK. Mr. Ingersoll very politely asked me, but I do not wish to yield, except to be corrected if I misstate the testimony.

Mr. INGERSOLL. All right.

Mr. MERRICK. Now let us consult authority upon this subject. I refer to Vaile's evidence at page 4064:

Q. If it was a losing contract—

Says Mr. Bliss to Mr. Vaile—

If it was a losing contract before expedition, and the expedition was to be made according to the rule laid down in the law, how could it, after expedition, become a profitable contract?—A. It did not.

He is speaking of Tongue River. This is the next question:

Q. How could it be?—A. It could not be.

There is their witness on the stand, and he is an old mail contractor, a lawyer of some sort by profession, a mail contractor since 1862, has been bidding ever since more or less, knows all about every turn in the department and every rut on the western roads—has made an immense fortune out of it. He came into this transaction on account of his wealth, according to their statement, to help his newly discovered friends, for whom his poor heart had been made to bleed almost, though he had never seen them in his life. His wealth is also shown by himself when he says he had gone on bonds, he does not know whether for $100,000 or $1,000,000 (page 4050).

Mr. HENKLE. Does he say he made his wealth out of those contracts?

Mr. MERRICK. He said that had been his business in life; I do not know whether he stole it or got it in some other way.

Mr. HENKLE. Do you know that he did not inherit it?

Mr. MERRICK. I do not know. He said mail contracting had been his business. I presume he did not inherit it, for he is a man somewhat more ancient than my patriarchal friend, Mr. Henkle, and men of that age in Independence, Missouri, do not inherit large fortunes. I presume he made it. He certainly started out to make money in this business, and did make it in this business, as I will show you. But, independently of that, he is an experienced mail contractor, knows all about it, and yet he says that a losing contract cannot by expedition of the time by any possibility be converted into a gaining contract.

Mr. HENKLE. He did not say that; he said that—

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] No, sir; the correction is not in order, for the reason that I have read the testimony. Let the gentleman take the book, and I defy him to find that I have omitted a word or added a syllable. Read it, Mr. Bliss.

Mr. BLISS. At page 4064:

Q. If it was a losing contract before expedition, and the expedition was to be made according to the rule laid down in the law, how could it, after expedition, become a profitable contract?—A. It did not.

Q. How could it be?—A. It could not be.

Mr. MERRICK. That is the answer—"It could not be." The first answer applied to Tongue River; the second was an honest answer wrung from the witness in reply to the second question.

Now, what of Brady? We will take his testimony upon this subject, too. I shall have to read several passages from his testimony; Brady is an elaborate gentleman. I find this at page 3453. The question is by Mr. Bliss:

Q. If the allowance for expedition is to be gauged by the number of men and horses used on the one service and the number of men and horses that would be used on the other service, how would you in that way convert a losing service at one trip and slow time into a profitable service at three trips and fast time if you did not make an allowance in cases of that kind in excess of the amount authorized under the statute?—A. That is a matter that—

There Mr. Chandler interposes and there is some discussion.

The WITNESS. It is a matter that I have had very little experience in personally. As I said before, a contractor could tell you much more about that than I could. In some way I arrived at the conclusion that we benefited the contractors more or less in that way.

Yet he could not explain to save his life how it was done. He, the experienced head of the contract office, who had been dealing in these things for years, when asked how it was, said that he could not explain it, but that he "arrived at the conclusion that in some way it benefited the contractor." Ay, it did in some way benefit the contractor. It benefited the contractors when they made perjured affidavits, and got Brady to help them trample on the law and fraudulently shovel out the public money from the Treasury on the papers they had filed in the department. He could have explained it if he had chosen, but he sheltered himself behind the statement that he could not explain it, and that he had come to the "conclusion that in some way it benefited the contractor."

Let us see what further, at page 3452:

Mr. BLISS. I will explain to you. You stated with reference to the Bismarck and Fort Keogh route:

"But how to increase it by simply adding trips to it at the ridiculous figure at which it had been taken by the contractor was a stumbling-block.

How to increase it—

"No contractor could even do the once-a-week service really across there at that price. They had probably bid upon it blindly, like a good many contractors, lumping the whole service, bidding so many dollars a mile, as is the common practice among contractors.

"It was very evident that it could not be increased to three-times-a-week service and make an efficient service simply for three times what they had bid for once a week."

Then comes Mr. Bliss's question:

Then you went on to state that you ordered expedition. Now I ask you in what way that tended to make an efficient service?—A. It tended to make a more efficient service as a matter of course, to make it three times a week. It tended as a matter of course to make it a much more efficient service to make it a fast service, and that could not be done with any regard for the rights or safety of the contractor at the price, as I have said before, that they had originally bid for the contract.

After his explanation, how he worked it out so that he benefited the contractor I do not know. But he was going to work here to benefit the contractor. He says it could not have been done by making three trips, and it could not have been done under the law by expedition, and yet it was done. Let us see what further. At page 3540 I have a memorandum of what the distinguished Second Assistant Postmaster-General says:

Q. But the contractor having been anxious to throw up his contract, and you being satisfied that he could not perform the service for the amount for which he had offered to perform it, and you being desirous to get a good fast service on that route, why proceed by the method of expedition rather than by a new contract?

He first proceeded by the method of expedition, you see.

That was the question substantially which I put to you. You said that you could not have got temporary service, you thought.—A. I preferred to do it that way, and it was the policy of the department at that time to do things in that way.

That was the Bradyian policy. What do you think of this autocratic trustee? He says somewhere, and I will find it for you and read it, that he kicked the stumbling-block (the law) out of his way.

I have read from the testimony of these two men, Brady and Vaile, at this time, only to show that to change a losing into a gaining contract under the law and in conformity thereto is an impossibility. Miner sounded the key-note of the music for this carnival of fraud and perjury when he said to Moore at Denver:

WE ARE ALL GOOD AFFIDAVIT MEN.

Everything depended on the affidavit; the affidavit depended upon nothing—that is, upon the conscience of the contractor who made it, and that was nothing. The given quantities in the case depended upon the affidavit, how many men are necessarily employed on the present schedule and how many men will be necessarily employed on the proposed schedule. The affidavit set that forth, and those quantities thus given in the affidavit formed the given quantities by which to ascertain the amount of compensation by giving you the elements of your rule of three. Therefore, gentlemen, the exercise of those exceptional powers under those peculiar clauses of the statute, according to Brady's idea of administering his trust, depended upon the affidavit. I shall hereafter speak of the manner in which he says he administered that trust. These affidavits, therefore, naturally excite in your minds the profoundest interest. These affidavits were the levers by which the Treasury doors were to be prized open. And I can readily understand the interest manifested in the various inquiries you have made about those affidavits. I could see the interest running down the two lines of this jury about those affidavits. I shall treat them as the core of the case, and I propose, in the progress of my argument, to arraign these affidavit-makers for perjury, and I will argue the case on each several affidavit as though it were upon an indictment for perjury. I will show you who wrote the affidavits; I will show you how the affidavits prevaricate and lie; I will show you how the affidavits were manufactured in stock and held for common use, to be filled up whenever needed. These are things, I know, that you have been asking yourselves all along. I will explain to you, Mr. Crane, how it was that those two affidavits came from Vermont from John W. Dorsey; I will explain to you, and to your entire satisfaction, why the two were made. If I do not convince you that they were blanks when Rerdell came back here on the 5th of May from the West I will agree never again to open my mouth as an advocate in a court of justice.

The COURT. Mr. Merrick, whilst you are waiting to rest a little while, there is something I want to inquire about of somebody.

Mr. MERRICK (sotto voce). I would rather you would ask somebody besides me.

The COURT. Mr. Brady testified that the check he had in his own mind upon those affidavits was a rule.

Mr. MERRICK. That is what I said to the jury just now that I would come to by and by.

The COURT. And the rule was to allow for good service (that is, six times a week, night and day service) at the rate of from $30 to $35 per mile.

Mr. BLISS. Thirty dollars a mile.

The COURT. Thirty dollars a mile. On Bismarck and Tongue River he allowed, he says, $37.63.

Mr. MERRICK. Yes.

The COURT. The compensation upon that route, after it was expedited, was $70,000, I believe.

Mr. MERRICK. Yes, sir.

The COURT. At that rate ($37.63) it will not make $70,000. At $30 a mile it is $3,000 for one hundred miles, is it not?

Mr. MERRICK. Certainly.

The COURT. And for three hundred miles it would be $9,000. I have been trying to see whether I understood Brady's rule in regard to that.

Mr. BLISS. I think he counted each trip at $30 a mile.

Mr. WILSON. Once a week service, your honor.

The COURT. No.

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir.

The COURT. [Reading from page 3397:]

A good service, running night and day, was worth anywhere from $25 to $35 a mile. Was then, and I do not know but what it is now, in that country. [Refers to paper.] This service, as it was expedited, cost $37.63 per mile, running night and day, upon a fast schedule. I did not consider that an expensive service then, and for the time I do not consider it an expensive service now.

Mr. BLISS. Your honor has figured it at $30 a mile for three hundred miles, making $9,000. I may be in error, but I understand that that is for one trip; that if it was increased to six trips, it would be $54,000. I understood that to have been Mr. Brady's theory.

The COURT. Thirty dollars a mile was his average for each trip.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Counting one way. Then six trips, at $30 a mile for three hundred miles for a year, would make $9,000 for the one trip; six trips would be $54,000.

The COURT. One way?

Mr. BLISS. Yes, sir.

The COURT. And both ways would be $108,000.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Let me give my figures. This route was three hundred and ten miles long; six trips a week one way would be eighteen hundred and sixty miles; at $37 a mile—and there is a fraction——

The COURT. [Interposing.] Sixty-three cents.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Leaving out the fraction, it would amount to $68,820.

The COURT. He does not explain it that way.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is the way it goes, by the mile, one way.

Mr. MERRICK. Allow me, gentlemen, to ask you to bear in mind what I have said about the cost of expedition—that a losing contract can never be made into a gaining one—and to remember what Vaile and Brady have testified about it; and bearing that in mind, follow me while I proceed by a consecutive line of thought and narrative to show you how Brady performed this extraordinary operation as against law and mathematics, and losing routes sprang up all of a sudden, under the genial influences of affidavits, to be trees bearing fruit of greenbacks and gold.

Now, if agreeable to the court, I would like to adjourn.

The COURT. Adjourn the court.

Thereupon (at 3 o'clock and 48 minutes p. m.) the court adjourned until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

TUESDAY, MAY 29, 1883.

The court met at 11 o'clock.

Present, counsel for the Government and for the defendants.

Mr. MERRICK. [Resuming.] With submission to the court, and gentlemen of the jury, I have now developed to you fully the theory and the policy of the law that there should be public advertisement of all contracts for carrying the mails of the United States in order that every citizen should have the opportunity of entering upon that field of enterprise if he thought proper to do so upon equal terms with every other citizen, and also for the reason that thereby the economy of the administration of the department would be materially advanced, and I showed to you clearly and I think beyond all question that competition was the principal element of the policy spoken of, and that competition among citizens for this service was the design the law intended to reach. To emphasize a little logic that I then used, as well as to emphasize the expressions of the statute which I then read, I beg to call the attention of the court and jury to the language of the Supreme Court of the United States upon that particular subject. I refer to 93 United States, page 244, the case of Garfield against The United States, where the court, speaking by Mr. Justice Hunt, after quoting the laws to which I referred, and concluding the quotation from that law which provides that contracts for the transportation of the mail shall be awarded to the lowest bidder rendering a sufficient guarantee for faithful performance of the service, says:

The object of the statute was to secure notice of the intended post routes, of the service required, and the manner of its performance, that bidders might compete, that favoritism should be prevented, and that efficiency and economy in the service should be obtained.

That favoritism should be prevented, says the court, and it might have further added, that the exercise of a disposition in public affairs should never be allowed, because it is a violation of a public trust wherever and whenever it colors or controls or modifies in any form the execution of a public power.

I have also shown to you, and I think to your satisfaction then, and certainly if not to your satisfaction then to your satisfaction now, after the experiments you all made with the figures, that a losing route on an original contract can never by expedition be changed into a paying one. In that connection, at about the close of my remarks, when I was referring to the way that General Brady administered his trust, I read to you one or two passages from his testimony, but failed to find in my notes, because of an error, the passage which I particularly desired to call to your attention. I read from page 3454, when Mr. Bliss had him in his hands, and under his sharp fire of cross-examination:

Q. But you stated that to increase the pay—

Speaking of the Tongue River route—by simply adding trips at the original figure at which it had been taken by the contractor was a stumbling-block?—A. Yes, sir.

To increase the pay by simply adding trips was the stumbling-block. This Brady had to testify to, and the question was predicated of Brady's own avowal on the stand that it was his purpose to increase the pay for the benefit of the contractor.

Q. Finding that stumbling-block, you did not refer to the provision as to a temporary contract under the miscellaneous letting, but increased the contractor's pay out and out, did you not?—A. We kicked the stumbling-block out of our way, and did it just as we did it—

Q. [Interposing.] Was it not possible—

Mr. INGERSOLL. [Interposing.] Let him finish.

Mr. BLISS. I thought he had finished.

A. [Continuing.]—for the purpose of getting a good service.

Q. Was it not possible for you to have allowed the service to go along under the existing contract and then advertise in the miscellaneous advertisement for a contract, which would have been a contract for three years and a fraction, and so have placed the matter open to public bidding?—A. Not and do what we wanted to do.

Namely, to benefit the contractor, as he had been obliged to say in the previous part of his examination. What was the stumbling-block? The stumbling-block was the law of the land, and Brady kicked that law of the land out of his way in order to do what he wanted to.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. Merrick, I call your attention to the fact that you have not read Mr. Brady's answer fully in regard to that matter.

Mr. MERRICK. Pardon me. Let me refer to it again. What is the page?

Mr. CHANDLER. 3454.

Mr. MERRICK. I have read it all. Tell me what I have omitted, sir.

Mr. CHANDLER. The following question and answer you did not read——

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] The following question and answer ?

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly.

Mr. MERRICK. I have misread nothing.

Mr. CHANDLER. I did not state that you had misread.

Mr. MERRICK. I cannot read all his evidence.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the privilege of reading it.

Mr. MERRICK. No, sir; I object to your reading anything, unless I misread or misstate the testimony. Counter-testimony cannot be read whilst I am talking.

The COURT. Is it on the same page ?

Mr. CHANDLER. Yes, sir.

The COURT. Is it on the same subject ?

Mr. CHANDLER. Yes, sir.

The COURT. You can read it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not state that Mr. Merrick has misread.

The COURT. You can read it.

Mr. CHANDLER. [Reading:]

Q. What could you not have done that you wanted to do other than benefit the contractor ?—A. We wanted, as I said before, to get a good service on the Bismarck and Tongue River route, and we chose to do it in the way we did.

Mr. MERRICK. Is there anything else along there which the court says you may read ? Did not Brady say in his testimony that his object was to benefit the contractor ?

Mr. CHANDLER. He said what I read.

Mr. MERRICK. Did he not so state in the rest of his testimony, sir ?

The COURT. You may address the jury rather than counsel.

Mr. MERRICK. Did he not say, gentlemen, that the service had been taken at too low a rate or that the contractor could not carry it for that rate, and that his object was to benefit the contractor, and he was scheming as to what he could do to make it pay the contractor ? Then he threw over that declaration the thin covering which the dimmest eye could penetrate and see the substance—the thin covering of the declaration that he was looking to get a good service, when by the last law of Congress he was bound under the circumstances to put it in a special advertisement as a new route thrown open to public bidding. I have read all that was needed to explain his testimony.

Now, gentlemen, I have shown to you that as there was no way of converting a losing into a gaining contract under the law, these parties were providing some means by which this extraordinary result could be accomplished without regard to the law, and as the affidavit was to furnish the leverage for opening the Treasury and to furnish material and ascertain the quantities in the sum of proportion, affidavits from contractors passed into the rules of the department, and thenceforward from the day of that revolution in the practice of the department the use of exceptional powers in emergencies became the habitual practice without regard to emergency. Now let us see, gentlemen (for it is upon these affidavits, as I have said, that the case rests), what was the practical operation of this new scheme, accomplishing results which, under the law, I think we now, court, jury, and everybody, all agree could not have been achieved. First, let me remark to you that when I came into this case, and my distinguished associate, Mr. Bliss, came, by direction of the Attorney-General, to my office to explain the nature and character of the case, I was most forcibly struck with a very singular, and to me unaccountable, fact. It was this: I learned what you have now had in proof, that a plain and a plainly educated and seemingly unenterprising man, living in a village in the State of Vermont, engaged in the honest but humble occupation of selling tinware, had come down to Washington City and entered upon the business of mail contracting; that without previous knowledge of the business, probably with an observation limited to the corporate limits of his town, he had suddenly entered upon this field of public enterprise in Washington City, where the tiger lies in political jungles waiting for any careless wayfarer that may come along. He had bid for a mail route and had obtained it, and on a contract made with the Government was to receive $1,700. He had then taken that contract and had let it out at a cost of $2,500, thus making the Government a present of $800 a year. The question arose in my mind, how comes this? How comes it that a merchant in the State of Vermont leaves his business to come here and take from the Government a contract upon which he is losing $800 a year? That does not look to me like Yankee thrift. That does not look to me like the keen-sighted vision and astute enterprise of that people in whose astuteness and keen sight we take so much pride, and which elements of capacity have added so largely to the wealth of the nation. It is not like a Yankee to do that. He is losing money. He is losing $800 a year. Why is it? How comes it? Is he sane? Oh, yes, he is probably sane. Then if he is sane and has lived to his forty-fifth or fiftieth year in the State of Vermont, how comes it that he drops down here to Washington City and takes a Government contract which involves him in the necessity of making a present to the Government of $800 a year? At once I said, and I think I almost put it in words as I now tell them to you, or words like these: "There is something behind this mysterious transaction." Does it not strike you as strange and mysterious that a man should do a thing of that kind? Yet that is the identical thing that John W. Dorsey did on route 38113, from White River to Rawlins. But, gentlemen, whilst I was inquiring as to the mystery that lay behind this singular transaction, the solution of the mystery very soon broke upon my vision as its profits had grown in the pockets of John W. Dorsey. He had taken that White River and Rawlins route at $1,700. He had hired it out to be carried, and paid for carrying the mail over it $2,500, thus giving the Government $800 a year, as you will find at page 1955 of the record; but as it went along in a little while this $1,700 that the Government paid him swelled and enlarged, by the orders of Brady from time to time on expeditions, until it reached the sum of $31,981.35, and when he received that $31,981.35 from the Government under the benign influence of Brady's cultivation, he paid to his subcontractor for carrying the mail upon the route $23,333.33, putting in his pocket thereafter $8,647.92 as the clear net profit, where when originally taken he had been losing $800 a year. Think of it, Mr. Greene. Take it home, gentlemen, as you did my problem of yesterday. Weigh it in your minds and ask how such things can be while the law constrains the action of public men, and personal honor and morality rule the conduct of men in their transactions. Here, then, was a route losing $800 a year converted into a route where the profits became $8,647 a year, and all this done within some twelve months or a little over—done against the rule of mathematics, against the rule of arithmetic, against that inflexible rule which shows that it could not by any possibility be done if the law permitting increase or expedition was obeyed and the affidavit upon which the order was made was true.

Mr. CHANDLER. If your honor please, I would like to call Mr. Merrick's attention to the fact that that contract was let at a profit of $200 by John W. Dorsey instead of a loss of $700.

The COURT. Where is that?

Mr. CHANDLER. Page 1954.

Mr. MERRICK. Look at page 1955.

Mr. CHANDLER. I understand that, but that was a contract let by Mr. Rerdell. We are talking now about a contract let by John W. Dorsey and not by Mr. Rerdell.

Mr. BLISS. It was let to a Mr. Wright at a profit. Mr. Wright broke down and failed to carry the mail under the contract, and it was then sublet at a loss, as Mr. Merrick states.

Mr. CHANDLER. By Mr. Rerdell.

Mr. MERRICK. By Mr. Rerdell acting as agent.

Mr. CHANDLER. The statement was, however, that Dorsey took it for $1,700 and let it at a loss.

Mr. MERRICK. Is it not a fact?

Mr. CHANDLER. No, sir. The record is that he took it for $1,700 and let it for $1,500. That is the record.

Mr. MERRICK. Then he only lost $200.

Mr. CHANDLER. He took it for $1,700 and let it for $1,500. It seems to me he would make $200.

Mr. MERRICK. [To Mr. Bliss.] What is the fact?

Mr. BLISS. The fact is as I stated. It was let at that rate and the contractor broke down within the second quarter of the term, and then his subcontract was withdrawn, and a new contract was made at $700 loss, as Mr. Merrick states.

Mr. MERRICK. Then I am right.

Mr. CHANDLER. No, sir. If your honor please, the question is not whether the contractor broke down. It was let at a profit of $200.

Mr. BLISS. Look on page 1955 and you will see that that subcontract was withdrawn from October 1, 1878.

Mr. CHANDLER. The question I raise is this: The statement is that he took it for a certain amount and let it for $700 loss. I do not say whether the contractor broke down or not. The record shows it was taken for $1,700 and let for $1,500. Those are the precise figures.

Mr. MERRICK. I am much obliged to the gentleman.

The COURT. They made that bargain.

Mr. MERRICK. It was let at $1,500, and the contractor could not carry it at $1,500. It could not be done. He was ruined by it, and then John W. Dorsey had to let it at another rate, and he then let it at the losing rate of $700 a year. So my statement is not only true, but it is emphasized by the fact that they had tried to carry the contract on the original price and failed to do it; and counsel might well have told you that if the subcontractor was afraid of the contract and wanted to throw it up, under the law, as I have explained it to you, he had the right to throw it up the very first time expedition was ordered. But he did not throw it up. He had the right to do so, but he held on to it at a loss, and immediately it grew and swelled and enlarged to be a tree of fruitful profit.

Mr. CHANDLER. I want to call attention also to the fact that there was no loss on the second letting. The three trips are precisely three times the amount paid for the first letting of one trip. So that in that respect my friend is in error.

Mr. MERRICK. The three trips a week the counsel speaks of came in under the original letting and the contract expressly provided for a certain proportion to go to the subcontractor. Now, will the gentleman answer me, as he seems to be so extremely solicitous on this subject, whether or not there was not a net profit of $8,647 which the contractor put in his pocket here in Washington without doing any particle of work?

Mr. CHANDLER. I think there was, and that disproves the gentleman's theory that a losing contract cannot be made profitable.

Mr. MERRICK. I did not hear the last part of what you said.

The COURT. He says it disproves your rule; that it shows that a losing contract may be converted into a profitable one.

Mr. MERRICK. Yes; that is true on their side, and how? By the perjury of the contractor. Give me a set of villainous contractors and I can convert a losing contract into a mountain of fortune. That is the point I am making. The foundation of this case is these affidavits. As I told you yesterday, written on every one of these affidavits is perjury, and without perjury a losing contract can never be converted into a gaining one. Perjury did it in this case, as I will prove when I come to argue that particular part of the case.

Mr. CHANDLER. The affidavit on this route is not attacked.

Mr. MERRICK. Why, yes it is; I attack every one of them.

Mr. CHANDLER. I mean by the evidence.

Mr. MERRICK. There seems to be a disposition to unnecessarily interrupt me, may it please your honor, and I call your attention to it.

The COURT. Yes; that last interruption was, I think, rather beyond the limit.

Mr. CHANDLER. I beg your honor's pardon; I did not suppose I should so easily disconcert the gentleman.

Mr. MERRICK. You cannot disconcert me.

Mr. CHANDLER. I did not suppose you would receive my suggestions offensively.

Mr. MERRICK. I do not receive them offensively; but I have understood that there was a purpose to interrupt me.

Mr. CHANDLER. You are mistaken, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. MERRICK. I have so understood.

Mr. CHANDLER. I called your attention to what I thought was the record.

Mr. MERRICK. Much obliged, but I know this record, as I will convince you as well as the jury.

As I have stated, the foundations of this case are these affidavits, and it is for that reason that I have pursued the course of remark I have up to this time, leading along, as well as I could, by a continuous current of thought, to those foundations; establishing the basis of my argument in the principles of law, and showing you what was the rule of law by which Brady was to be guided in making expedition; showing you that in the application of that rule within the law a losing contract could never be made a gaining contract; and I am now proceeding to show you that these affidavits lay at the foundation of the extraordinary profit on these contracts; and then I shall proceed to show you that those affidavits are false as dicers' oaths.

Let us now look at the route from Pueblo to Rosita, upon which John R. Miner, the acrobatic swearer, was contractor. The original contract was given at the pay of $388 a year. The original subcontract pay was $700 a year. So this enterprising gentleman from Sandusky, Ohio, was making a present to the Government of $312 a year. He is searching upon the book to find it. Find it, and if I have misstated the record, call my attention to it. I say that the record shows that the original contract pay to John R. Miner on Pueblo and Rosita was $388 a year; that the subcontract pay was $700—$312 more than he got from the Government; and that in consideration of being allowed to be contractor on this route he was making a present to the Government of $312 a year. I have called to be corrected, and there is silence. The contract pay after expedition was—what? $8,148. It had gone up a little beyond the $388. The subcontract pay when John R. Miner was getting his $8,148 was $3,100 (page 871). This gave to him a clear profit of $5,048, which he put in his pocket for doing not a particle of work, sitting here in Washington, drawing his profit of $5,048 substituted for what had been a loss of $312. How can these things be?

Mr. HENKLE. Mr. Merrick, the record shows——

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] Show the record.

Mr. HENKLE. The record shows that Mr. Miner never drew a dollar on that route after it was expedited.

Mr. MERRICK. "Miner never drew a dollar!" Why, you are a band of partners and conspirators, one drawing for the other and participating in the profits, and when I speak of the contractor you tell me that he "did not draw a dollar." Gentlemen of the jury, they may tease you and worry you, but don't let them play upon you. Then the counsel admits the statement that I made, but, he says, "John R. Miner did not draw the money;" somebody else drew it. John R. Miner was probably too busy at that time to draw it. He was writing to Hayes, telling Hayes that he "must recollect that getting expedition in Washington costs money." Remember the letter. I am coming to it by and by.

Let us take another route, No. 38135, Saint Charles to Greenhorn. Again the acrobatic gentleman jumps into the contract. What was the pay? Contractor, John R. Miner, pay $548, subcontract pay $548. He was losing nothing, he was gaining nothing. He was giving bonds, had assumed a responsibility to the department, and then hired out his contract to a man who agreed to do the work for just the price received by the contractor from the Government. Now let us see how this little plant improved under the genial influences of Brady's tender solicitude and agricultural processes. The contract pay after expedition was $3,945.60; subcontract pay, $1,000; profit, $2,945.60. Sitting here in Washington in his office, doing nothing but watch the operations of the machinery, manipulating men, and counseling with Brady and with Dorsey and with Rerdell, John R. Miner draws this sum of money from the Treasury. This contract, upon which he neither gained nor lost in the beginning, is converted into one upon which he receives his clear profit of $2,945.60 after paying $1,000 to the man that did the work. Mr. Bliss says that the subcontractor did actually carry it for $540. That is too small a matter to talk about. [Addressing Mr. Horigan, a juror.] Would it not be a good thing to have a contract with a man to shoe his horses for just what it cost you to shoe them? You see I am paying my respects to you, in consideration of your having handed me that handful of horse-shoe nails this morning.

Mr. HORIGAN. You can use them as tooth-picks after it is all done.

Mr. MERRICK. That is very good. Would not you like to have some contracts at that rate to shoe horses out here on Mr. Greene's race-course for four years, upon which you did not make anything at all, provided that in one year after you entered into the contract on which you did not make anything you could make a clear profit of $2,945? Yet that is what the Government of the United States did; that is what Mr. Miner did; he gained nothing on the original contract, and in a year or a little over there was a profit of $2,945.

Now, let us take another route—Silverton to Parrott City, No. 38156. And here we come to the Vermont gentleman. John W. Dorsey was the contractor here; original contract pay, $1,488; original subcontract pay, $2,280 (page 1860); loss to John W. Dorsey on that contract, $792. Why, John was getting into the losses heavily. But he saw the light. He was gifted with prophetic vision, and felt that the humble shall be exalted, and the poor made rich. He saw the coming day when, for the stripes he wore, he should be clothed in the garments of financial glory. "Yes; I will bear my burden; I will pay my loss." I can imagine some Yankee friend of his from Middlebury saying to him, "Look here, Dorsey, what are you doing? Have you lost your senses—taking a Government contract at a loss of $792? Better go back to your tin-shop." "Oh, no; you don't know what is coming; blessed are those who can wait and hope." And he waited, and he hoped, and the day came for the realization of his expectations, in a contract paying, after expedition, $16,512.28, when he was paying his subcontractor $9,400, realizing a clear profit of $7,112.28. And after that, when he was realizing the profit of $7,112.28, instead of suffering a loss of $792, he meets his Middlebury friend and says to him, "Look here, old boy, I didn't like to tell you all about it, but here it is; I knew it was coming." Does not this startle you, gentlemen?

Now, let us take another—Toquerville to Adairville. And here we come to J. M. Peck. Mr. Peck, I believe, is proved not to have been in Washington since 1877, if indeed he had been here for a year before that time. S. W. Dorsey proves it. Mr. Peck is dead; he sleeps the last sleep; let him rest in peace; he is dead. Still even above his grave, and above the grave of every man, justice must be done whilst men live upon the earth and hope for the blessings of society and Government. On this route J. M. Peck was the contractor; $1,168 was the original contract price; and he sublet that route to a man that did the work for $1,127; that gave him a profit of $41. That might be increased so as to enlarge this profit, but it never could be increased to enlarge the profit beyond the relation that that profit then bore to the profit on his original contract, his contract price. But what of it? After expedition this contract pay, which had been $1,168, became $19,311.33; the subcontractor's pay, which had been $1,127, became $8,444; and the profits of Peck, which had been $41, became $10,867.33. How was it? How could it be achieved? Can you imagine, under the law? Now, if they can devise a theory, let them, that will make all this consistent with innocence. If you can devise a theory by which there could be applied the law of expedition to this contract or these contracts so as to bring out these results in any way, give them the benefit of it. But do not be lachrymose about it. Calculate with a clear head and an unclouded understanding.

Now let us take another—Eugene City to Bridge Creek. John M. Peck was the original contractor; original contract price $2,468, which he, or his copartners or coconspirators—the gentlemen have forced me into the expression, and now I take it up—let for $2,700, giving a clear loss on that contract of $232. Now, what was to come? After expedition the contractor's pay was $21,460.89; the subcontractor's pay was $7,400. What was Peck's profit? What were the profits of that conspiracy, of which Peck was a member and for which he was swearing? $14,060.89, AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR A LOSS OF $232. A loss of $232 sustained by these men upon that contract is converted in a brief period of time—a year or a little over—into a clear profit, after paying all expenses of carrying the mail, paying the subcontractor, and satisfying all the obligations arising out of the performance of the contract, of $14,060.89.

Now, gentlemen, these are not tropes, not metaphors. These are figures, but not figures of speech. They are facts, and not figments of the imagination.

Now, let us take another route. It is my duty, as I said to you, to spread this case before you on my theory, so that you will all understand it. I will take the route from Redding to Alturas. John M. Peck is the contractor again—Peck, the sick man; Peck, that never was here in Washington, and never had apparently anything to do with this business on the face of this earth except to swear to blank affidavits for Miner and Rerdell and the rest of them to fill up. The original contract price on this route was $5,988, sublet to subcontractor at $5,500, giving to the combination a profit of $488. You see from the price of the original contract that that was a pretty heavy and well-paying route, and gave to them a profit of $488 after they had let it to the men who did the work and paid all the expenses. For the subcontractor has to pay all expenses, you understand; he pays all the expenses of running the mail route. And not only that, but he has to pay all the fines and penalties, you recollect. The subcontractor stipulates or covenants with the contractor that he is to pay all the fines and penalties that may be imposed. All those burdens are upon the subcontractor. The subcontractor has to pay for his horses, to hire his men, to do all the work in carrying the mail on a schedule prescribed by the Post-Office Department; and if he does not do it, then by his covenant in his subcontract with the contractor he has to pay all the fines and forfeitures imposed for any failure to comply with the requirements of the office. He gave sureties in this case, Brother Bliss informs me, to do all that. [To Mr. Bliss.] Have you the contract before you?

Mr. BLISS. Yes.

Mr. MERRICK. Read me the covenant there as to paying fines and penalties.

Mr. BLISS. There is only a portion of it stated here.

Mr. MERRICK. Then refer to the original contract.

Mr. BLISS. It is 6 G.

Mr. MERRICK. There is something else about 6 G that I want to say, too. I think 6 G is one of Boone's contracts.

Mr. BLISS. No; it is one of Moore's.

Mr. MERRICK. No; Mr. Moore made the contract on the Pacific coast and Boone wrote it and S. W. Dorsey dictated it. Mr. Ingersoll said to you that 65 per cent. on expedition was printed in the subcontract made by Boone at Dorsey's dictation. I want to show you that that is not so. Here is the very paper (6 G) that Boone identified, and the 65 per cent. is not printed in.

Mr. BLISS. Here are the fines and penalties.

Mr. MERRICK. Read it.

Mr. BLISS. (Reading:)

The said party of the second part further agrees and covenants with the party of the first part that if fines or deductions be made by the Post-Office Department, because the mails between the aforesaid places have not been carried promptly and securely as per agreement, they will pay the said party of the first part all loss and damage which he may sustain in consequence thereof.

The clause as to expedition, which you referred to, is:

It is further mutually agreed by the parties hereto——

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] I do not care for that.

Now, gentlemen of the jury, you have heard the covenant in regard to these penalties. These gentlemen in this combination, in every single one I think of their subcontracts, required the subcontractor to pay the fines and penalties imposed by the office out of the subcontractor's pay, so that their profits should not be disturbed.

And I will show you something very interesting about this gentleman, Stephen W. Dorsey, upon the Ojo Caliente route, where Joseph was subcontractor, and poor Joseph as subcontractor was ruined by the fines and penalties; Dorsey got them remitted and put the money in his pocket in August of 1879 or 1880, and told Joseph that he had never received one cent. But Joseph found out afterwards that there had been remitted of those fines and paid to Mr. Dorsey some $1,400, which Dorsey kept in his pocket until the last trial, when he paid Joseph at the time he came here as a witness. He never paid it to Joseph until two years after he had put it in his pocket. You can draw your own inferences as to what he intended to do with the money. But I will not depart from my line of argument to comment upon subjects I shall encounter as I go along.

I say to you, and you must bear in mind, that all these subcontractors were required to pay every fine, every penalty that might be imposed by the department, out of the money coming to the subcontractor, as well as to do all the work; so that whatever was over and above the subcontract pay was clear profit to the ingenious politicians who had organized this scheme and were sitting here in Washington to see its workings.

Mr. Ingersoll told you that 65 per cent. was printed in the Boone contract. Now, here is the contract that Boone swore was the form he wrote. Look at it, Mr. Crane, and see whether 65 per cent. was put in there. They handled Boone very gingerly, very tenderly, very carefully. We made him tell all we could, but whether we got all he knew or not, the powers above alone can tell. For he was hand in glove with them, and he had scarcely left the witness-stand before he was in harmonious accord with S. W. Dorsey, looking over papers. This is the paper he identified, and you see that 65 per cent. was not printed in. Now, a gentleman who undertakes to criticise counsel on the other side with so much severity as Mr. Ingersoll undertook to criticise my distinguished associates ought to be very sure that he himself has made no mistakes. He ought to be very sure that he does not err in what he tells the jury when he assumes to take up the speeches of two such men as Bliss and Ker and show where they have made erroneous statements of the testimony and criticises those statements with acrimony and severity. I shall not criticise what he said with either acrimony, severity, or unkindness. I shall simply say, gentlemen of the jury, "he said this and so about the paper; there is the paper, look at it and judge ye."

And let me remark in this connection, for it will not break the line of thought, that I think the two speeches of my learned brothers, covering over five hundred closely printed pages, are such condensed, clear, and compact arguments as I never heard in a court of justice. There was no flourish, no rhetoric, no imagination, no ornament or decoration, but simply fact and logic on fact, and hardly as much logic on fact as there might have been, because the multiplicity of facts required them to be brought within a narrow compass. There were over five hundred pages of a narrative condensing nearly five thousand pages of a record, and yet a counsel who has gone all over it cannot find more than some eight or ten slight and unimportant variations from that record, all occurring through accident. Gentlemen, my associates, I congratulate you from the bottom of my heart upon so high a tribute as Mr. Ingersoll has paid to you in the acknowledgment of his inability to find a greater number of errors, though assisted by all his cohorts that sit behind, associate counsel and parties, who piled their notes in his lap, that he might have the benefit of the research and labor of all of them.

Are you done with that paper, gentlemen of the jury? Are you satisfied? If you are not, take it home, and ask your wives about it. [Laughter.] Did you see the sureties? They required them to give sureties for the performance of the work. That 6 G is a useful paper.

The original contract price upon this route, Redding to Alturas, was $5,988; original subcontract pay, $5,500; profit, $488. The contract pay after expedition was $41,916.66; subcontract pay after expedition, $23,000. What is the profit? $18,916.66 a year. The subcontractor had to do the work, pay all the fines, take all the consequences of failure; and yet the profit to the man here in Washington, doing nothing, sitting in quiet repose, without peril, with sureties between him and danger, as well as the covenant of the subcontract, is changed from $488 into $18,916 a year. Would you not like to have some contract like that? [Addressing Mr. Davidge.] Would it not be better than practicing law?

Mr. DAVIDGE. It would depend upon what kind of pay I got.

Mr. MERRICK. The pay was $488 and it was increased to $18,916.

Mr. DAVIDGE. What pay I got in the law I meant.

Mr. MERRICK. I say in that proportion; that is half as much as you make in a year.

Mr. CHANDLER. If your honor please, I would like to call Mr. Merrick's attention to this matter he speaks of, on page 1525, where Mr. Boone says—

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] I object, unless I have misstated the evidence. I have presented the contract to the jury, so that they could see for themselves.

Mr. CHANDLER. I claim that he has made an error about this paper.

Mr. MERRICK. Go on then, if I have.

Mr. CHANDLER. [Reading:]

That was the clause prepared by myself, and my clause was stricken out by three black lines, and a new clause inserted.

Q. Let us have the new clause.—A. [Reading:]

"It is further mutually agreed by the parties hereto, that in case said service is expedited, that the party of the first part shall pay to the party of the second part sixty-five per centum of the amount received by said first party from the Post-Office Department on account of said expedition, in addition to the sums hereinbefore agreed to be paid."

Q. Who directed the insertion of the second clause?—A. Mr. Dorsey wrote that, I believe.

By the COURT:

Q. Which Dorsey?—A. Stephen W. Dorsey.

Mr. MERRICK. Mr. Chandler is interrupting me unnecessarily. Here is the paper; Boone swears that this is the form; he identifies it. Read it, Mr. Bliss.

Mr. BLISS. [Reading:]

Q. [Submitting paper marked 6 G.] State whether or not that is one of the forms prepared by you.—A. Yes, sir; that is one of the forms of Miner, Peck & Co. John W. Dorsey had the same, excepting that his name was at the head. There were two forms of subcontract blanks printed both exactly the same, except that one was headed Miner, Peck & Co. and the other John W. Dorsey & Co. [Page 1524.]

Mr. MERRICK. [To the jury.] There is what Boone first wrote struck out with that black line. Then Dorsey dictated that part, and Mr. Ingersoll said he had 65 per cent. printed in. You see it is not so. Has he corrected that?

Mr. GREENE (a juror.) According to my recollection, Boone said something about it.

Mr. MERRICK. Boone did say something about it. He said he wrote in 65 per cent., but at the same time he identified the paper as a paper he wrote about that time, and it shows that the 65 per cent. he spoke of was not in there. Either he was mistaken as to having been told to put it in or the purpose was changed after it was spoken of.

Now, then, gentlemen, these routes that I have been going over are the routes which were divided in that partition they talk of which took place on the 1st day of April, 1879, when they professed to have divided up the proceeds of the robberies that had been committed and to have distributed the burglars' tools among the respective parties after the safe and sure accomplishment of their purpose, as I will hereafter make plain to you.

Now, what is the recapitulation? These routes to which I have called your attention are seven in number, and there are others, but I have only taken those where the testimony is complete and unequivocal. The original contract pay on these routes was $13,748; subcontractors' pay originally $15,355. The contractors' pay after expedition, as against $13,748 originally, was $143,276; the subcontractors' pay after expedition $75,677. And on those seven routes what was the clean net profit per annum? $67,598 for sitting here in Washington and not doing a single thing.

The subcontractors did the work for them at a cost of $75,677, while the contractors were realizing from what they received from the Treasury enough to pay that $75,677 and then to pocket $67,598. And yet Mr. Ingersoll says, withdraw Moore and Rerdell from this case and there is no case. You might dispense with Moore and Rerdell and their testimony in the case, and read this law by the light of a clear reason and with an unclouded comprehension, and take Brady's papers, and those papers and the law alone make a case, without a solitary witness, to the entire satisfaction of any sensible man.

When the question came up before the court in reference to the responsibility of one of these co-conspirators for the declarations and acts of another co-conspirator, that question being predicated of the inquiry whether we had established a sufficiently close relation between them to make the declarations of one evidence as to anybody except the declarant himself, the court, in deciding that question—and I suppose I may read it—said, at page 2053:

As to the official acts of Brady, we have in evidence the appropriation made by Congress, the extravagant expenditures in regard to star-route expenses by which those appropriations were exhausted; application made to Congress for new appropriations, and the expenditure of those appropriations; the character of these different acts; these sudden orders for increase of service and increase of expedition which the jury have a right to pass upon and compare with the necessities that existed, or with the requirements of the service, and for myself, as I have to decide this question upon the effect of these acts upon my mind, I must acknowledge that they have made a very deep impression of an adverse character to the bona fides of those orders.

So spoke that venerable and learned man from the seat of law when the question was before him as to how far we had brought these parties into relation with each other as co-conspirators. He stood back startled and amazed by these enormous and extraordinary increases, and no doubt waited with the patient and earnest desire of a charitable heart to hear from the other side the reason why such things were done; to listen to the proof of the exigency that existed calling forth these large expenses; to hear the testimony that would show such an exceptional state of case as to make requisite the exercise of this exceptional and extraordinary power in so extraordinary a manner. But that testimony did not come; the evidence was not here; silence prevailed; and the case stands before you upon the bald facts presented by the prosecution, without an attempt to prove that there were any exceptional conditions or emergencies such as the statute contemplated to justify or excuse the acts of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Let us go on a little further. Let us see what this festive mail contractor and farmer from Independence, Missouri, did in regard to these contracts. John M. Peck was the contractor on the route from Kearney to Kent; $868 was the original contract pay; $700 paid to the subcontractor; profit, $168. That is a small profit. This was both before and after Vaile came in, and all along. Brady paid for expedition $4,302; the subcontractor was paid $1,587; profit, $2,715. After the big figures we have been talking about we cannot consider that. It is too small.

On the route from Canyon City to Camp McDermitt we come to some more large figures. The original contract pay was $2,888; original subcontract, $2,976; a clear loss of $88. They bore it; they bore it with patience; they bore it with hope. There was a loss of $88 apparently, and $88 donated to the Government. But, with patience they hoped for brighter days, and they came to brighter days. The cloud that o'ershadowed them as a cloud of loss turned, and they beheld with grateful feelings and thankful hearts its silver lining, giving assurance of much coveted gains.

After expedition, the contract pay was $50,166.66; the subcontract pay, $20,000; net profit, $30,166.66—$30,000 profit for doing nothing; the route subcontracted under iron-bound covenants for performance of duty and payment of fines, forfeitures, and penalties—original loss on the route, $88, converted by the alchemy of perjury into a profit of $30,166.66. Gentlemen, the man who on Hounslow Heath bravely demands your money or your life at the muzzle of the pistol deserves more mercy than he who, by the insidious arts of a perjurer, aided by the corruption and low instincts of a trusted public official, enters the people's treasury and robs it of the people's money. The affidavit was the lever, and Brady was the man to use the lever to pry open the door. I am coming to these affidavits presently and will take them up one by one and one after another.

The next route to which I ask your attention is the route from Julian to Colton. J. M. Peck was the contractor. The original contract price was $1,188 and the subcontract price $1,069 leaving a profit of $119 a year. How did it go? Oh, the figures are small. I almost hate to tell you. They only amount to a profit of $4,455 a year. That was not enough to pay for one of Miner's breakfasts in the days of his prosperity, although he has grown rather thin of late.

Let us have a little recapitulation on these routes. Original contract pay, $18,692. Original subcontractors' pay, $20,100. Original loss on all these routes of which I have spoken to you, $1,408. Put that on one side. That was in the day of darkness. Now let us come to the day of light. Contract pay after expedition, $206,555.32. Subcontractors' pay after expedition, $101,719.83. Clear profit to the conspiracy per annum, $104,935.49, and this does not cover all the routes in the indictment. Gentlemen, my mind may be unable to see what other minds can see; my vision may not be as clear as yours, nor my genius as quick to devise means of accounting for extraordinary events, but in all candor and sincerity I assure you that after earnest thought, careful consideration, and profound deliberation upon this subject I can find no means, scheme, or way by which this extraordinary result could have been produced except by wanton perjury in the affidavits, and as I have shown you, by perjury known to Mr. Brady.

Mr. BLISS. Before Mr. Merrick goes to the affidavits I think probably it would be well to take our recess, if your honor would consent.

The COURT. I will consult his wish.

Mr. MERRICK. I desire it, your honor. I should be obliged to you.

The COURT. Then we will take our recess now, gentlemen.

At this point (12 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the court took its usual recess.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. MERRICK. [Resuming.] At this point of the argument, gentlemen of the jury, I desire to recur to section 3961 R. S. for a little while in order that we may see what were the duties to be performed in regard to expedition by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General prior to determining the amount of the expedition, or the amount that was to be paid therefor, to speak more accurately. You will recollect that the statute provides that no extra allowance shall be made for carrying the mail unless thereby the employment of additional stock and carriers is made necessary. You will also understand and bear in mind that the groundwork upon which I am building this argument is the affidavits. You will understand that I am endeavoring to show you that the groundwork of the fraud which accomplished so large a withdrawal of money from the Treasury of the United States is made up of the affidavits. The affidavits, as I said to you, constituted the lever which was to be furnished by the contractor, and Brady was the muscular official power to use that lever to pry open the doors of the Treasury. This statute, before proceeding to state what shall be the proportion of pay on the expedited schedule to pay on the original schedule, and before giving the rule by which the pay on the expedited schedule is to be ascertained, says that:

No extra allowance shall be made for increase of expedition in carrying the mail unless thereby the employment of additional stock and carriers is made necessary, and in such case, the additional compensation shall bear no greater proportion to the additional stock and carriers necessarily employed than the compensation in the original contract bears to the stock and carriers necessarily employed in its execution.

You will see, therefore, gentlemen, that, as a condition precedent to entering on any calculation as to the amount to be paid for the expedition, the Second Assistant Postmaster-General was required to determine whether or not on the expedited schedule the employment of additional stock and carriers would be necessary. It was a part of his official duty to determine that question, and it was not a mere routine matter such as his counsel would have you believe he could turn over to any clerk. It was a matter intrusted to him in his official capacity, a power vested in him, quasi-judicial in its character, if you choose so to speak, and he was on the particular case before him required to determine primarily and in the first instance whether on the proposed expedited schedule any additional stock and carriers would be required. We cannot, of course, go into the operations of his secret mind and ascertain whether he attempted to exercise his mental capacity upon that question or not. We cannot look inside and see what was done inside. The only way that we can in any case understand the movements of a man's mind is by the development of its motions in physical and visible actions. When you get at physical and visible actions you may reason back to the motions of the mind which stimulated and caused the action. Now, I propose in this matter, as in others hereafter, to take a few sample cases and ask you to consider them and judge by them. The first case which I propose to submit to you in this view is the expedition on the Tongue River route—his favorite route. The original contract on the Tongue River route was for one trip a week. That one trip was to be run at the rate of three miles an hour.

The COURT. Two and sixty-three one-hundredths miles, I think.

Mr. MERRICK. I have it here three miles. It may be a mistake.

Mr. BLISS. The route was let as two hundred and fifty miles, and eighty-four hours was the time at which it was let.

The COURT. It proved to be more.

Mr. BLISS. It proved to be three hundred and ten, and the time was extended to one hundred and eight hours.

The COURT. It proved to be three hundred and three by General Rosser, but afterwards, in consequence of certain orders, it was recognized as three hundred and ten.

Mr. BLISS. The question being whether it should be treated as terminating at Fort Keogh or Tongue River. That would make the difference between the two.

Mr. MERRICK. What was the time?

Mr. BLISS. The time was eighty-four hours, and the distance two hundred and fifty miles. That was the contract time and contract length.

The COURT. That would be three miles an hour.

Mr. BLISS. Just three miles an hour.

Mr. MERRICK. Three miles an hour.

Mr. BLISS. It was extended to three hundred and ten miles; and then there was an order which recites that the time had been extended to one hundred and eight hours, but we failed to find any such order.

The COURT. It was an unexplored country, and the route never had been measured, and according to my recollection Rosser was appealed to, and he had the route measured, and he made it three hundred and three miles.

Mr. BLISS. Mr. S. W. Dorsey wrote to General Rosser, and upon that letter Mr. Brady did what he called restating the distance at three hundred and ten miles, which was undoubtedly the correct distance, and then the time is alleged to have been extended to one hundred and eight hours.

The COURT. From Bismark to Tongue River was three hundred and three miles, and to Fort Keogh three hundred and ten.

Mr. BLISS. Yes, sir. Then the time is alleged also to have been extended coincidently from eighty-four hours to one hundred and eight hours, but no order to that effect appeared. It does in a subsequent order appear that it had been so changed. In either case it would be about three miles an hour.

Mr. WILSON. A little less than three miles an hour.

Mr. MERRICK. A little less than three miles an hour. Now, on the subject I am submitting to your consideration the time per hour is material. On October 4, 1878, two trips were added, and expedition from three miles to three and eighty-four one hundredths per hour. Less than a mile an hour was added.

Mr. WILSON. I suggest that you are mistaken.

Mr. BLISS. In what respect?

Mr. WILSON. It was sixty-five hours and three hundred and ten miles.

Mr. MERRICK. On the same basis of calculation in regard to time and distance by which I obtained the three miles per hour I obtain the amount of expedition. If the one is correct the other is.

Mr. WILSON. You are mistaken in both.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Allow me to state what I understand to be the fact.

Mr. MERRICK. Certainly, sir.

Mr. INGERSOLL. On the contract after it was restated, the time and distance come to two and eighty-seven one-hundredths per hour. After the expedition to sixty-five hours, the speed then was four and sixty-two one-hundredths per hour; so that it was the difference between two and eighty-seven one-hundredths and four and sixty-two one-hundredths, lacking twenty-five one hundredths of two miles; that is to say, one and seventy-five one-hundredths per hour.

Mr. MERRICK. I am satisfied your calculations are erroneous. I have gone over it with great care. I have gone over it with the assistance of another also, who understands this record perfectly.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will show you the figures. The distance is three hundred and ten miles, and the time one hundred and eight hours. If you want to get at the rate divide three hundred and ten by one hundred and eight.

Mr. BLISS. The difficulty is this: It is a misstatement to say that the time is one hundred and eight hours.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I say it is not a misstatement.

Mr. MERRICK. Very well; there is the difference——

Mr. INGERSOLL. [Interposing.] Wait a moment.

Mr. MERRICK. I will.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I wish to show that my calculation is not erroneous. I only want to be right.

Mr. MERRICK. Unquestionably. Proceed.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do not wish to interrupt you.

Mr. MERRICK. I know you do not.

Mr. INGERSOLL. By dividing the miles by the hours you will get at the number of miles per hour, and that is two and eighty-seven one-hundredths. The expedited schedule is sixty-five hours, and sixty-five in three hundred and ten goes four and sixty-two one-hundredths times. So that the difference between the first time and the last time is the difference between two and eighty-seven one-hundredths miles an hour and four and sixty-two one-hundredths miles an hour. If there is a mistake I do not see it.

Mr. BLISS. Your honor, I merely desire to say that the difficulty arises from this point solely: That the contract says that there shall be no authority to extend the time, as Mr. Brady himself said on the Vermillion and Sioux Falls route. Mr. Ingersoll's calculation proceeds upon the allegation that the time was extended to one hundred and eight hours in violation of law, though we could find no order, and there is no order in the case extending it to one hundred and eight hours. There is somewhere in the back of the jacket a recital that it has been so extended. Your honor will remember that during Mr. Wilson's remarks I suggested to him that if he would consent we would have the order book on that route brought in, and see if in fact there had been any order extending the time. This Mr. Wilson did not care to accede to.

Mr. WILSON. I did not say so at all.

The COURT. The proceedings of the office, as shown by the indorsements upon the jackets, amounted in fact to an order recognizing the distance as three hundred and ten miles.

Mr. BLISS. There is no question about restating the distance. That is in evidence. As to the extension of time, the difference between Mr. Ingersoll and Mr. Merrick, I think, arises from the fact that one treats the alleged extension of time on the original schedule to one hundred and eight hours as having been made and as being a legal and proper extension, and the other calculation treats it as confining it to the contract, and not therefore having been made.

The COURT. Strictly, according to the law, the contractor was bound to run the three hundred and ten miles of actual distance in the same time that he contracted to run the two hundred and fifty miles.

Mr. BLISS. Yes, sir.

Mr. INGERSOLL. This was an unexplored country.

The COURT. It was an awful country; a wild country.

Mr. INGERSOLL. There is one other little matter where I think you made a misstatement. You said October 4, 1878.

Mr. BLISS. The jacket is indorsed at the head October 4, 1878. The order was originally to take effect on the 1st of January, 1879, and it did take effect on the 1st of January, 1879, although the jacket is indorsed at the head the 4th of October, 1878. The order was not actually made until a later period. That is unimportant.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I only wish to be correct. That is all. The order was made in December.

Mr. BLISS. I think so. That is unimportant.

The COURT. The 23d of December was the date of the order. I remember that.

Mr. MERRICK. As there seems to be some misapprehension in reference to the amount of expedition upon the Tongue River route I will revise the calculations I have made and recur to this route upon some future occasion.

In the case of the route from Mineral Park to Pioche, there was originally one trip at two and seventy-six one-hundredths miles per hour for $2,982. On December 24, 1878, two trips were added and expedition was given from two and seventy-six one-hundredths miles per hour to three and eighty-six one-hundredths miles per hour, a little over a mile an hour of increase and under four miles an hour altogether, at a cost of $19,318. This order has the trips and the expedition consolidated, and therefore to get what was paid for expedition we must deduct the cost of two trips from the gross amount of the consolidated order. The gross amount of the cost of two trips was $5,964. Subtract that from the principal sum in the consolidated order and you have a result for expedition of $13,354. On July 23, 1879, four trips were added at a cost of $29,733.33, which, added to the original sum on the original contract, $2,982, plus $19,318, being the amount on the two trips and the expedition first granted, make $22,300. Add $29,733.33, and you have a gross amount of $52,033.33 paid on that route after the order of July, 1879. Deduct the amount for trips, which is $2,982, multiplied by seven, making $20,817—

Mr. WILSON. [Interposing.] No.

Mr. MERRICK. Yes, sir; and I will refer to your record and show you that the inspection division of the Post-Office Department kept trips and expedition perpetually separate. You probably have not read those orders since they were introduced in evidence, and may not then have appreciated their full force. There is a great deal in this case you do not know and will never find out, although you did find out how to use language unbecoming an advocate.

Mr. WILSON. Give me five minutes to answer and I will show you.

Mr. MERRICK. I will read now from page 2944 in reply to the unexpressed but indicated view of the counsel. This paper was introduced by them :

Division of inspection, office of the Sec'd Ass't P. M. Gen'l.

State, Arizona. Route No. 40104. Year, 1880. Quarter ended 31 March. Termini of route, Mineral Park, Pioche. Contractor, J. W. Dorsey. Account, M. C. Rerdell, Box 706, Wash'n, D. C. Miles, two hundred and thirty-two. Trips per week, seven. Pay, $52,033.33; one-half trip, $71.27. Exp., $31,159.33; one-half trip, $42.68. Expedited from 84 to 60 hours=twenty-four hours. Mail bills show entire loss of expedition in January.

So that from this order of the department, introduced by the defendants themselves, it appears that the cost of expedition was $31,159.33. I wanted your honor to hear that and to note the fact. They kept the expedition and the trips separate, and possibly for the reason that there were privileges in reference to remissions where there was a failure of expedition, which privileges did not extend to failure of trips. That order was signed by French, and I shall in the course of my remarks have occasion to recur to several similar orders that were signed by Brady, showing that the expedition and the trips were kept separate, may it please your honor, all the way down. You carry along with the newly added trips the old expedition, but even in that case you keep separate the expedition thus carried along from the trips thus added. Here in this order it declares the expedition to be $31,159.33, precisely the same result I reached by the calculation which I made. To get at the amount of expedition deduct the amount for trips, which is $2,982, original price multiplied by seven, making $20,874, which deducted from the gross price of $52,033.33 leaves $31,159.33 for expedition. Now, you have on that route $31,159.33 for expedition. How much was the time expedited? It was expedited from two and seventy-six one-hundredths miles to three and eighty-six one-hundredths miles per hour—a little over a mile an hour, a fraction over one mile, and under four miles altogether. A little more than one mile is added by way of expedition on a route on which the mail is being carried at the time in two and seventy-six one-hundredths miles per hour and for that one mile per hour of expedition over that route there is paid $31,159. The first question that was presented to this august personage who was too busy to attend to it himself, but had to hand it over to his clerk—the first question in the proper discharge of his official duty was, “Will such an expedition as that, of a fraction over a mile an hour on a route where the mail is being carried at the rate of two and seventy-six one-hundredths miles per hour, require additional horses and carriers?” I appeal to you, gentlemen, would it? It was expedited so to a rate of speed very little faster than an ordinary horse can walk, and the Government was required to pay for that expedition $31,159 a year. Originally, the rate of speed was under the walking time of a good horse. Some of you gentlemen on the jury know something about horses and what they can do and what they ought to do. Mr. Greene and Mr. Horigan both know. In considering these facts you have got to apply to them your practical knowledge drawn from your knowledge of the laws of nature.

In passing it will not divert us at all from the main point under consideration to call your attention to the fact that this $31,159.33 for expedition and this gross sum of $52,033.33 a year was paid for expediting and increasing what? The Mineral Park and Pioche route? Yes. But, what was going over the Mineral Park and Pioche route? An empty mail pouch. $52,033 paid for carrying an empty mail pouch, and of that sum $31,159 paid for expediting the time at which that empty mail pouch was carried. Where is the proof? The tables of revenue show it. They deny that those tables are entirely safe guides. What else show the emptiness of the mail pouch? We have the mail bills on that route. For thirty-nine days in 1879, according to these mail bills, less than a through letter a day passed over this $50,000 route.

Mr. INGERSOLL. How many days?

Mr. MERRICK. Thirty-nine days in 1879, if I mistake not.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I only remember nineteen.

Mr. MERRICK. I am coming to your nineteen. For thirty-nine days less than one letter, AND FOR NINETEEN OF THOSE DAYS NOT A SINGLE LETTER. They were betting at the termini that no letters would come. I read from page 1620, of Caldwell Wright's examination:

Q. Do you know the quantity of mail matter in the latter part of 1878?—A. It was very small, sir.

Q. How small?—A. Sometimes there was nothing.

Q. In the early part of 1879 how was it?—A. About the same, sir.

Q. In the latter part of 1879?—A. About the same.

Q. How was it in 1880?—A. The same.

Q. Did you have occasion at any time to examine this mail in 1878 and 1879, along with the people there?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How did you come to examine it?—A. I made a bet of the drinks how much it contained very often.

Q. What was the bet?—A. It was two to one there was nothing in the mail.

Two to one that there was nothing in the mail! The empty mail pouch had the advantage out there, but here at the Post-Office Department, with Mr. Brady in office and these contractors surrounding him, prepared to make their false affidavits and give him the leverage to pry open the doors of the Treasury, that empty mail pouch carried such valuable mail matter that it merited to be expedited a little more than a mile an hour at a cost of thirty-odd thousand dollars to the Federal Government.

Can such things be,
And overcome us like a summer cloud,
Without our special wonder?

Such things do not lie in the pathway of ordinarily honest men, and such things cannot occur under the administration of an honest official. All the possibilities are excluded by the plain reasoning of every sensible man.

Do you believe, gentlemen of the jury, that Brady exercised the power with which he was intrusted to determine whether additional stock and carriers were needed on expedition of a little over a mile an hour? Don't you believe that on such a small expedition as that Brady knew, when there was an affidavit before him giving propositions that would draw from the Treasury for that expedition $31,159.33, that that affidavit was false? Had it been expedited to a reasonably rapid rate of speed there might have been some apparent justification; but when expedited from two and seventy-six one-hundredths miles to three and eighty-six one-hundredths miles there is not a man on that jury that believes that Brady acted honestly or that he was not in conspiracy with the men that got the money; no, not even the two or three hoped-for deliverers referred to by the counsel.

Now let us look at the Canyon City route, No. 44160. It was originally one trip a week and the time was one and ninety-nine one-hundredths miles an hour. How fast can a man walk; how many miles an hour? Certainly one and ninety one-hundredths. Any one of you could walk faster than that and make the time required even if you dallied along the path. The cost of one trip was $2,888. On December 23, 1878, two trips were added and expedition from one and ninety one-hundredths miles to two and fifty-three one-hundredths miles per hour; considerably less than a mile an hour. The expedition did not put it up to three miles an hour. We will leave out the fractions. It did not reach three miles an hour after expedition. For requiring that mail to be carried in less than three miles an hour and two trips they gave the contractor $18,612. This order was consolidated, and, therefore, to get what was paid for expedition we must deduct the cost of two trips from the principal sum, $18,612, which leaves for the expedition $12,836. That is only the beginning. Twelve thousand eight hundred and thirty-six dollars was paid for expediting the route up to a little over two and a half miles an hour. What would you charge any man who would condemn you to ride twelve miles at so slow a rate as two and a half miles an hour?

Mr. GREENE (a juror.) Let me ask you a question. This time was increased from one and ninety one hundredths to two and sixty one-hundredths miles an hour. Does that mean twelve hours of travel daily or twenty-four hours a day? If the man had to go through in twelve hours that would make a great deal of difference.

Mr. MERRICK. I do not know. I have not got the schedule.

Mr. BLISS. They have got to go through in a certain length of time. It is not a question of twelve hours or twenty-four hours.

Mr. MERRICK. They have got to go through in a certain length of time, and I am talking about miles per hour.

Mr. GREENE. If they had to make the trip in daylight instead of day and night, would it not take just double as many? What would be the difference?

Mr. MERRICK. There would not be any. Suppose you had to travel night and day. The point I make is this: Where originally you had to travel at the rate of one and ninety one-hundredths miles ought you to be paid anything extra for being required to go at the rate of two and fifty-three one-hundredths?

The COURT. The question is, Would it take any more men or horses?

Mr. MERRICK. Would it take any more men or horses? Do you think it would? [To Mr. Greene.] You know all about horses. [To Mr. Horigan.] You also know all about horses. Would it take any more horses to go over a route, regardless of length, in two and fifty-three-hundredths miles per hour than it would to go over the same route in one and ninety one-hundredths miles per hour? By the expedited schedule, in order to make the time and come within the schedule, it was necessary to go from one terminus to the other terminus at the rate of two and fifty-three one-hundredths miles per hour. Would it take any more horses to do the one than to do the other? If a horse was to walk the distance, could you restrain him so as to keep him from not going faster than two and a half miles an hour, unless you, Mr. Horigan, shod him with heavy shoes?

The FOREMAN (Mr. Crane). It would depend a good deal upon the roads out there.

Mr. MERRICK. It might depend somewhat upon the roads, but you are going over the same roads and under the same conditions in each case. You are going over the same route, the same bridges, and the same mountains, and it would not make any difference! But I do not care if you were to climb the Alps at the Simplon Pass, I say you would climb them at a rate faster than two and a half miles an hour on any horse you would find in Switzerland or Italy. It is absurd on its face. It is ridiculous. And yet for this there was an order allowing $12,836. Now we will see how profits grew under Brady's nurturing hand. In July, 1880, four trips were added at a cost of $28,666.66. Let us see how much expedition amounted to in the end. The first additional trips cost $18,612, and the second additional trips, $28,666. Total, $50,166.66. One trip cost $2,888; seven trips cost $20,216; $20,216 from $50,166 leave $29,550 paid for expedition which was a little over half a mile an hour. Mr. Crane, can you stand that? Can any man stand that who lives in the city of Washington after the proof in this case of ring and combination, and who knows of the rings and the combinations that fatten in this city to its eternal disgrace, and that live and flourish in the very shadow of the Capitol? Can any man stand this who knows how the property of the people here has been burdened with taxes to pay a debt, of which one of these rings kept and wasted more than 66 per cent.? Rings flourish here everywhere, and after the proof in this case as to this combination, as to this route, and this route alone, I say there is not a man on that jury, not even the two or three hoped-for deliverers, that can doubt about the ring that existed in this case. I take these as sample routes, and I will revise my calculation as to the Tongue River route.

In this same connection, before I come to take up in broader shape the affidavits, I will call your attention to other extraordinary expeditions granted by Mr. Brady on affidavits which stood solitary and alone as against the petitions on file.

On route 41119, from Toquerville to Adairville, the petitions asked for forty-eight hours. Bear in mind that Brady protects himself behind petitions and Congressional solicitations, and that he says he did these acts because he was asked to do them by petitions. The eloquent counsel of Stephen W. Dorsey, echoing the language of Dorsey on the stand, asked, "Have not we, the people, the right of petition? Is not this a free country?" I answer, Yes; it is. The people have a right to petition; but, Mr. Brady, Mr. Dorsey, and these defendants all of them, if you value so highly that right of petition it is because you expect the petitions to be considered and answered. Let us see how Mr. Brady, in the discharge of his functions, and whilst this carnival of corruption was going on in the Post-Office Department, regarded petitions. Every petition on the route from Toquerville to Adairville asked for forty-eight hours. The oath of Peck, made January 22, 1879, was filed June 25, 1879, and I call your attention to the fact that Miner wrote the body of that oath and Rerdell filled up the figures. I shall have something further to say about that by and by. On July 8, 1879, there was an order of expedition (page 949) to reduce the time from sixty hours to what? To forty-eight hours as the petitions asked? No. To reduce the time from sixty hours to thirty-three hours, and to pay $12,718.22, being pro rata. Pro rata on what? Pro rata on an affidavit asking for thirty-three hours; pro rata on an affidavit based upon a thirty-three hours schedule, and being the only paper in the case before Brady that asked for any such expedition.

Now, if the increase of men and animals depend upon the time, had Brady expedited this route to forty-eight hours instead of to thirty-three hours, there could not have been of course as many men and horses required on a route thus expedited on the long time of forty-eight hours as would be required on a route expedited to the shorter time of thirty-three hours. I will read to you the affidavit:

SIR: The number of men and animals which are necessary to carry the mail on route 41119, seven times a week on the present schedule, is three (3) men and six (6) animals. The number necessary to carry the mail on said route on a schedule of thirty-three hours, seven times a week, is five (5) men and eighteen (18) animals.

How many would it have been on a forty-eight hour schedule? The order was:

Reduce the time from sixty hours to thirty-three hours, and pay $12,718, being pro rata.

Pro rata, according to the given quantities in this corrupt paper. The original cost of the route was $1,168. The contractor was Peck. Nephi Johnson was the subcontractor, and received $1,127. (Page 970.) The route was raised in all to $19,311.33. Peck's oath was on the basis of thirty-three hours, and, as I have said to you, this is the only paper in the case that speaks of thirty-three hours. Why did not Brady give the people what they asked for? If petitions are so sacred, why should the official here in Washington, covered by petitions asking for forty-eight hours, break from under that covering, and tell the people to go to the winds and give them thirty-three hours, give them more than they wanted, more than they needed, and take from the Treasury more than the people asked to be taken or declared was necessary to be taken for that service? Don't come here and tell this jury that you respected the petitions so much, and attempt to shield yourself behind them, when you have scattered them to the winds, because if you had followed them you could not have taken from the Treasury as much money as you otherwise did. If they were the voice of the people, according to the theory advanced by the other side, they ought to have been obeyed. I do not myself, gentlemen, entertain that high respect for petitions that the counsel for the defendants seem to entertain. I believe, as one of the witnesses said, that unless it be a petition for the petitioners to pay money you can get a petition for anything. But I am speaking now of their regard for petitions, and their respect for petitions. Why did not Brady give the people what the people petitioned for? And why did he give them what they did not ask for when it cost so much more than what they did ask for would have cost? Why was this? Why was it done upon the affidavit of a contractor and upon that affidavit alone? Has Brady explained it? Has anybody explained it? If it has been explained I have not heard of it.

I heard from Brady one attempted explanation of his conduct in the administration of his duties that struck me with amazement, and that was that whilst he respected these affidavits he did not mind them much. He had a sort of notion that they might be right, but he had a rule of his own to pay for service, which was from $25 to $35 a mile. It struck me with amazement, for this reason: That every time Brady put that rule of his in operation he violated the law. The law had prescribed the rule of payment, and did not leave it for Brady to prescribe. The law had said, in behalf of the contractor, that if expedition is ordered and additional stock and carriers are necessary, or if the Second Assistant decides that they are necessary, you shall be paid, and the amount you shall be paid shall depend upon no arbitrary rule of the Second Assistant as to the cost per mile of the service, but shall depend upon the proportion between the stock and carriers required on the original schedule and the stock and carriers required on the new schedule; that the proportion shall be preserved; that there shall be a flexible rule suited to all conditions and all cases; if you come in and show that on extraordinary expedition an extraordinary number of stock and carriers is required to perform the expedited service you shall be paid an extraordinary sum; but if a small number of stock and carriers are required to perform the expedited schedule, you shall receive only a small sum; there shall be no iron rule, but there shall be a sliding scale depending on the facts. When Brady undertakes to tell this court and the jury that he had a rule of his own, he undertakes to tell the court and the jury that he violated the law and trampled it under foot. And more than that: He had no such rule. He never mentioned it when examined by the committee of Congress in 1880, as he states, I think, in his testimony. It is a new device, a trumped-up experiment, and I wonder at the lack of wisdom of Brady in trumping up such an excuse, or at his counsel in consultation not advising him that it would not do to manufacture that sort of a thing for use before an intelligent court and jury.

The people asked expedition to forty-eight hours and he replied with thirty-three. His great love for the people has been expressed on the other side, and it has been claimed that he was looking out for the people. The people said forty-eight hours in a variety of petitions. If Brady was looking out for the good of the people, why did he not heed the voice of the people. Why did he turn a deaf ear to the voice of the people, and hearken to the contractor in the form of a serpent whispering in his ear and leading him to official delinquency? For the thirty-three hours was whispered by the contractor, and by the contractor alone. But oh, the magic of the thirty-three hours in comparison with the forty-eight hours! It was the open sesame to the door of the Treasury, and therefore Brady seized it, and the Treasury he was to guard for the people he loved so much was opened by his co-conspirators and himself. There is no other solution of this transaction.

But the worst remains. Who wrote that affidavit? Miner. Who filled up this affidavit? Rerdell. The affidavit, gentlemen, was signed in blank. By whose order did Rerdell fill it up? S. W. Dorsey's. So Rerdell says. I read from the cross-examination of S. W. Dorsey, on page 3945:

Q. Did you give Rerdell directions as to filling up one of these blank affidavits?—
A. Well, the only recollection I have about that is that he telegraphed me, or wrote me, when I was West, in 1879, that the department required a shorter schedule on two routes, I think, but what reply I made to him I don't remember.

"Don't remember!" You will have occasion to hear that phrase from my lips several times. You heard it from the witness-stand until you were tired of it, but I am obliged to repeat it. I never saw such an exhibition of bad memories in my life. Probably they were never equaled since the trial of Queen Caroline, your honor, when those Italian witnesses testified, and Lords Brougham and Denman, and the rest, put them through their cross-examinations. Whilst they testified on examination-in-chief promptly to whatever inquiries were addressed to them by the counsel prosecuting the Queen, when they came into the hands of the learned advocates of the Queen their answer was "Non mi ricordo." Your honor remembers it. This answer was so frequently given that one of the witnesses came to be called throughout the trial Signior Non Mi Ricordo. It is well understood that in our professional literature the phrase non mi ricordo is derived from its frequent repetition at that trial. The witnesses for the defense in this case seem to have known and entered into the spirit of this famous answer and to have spoken it with a vigor that showed them to have no compeers that have ever appeared in court for non-recollection, unless it was their prototypes in falsifying the Italian witnesses against the Queen.

Now, Dorsey says, first, "I don't remember whether I gave him instructions to fill up that affidavit or not."

Q. Did you not direct him to fill up a blank affidavit and preserve the proportion of 150 to 200 per cent. ?—A. Oh, I don't think I did.

Q. What is your recollection about giving him directions as to filling up the affidavit ?—A. My recollection is that I did not, but I don't know ; it is possible that I might have done it.

Possible that he might have done it ; possible that he might have given Rerdell directions to fill up a blank affidavit. First, he does not remember ; next, "I don't think I did ;" next, when pressed as to his recollection, "Oh, I may have done it."

Mr. INGERSOLL. What page are you reading from ?

Mr. MERRICK. Page 3945, and then on page 3946 :

Q. I ask for your reason, why you are sure you did not if you have no recollection of it ?—A. Because—he [that is Rerdell] had charge of that business entirely, and attended to it entirely.

Says he—

Q. Have you any recollection upon this subject ?

Still pressing him all along :

A. I have no recollection about it, but I am quite sure I did not direct him to do any such thing.

Q. You are quite sure you did not ?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. If you have no recollection, why are you sure you did not ?—A. I don't believe I did.

Q. I ask for your reason ; why you are sure you did not if you have no recollection of it ?—A. Because he had charge of that business entirely and attended to it entirely.

He does not give as his reason that he would not have done such a thing. He does not say, "I ordered him to do it," or, "I did not," but "My reason is that Rerdell had entire charge of that whole business."

Q. Rerdell got no benefit from it, did he ?—A. None that I know of.

Here then was Rerdell filling up this blank affidavit, serving a master that had taught him the ways of iniquity. Mr. Ingersoll complained of Mr. Bliss for saying that Dorsey had brought Rerdell up. Maybe Dorsey did not bring him up ; not in the ordinary acceptation of the term. But this is in the evidence : That Dorsey found him floating on the ocean of life, a needy young man, had him put in office here, made him serve him (Dorsey) for years whilst he was paid out of the treasury of the District in the office to which Dorsey had had him appointed, and then took him to his bosom in his service, carried him on through this conspiracy, nurtured him in the ways that he (Dorsey) had ; taught him the practices that he (Dorsey) had adopted for getting money ; and, when I come to that subject I will show you, gentlemen of the jury, that although Dorsey may not have brought him up from infancy he took him in the first years of his early manhood, and if Rerdell is corrupt and has done corrupt things, as he admits by his plea of guilty in this case, he did them skillfully according to the teaching of Dorsey, did them at Dorsey's bidding, and did them for Dorsey's benefit. I did not offer Rerdell as an angel. I did not offer him on the witness-stand as a man without stain. I offered him as Dorsey's co-conspirator. Rerdell had pleaded guilty. He was waiting for his sentence. I offered the man that had pleaded guilty and told you so, told you his stain, and I offered him because I knew that when Dorsey came to strut before this jury in the white feathers of purity, Rerdell would help me pluck out the false decoration that he wore, and show you what he is and what he has been. I will come to that, and it will not take me two days to get through with it as it did the counsel for the defendants to discuss Rerdell.

Now Dorsey "Don't know;" "Don't recollect;" thinks "He might have," "Don't know whether he directed Rerdell to fill this up," "Thinks he did not," "Pretty sure he did not," "Don't recollect," thinks he "Might have done so." The only difference between him and the Italian witnesses is in multiplication of replies all circling around non mi ricordo. For whose benefit did Rerdell fill up the affidavit? S. W. Dorsey's. Dorsey says so himself.

Gentlemen, upon this affidavit I want to call your attention to one other thing—the absurdity that the affidavit leads to, and I want you to attend to this. Mr. Woodward, one of the most efficient agents of the Government I have ever known to be in the public service, under the Garfield administration went down to the roots of this matter and told the Government that the very core and heart of the civil service was being eaten by these worms. Mr. Woodward made these calculations which I hold in my hand in reference to these affidavits, showing their absurdity, and handed them to me. It almost made it necessary for me to go back and reconstruct my forgotten mathematical knowledge in order to comprehend them. But I have endeavored to reduce them to language so that you can readily understand them.

On the schedule of sixty hours, which was the original schedule, upon the route I am now discussing, each horse would have to make forty-four miles of daily travel. Brother Bliss developed that to you tully. Seven times a week, at sixty hours, says the affidavit, three men and six animals must necessarily be employed. Seven times a week at thirty-three hours, five men and eighteen animals must be necessarily employed.

Now, let us take the first statement and see whether that is true or not. For, bear in mind that it is to the interest of the contractor, and he gets more money the less the number he swears are required on the existing schedule and the greater the number he swears are required on the proposed schedule. The lower he reduces the number of men and animals on the existing schedule the better it is for him; the larger he makes the number of men and animals on the proposed schedule the better it is for him. He may cheat at one end by making the number of men and animals on the proposed schedule very large, or he may cheat at the other end by making the number of men and animals on the present schedule small; or he may cheat at both ends by making the number required on the present schedule very small and the number required on the proposed schedule very large. Now, let us see. The affidavit says it requires, for seven times a week at sixty hours, three men and six animals, equal to nine; that is the present schedule; for seven times a week on thirty three hours (that is the proposed schedule), five men and eighteen animals are required, equal to twenty-three. The route was one hundred and thirty-two miles long, and the affidavit therefore contemplated three hundred and sixty-five round trips each year, each round trip making two hundred and sixty-four miles traveled each day.

The COURT. Were there seven trips a week?

Mr. MERRICK. Seven trips a week; yes, sir. Now, I want your honor to help us along with this.

The COURT. Go on.

Mr. MERRICK. By asking me any questions, and if I cannot answer them, I will turn them over to Brother Bliss, and if he cannot answer them Mr. Woodward will help him.

The COURT. You will have to do all the answering now.

Mr. MERRICK. I am getting along in that direction pretty well.

The route was one hundred and thirty-two miles long. Twice one hundred and thirty-two is two hundred and sixty-four miles of travel each day. The carrier had to go both ways each day; that is, he had to start out from both ends each day. On a schedule of sixty hours there were but six horses, you recollect, to do the work. So each horse was required to travel each day one-sixth of two hundred and sixty-four miles, or forty-four miles per day, according to that original schedule. Is not that absurd? Have you any horse that can do it? Each horse had to travel forty-four miles a day for three hundred and sixty-five days in the year. But three men only were required; hence, each man was compelled to travel twice as far as a horse, or eighty-eight miles a day. According to that affidavit each horse had to travel forty-four miles a day, and each man, according to that affidavit, had to travel eighty-eight miles a day. Moreover, the schedule was sixty hours a day, making one hundred and twenty hours of daily travel—forty hours of travel daily for each man.

Mr. CRANE (foreman of the jury.) What route is that?

Mr. MERRICK. Toquerville to Adairville.

Mr. CRANE. Do you mean to say that those men cheated themselves?

Mr. MERRICK. They did not cheat themselves; they told a lie. The less the number required on the original schedule the more money they would get.

The COURT. I think the foreman does not distinguish between the affidavit and the actual number performing the service.

Mr. MERRICK. The affidavit is false.

Mr. CRANE. No doubt about it.

Mr. MERRICK. I am showing you that what they swore to was absurd; that if it only took six horses and three men, as they swore, each horse would have to travel forty-four miles daily and each man eighty-eight miles daily. Therefore the man that swore to that swore to a manifest and palpable falsehood; that is all there is of that. It is absurd. And Brady, with that affidavit before him, must have known its statement to be false, if he gave the subject that judicial examination which the counsel says belongs to his character as a quasi-judicial officer; or if he gave it any examination at all, and, under the law, he was required to give it thought and inquiry, he must have known it to be willful and deliberate perjury. I presume he did not give these affidavits much examination. He said to his co-conspirators, "Preserve your proportions and whack away at the Treasury; only just put in some petitions here, and don't make a fool of me on the record; give me something to stand on, so that if any of these investigating committees come along it will look as if it was all right. Do that, my friends, and give me the lever, and open shall fly the doors." That is about the way Brady talked. Of course, he wanted to keep his record clear. I think if he had examined this affidavit, probably he might have said, "We don't want this on the record; just make up another, but preserve the proportions." Through cold and heat, through snow and sleet, over hill and dale, through the woods, across the streams, beyond the plains, the sleepless carrier rode forty hours in each and every twenty-four marked by the circuit of the sun. It must be so, for John M. Peck swears it is, and by that oath Brady measured the cost of expedition and took from the Treasury of the United States $12,718.22. Poor Peck! Peck swore to the statements in that affidavit. No, gentlemen, Peck did not swear to that. As a member of that conspiracy Peck had little to do, because his sun was setting; he was descending on the other side of life's hill, and was soon to see the light no more. He was beguiled into swearing to affidavits in blank that his co-conspirators might have them in stock; and the recorded lie, when the books are opened on the last day, will be a lie not against Peck, but against Stephen W. Dorsey, who ordered it to be written above Peck's name.

The COURT. How was it at the other end of the same affidavit?

Mr. MERRICK. I did not make that calculation. I only wanted to show the falsehood of the first statement as to the existing schedule. I think probably at the other end it was also false.

Mr. BLISS. As your honor has asked the question, I think I stated in my summing up that on the other end each horse would have to travel one and forty-one hundredths miles a day, or something like that.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Mr. Bliss has made a statement, and now I will state it;

Mr. BLISS. I am corrected. It was fourteen miles.

Mr. MERRICK. Fourteen miles. I was going to make the statement.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I think Mr. Bliss had better keep his seat after that.

Mr. WILSON. There is a good deal of difference between one and forty-one hundredths and fourteen.

The COURT. That is a moderate performance.

Mr. INGERSOLL. There is a vast difference between fourteen miles and a mile and a quarter.

Mr. MERRICK. The other end of the affidavit is all right; the number required on the expedited schedule is all right; the cheating was in putting down the number on the present schedule, because the smaller you make that the more money you get. If the other end was all right, but this end was all wrong, it added infinitely to the amount of money you drew.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Not quite infinitely.

Mr. MERRICK. Well, I take that word from Mr. Ingersoll, who used it so frequently: "It sounds well." Think how the women's hearts must have throbbed in response to his "infinitely untrue," "infinitely sacred." I do not disparage the gentleman's eloquence; I acknowledge it.

Mr. DAVIDGE. He was not speaking of figures.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Figures of speech.

Mr. MERRICK. His figures of speech were so flowery and became so charming, so sweet, and were so heartily appreciated that his wonderful words were metamorphosed, and I saw them, after they had fallen from his lips, blooming upon his table [alluding to a bouquet of flowers that was on Mr. Ingersoll's table when making his argument to the jury].

There was a remarkable order on this route to which I desire to call your attention. On July 8, 1879, Brady passed an order to increase four trips from August 1, 1879, and expedite from sixty hours to thirty-three hours (page 949). This was on the whole route. On that very date there was in the office of Brady a notice that Adairville had been discontinued as a post-office. This notice appears to have been filed in Brady's office June 19, 1879. Adairville was one of the termini of the route.

The COURT. What do you say was the length of the route?

Mr. BLISS. One hundred and thirty-two miles, sir.

Mr. MERRICK. Bear in mind there was in his office a notice that Adairville had ceased to be a post-office. On the 14th of July an order was passed to curtail the route to end at Pahreah, and allow the contractor one month's extra pay; that is, pay not only on his original contract, but also on increase and expedition, when, in fact, on the very date of the order of increase no mail went over that part of the route, or could go, because the office had been discontinued. Brady's offense was in granting increase and expedition on part of the route over which the mail could not run, and he knew it could not run, because of the discontinuance of the post-office at a time prior to the time that he made the order for expedition; and when French granted the order for extra pay he was granting it on Brady's fraudulent order allowing expedition on a route which he knew had been discontinued.

I come now, gentlemen, to another route, and as it is approaching the hour of adjournment, and to-morrow is a day upon which some of you may desire to be absent from the court, I am frank to say that my own wish is that if the court should wish to adjourn I will be glad if it will accommodate you.

The COURT. Well, gentlemen, to-morrow, I think, is a legal holiday. But whether legal or not, the court has the power to make it so, so far as his jurisdiction is concerned, and we will adjourn until Thursday morning.

Thereupon (at 3 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the court adjourned until Thursday morning, May 31, 1883, at 11 o'clock.

THURSDAY, MAY 31, 1883.

The court met at 11 o'clock.

Present, counsel for the Government and for the defendants.

Mr. MERRICK. [Resuming.] With submission to the court and gentlemen of the jury: At this point of the argument I think I may as well diverge a little from its proper direction to explain briefly a condition of fact to which I have heretofore called your attention, and which seems to be questioned by indications from the other side. I desire not only to call it to your attention, but also to call it to the attention of the court, by reason, may it please your honor, of its possible application to a proposition of law brought forward by my associates as to the limitations upon the power of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General under the act of the 7th of April, 1880.

I stated to the jury that in the department, although Brady in passing his orders had confounded expedition and trips in one order, in my humble opinion, contrary to the law, which required him to keep them separate, yet that nevertheless in the consolidated order there enters the manifestation of the exercise of his power with regard to expedition as well as with regard to trips, and that notwithstanding he had made these consolidated orders the department had all the way through kept the expedition and the trips separate as far as they possibly could, and that this fact had been made apparent by the records in the Inspection Division of the department. To be a little more specific; Brady, for instance, where he passed one order on a route upon which the mail was being carried once a week, would sometimes treble or quadruple the number of trips per week, for which additional service under the law he could pay for each additional trip an amount equivalent to the original price of one trip, and at the same time order expedition upon the new service, and then having made it three trips a week, say, on an expedited schedule, he would thereafter pass another order making it six trips a week and double the amount for which it was being carried at three trips a week, thus doubling the price of the expedition and doubling also the price of the trips. The other side have contended that in this operation he was exercising a power under that provision of law which authorized him to increase the trips. I submit that he was not only exercising the power under the provision of law which authorized him to increase the trips, but he was exercising an extraordinary and exceptional power under that provision of law which authorized him to grant expedition, for the reason that when he multiplied the trips, the sum being paid for the trips thus multiplied, being a sum made up of a previous multiplication of trips and expedition, the expedition by the multiplication was carried forward and entered into and became part of the compensation to be paid for the service on a new and increased schedule.

Were those trips and expeditions kept separate in the department? The following orders will show: On route 35051, from Bismarck to Tongue River, the original pay was $2,350. On December 23, 1878, it was increased to three trips at a cost of $4,700, and on the same date was expedited to sixty-five hours at a cost of $27,950. On August 2, 1879, it was increased three trips at a cost of $35,000. Total pay, $70,000. The order of Brady of July, 1880, 134 T, defense, page 2908, shows that $55,900 of the above amount was for expedition. If counsel will consult that page of the record to which I refer they will find that by Brady's order he there set forth over his official signature that of the $70,000 paid for service on the Tongue River route $55,900 was for expedition. I want you, gentlemen, to bear that specially in mind. I want you to bear it in mind with a view to what I shall presently say to you in reference to the different condition that required expedition and trips. I want you to bear it in mind with a view to its application to the theory that Brady has announced here from the witness-stand, that there ought to be a daily mail over every star route; to the theory which he announced here as the rule of his action by which he was desiring to accomplish the end of having a daily mail over every route; for I will show you, gentlemen of the jury, that, had he been practically honest in the administration of his functions, and the discharge of his duties with the view that he now swears that he then had, he could have put a daily mail on every route in this indictment and have saved the Government thousands of dollars that he expended for useless expedition. I will show you that a daily mail would have given greater facilities to the people than expedition; and I will show you that on routes running through the wilderness, where the mail was in fact the pioneer of civilization, if instead of being expedited when no one on the face of the earth cared whether they got their letters and papers in the morning or at noon, or at night, he could by increasing the number of trips have given the sparse and scattered population at either end of the route and along its course their letters and papers every day at a greatly less cost than he was paying to transmit these letters and papers three times a week. I shall ask you to infer from that fact two things: First, that Brady in stating his opinion on the stand, under oath, condemned his own practice. Second, realizing that what he has said in reference to that particular need of the service as true, and not having accounted for his failure to adopt practically his own theory, I claim that the abandonment of that theory must have been from causes of corruption, because as he said in reference to Tongue River, there was no process by which that route, taken so low, could be raised in its price to an amount that would justify the carriers in continuing it simply by adding trips; that something else had to be done; and that on these other routes, as on that route, he added expedition to rob the Treasury for the benefit of his co-conspirators.

Again, on route 40104, from Mineral Park to Pioche, the original pay was $2,982. December 24, 1878, there was an increase of two trips and expedition to sixty hours at a cost of $19,318. July 13, 1879, it was increased four trips at a cost of $29,000. Total pay, $52,933.33. How they bloomed and how they developed under his genial smile. In the morning but a bud, the dew falls upon it, the kiss and the rays of the sun come on it, and at noonday it is a full-blown rose. The smile and the kiss of Brady came upon these fraudulent buds and behold they bloomed and blossomed like the rose. The order of Brady of April 22, 1880, 155 K, defense, page 2944, shows that of this $52,033.33, $31,159.33 of the amount was for expedition only.

On route 38145, from Garland to Parrott City, curtailed to end at Ojo Caliente, you recollect the pay was for one trip $1,658.40. On April 29, 1879, it was increased two trips, at a cost of $3,316.80; the same day it was expedited to fifty hours, at a cost of $8,457.84. On February 26, 1881, it was increased four trips, expedition having previously been added. These trips cost $17,910. Total pay, $31,343.76. Now, look at the order passed by Brady in April, 1881, 374 F, defense, page 3056, and you will find that over his sign-manual, as Second Assistant Postmaster-General, he says $19,739 of the total pay was for expedition. I take these, gentlemen, as sample routes. I can only deal in this argument that I am making to you with sample routes and specimens.

Mr. WILSON. What is the page to which you refer?

Mr. MERRICK. I am glad to hear the learned counsel inquire the page, for it is a partial assurance that he will now learn something about this record. Probably after having diligently searched it, if he should again come before the jury by any possibility to argue the case, he would not commit so many errors as he did in his argument. The page is 3056 and the exhibit is 374 F, defense.

Mr. WILSON. Turning to page 3056, I find something there signed by French, and no remissions made.

Mr. MERRICK. Look at 374 F, and see how it is. If I have made a mistake, I will correct it.

Mr. WILSON. I have examined page 3056.

Mr. BLISS. It is a recital on a jacket of deductions by French.

Mr. MERRICK. Is it signed by French?

Mr. BLISS. Yes.

Mr. MERRICK. That order was not signed by Brady, then, but by Brady's immediate subordinate in Brady's office, in conformity with the rule Brady had prescribed in signing the orders.

Mr. WILSON. French was acting as Second Assistant.

Mr. HENKLE. That is not taking it back.

Mr. MERRICK. It is taking it back.

Mr. WILSON. I simply wanted to call attention to it.

Mr. MERRICK. [To Mr. Bliss.] Look at the jacket and see what it is.

Mr. BLISS. It is signed by French.

Mr. MERRICK. It is an error on my notes, then. I am glad the counsel has found out something in this way. He found out that that order is signed by French. I am glad he has found out something, even though that something may correct a passing and unimportant error of mine.

I am glad he has made one statement to the jury that is beyond the reach of criticism.

Mr. WILSON. I know you want to be right, and so I will call your attention to another matter. The paper on page 3056 is an application for remissions, and no remissions were made.

Mr. MERRICK. I did not say there were any made.

Mr. WILSON. All right.

Mr. MERRICK. But what is recited there? Do you want to deceive the jury?

Mr. WILSON. All right.

Mr. MERRICK. Is it recited there, sir, that so much was given for expedition?

Mr. WILSON. Read it and see.

Mr. MERRICK. $19,739 for expedition, according to that order. What did I say about remissions? I said that Brady had put that sum in the order.

Mr. WILSON. You say now it was French.

Mr. MERRICK. No. The first one I spoke of was French's—the one to which you referred. Brady's are the others.

Mr. BLISS. Here is one of Brady's. [Indicating order.]

Mr. WILSON. What is the page?

Mr. MERRICK. 2908. Take it home and study it, and correct me tomorrow if I am wrong. It will take me a week to get through at this rate.

As I said, gentlemen, I can only deal with specimens, for I am classifying this evidence in order that I may not too much trespass upon your time and patience, or weary you in the giving of that considerate attention which you have thus far bestowed upon me, and for which I am so much obliged.

Recurring now to the regular line of my argument, I call your attention to the route from Rawlins to White River, in order that you may see more fully developed how much respect Brady paid to these petitions which he now holds up as a shield against the lance of justice. The schedule was one hundred and eight hours; the route was one hundred and sixty-five miles in length, and there was one trip a week. The time was equal to a mile and a half an hour, which was subsequently expedited to a little over three and a half miles an hour at a cost of $8,600! The public, stimulated by the contractors, according to the proof in this case, had asked for a schedule of eighty-four hours. It is in proof in this case that the agents of the contractors were along that route, and I believe that one of the co-conspirators himself, Mr. Rerdell, was on that route. Am I right?

Mr. BLISS. Yes.

Mr. MERRICK. He went out there to get up petitions. Bear in mind that although Rerdell is a witness for the Government, he is still a defendant, having pleaded guilty as indicted, and I treat him both as defendant and witness. Rerdell was on this route with other agents of these contractors, seeking to get petitions from the people for increase and expedition. Stimulated then by one of these co-conspirators, namely, Mr. Rerdell, and stimulated by the agencies employed by the united band of defendants, the people along that route asked Brady to give them expedition, and to reduce the running time from one hundred and eight to eighty-four hours. There was not a single paper in the case, if I am not mistaken. I speak now of the papers upon which Brady acted and the papers filed in his office prior to 1881. There was not a paper, gentlemen, not a petition, not the scrape of a pen, asking for anything but eighty-four hours. Now, consider this, gentlemen of the jury, and, Mr. Foreman, I want your attention to it. Consider that a reduction of schedule from one hundred and eight to eighty-four hours would have involved a very slight increase in stock and carriers, if any at all. The time could have been reduced to eighty-four hours from one hundred and eight, and probably no additional stock and carriers would have been needed at all, or, if any were needed, the number would have been very small indeed. But if the number of stock and carriers were not increased, according to the section giving this exceptional power to Brady which I explained to you, there could have been no additional pay, and the additional pay, if any was allowed, would depend upon the number of stock and carriers necessary on the new schedule, and consequently the additional pay would depend upon the shortness of the time of the new schedule, because the stock and carriers had to be multiplied and increased, according to the diminution of the time. What does Brady do? The only paper suggesting forty-five hours, as I have stated, was the affidavit of John W. Dorsey, filed April 26, 1879. On that affidavit an order was made May 1, 1879, increasing the service to two trips, at a cost of $3,400, and expediting it to what? To eighty-four hours, as the people asked? To eighty-four hours, as the petitions declared the wish and desire of the people to be, and up to the full measure of their needs and requirements? No. The schedule was changed and reduction was made from one hundred and eight hours, not to eighty-four hours, but to forty-five hours, and for that reduction $8,600 was paid to the contractor, whereas if Brady had granted the requests of that great people whose right of petition is so lauded, and behind whose petitions Brady now cowers from the piercing eye of justice, there would have been no money withdrawn from the public Treasury, or, if any, an exceedingly small sum. But these men were not dealing in small sums. They were acting under the sense of that security which comes to those who in safety perpetrate iniquity through a series of years, and stimulated by the prospect of the accumulation of wealth which they hoped robbery might bring without being followed by that retributive justice you are here to administer. My Brother Bliss calls my attention to a point to illustrate what I say. Perkins writes—to whom, to Rerdell or to Brady?

Mr. BLISS. To Rerdell.

Mr. MERRICK. The same thing. He is a better man, but he is one of the conspirators. He says:

DEAR SIR: I have the tri-weekly mail started and in running order and will run on eighty-four hours as per agreement at increased speed.

This is what Perkins, the subcontractor, said:

I want increased pay according to contract. In running in forty-five hours it would take double the men and stock, and I expect if I run it that way to get $10,200.

He says it would take twice the number of men and horses to perform service on the route in forty-five hours, and he wants, if he has to perform it in that time, ten thousand and odd dollars. We do not need any Perkins, Mr. Foreman, to tell us such a thing as that. We need only to put in operation the common understanding of men.

Mr. HORIGAN (a juror). Forty-five miles an hour is pretty fast time.

Mr. MERRICK. Forty-five hours.

Mr. HORIGAN. You said forty-five miles an hour.

Mr. MERRICK. Pardon me. I am much obliged to you for correcting me.

The COURT. You did make that slip.

Mr. MERRICK. Of course I concede it. I admit it. I am glad to have you correct me, gentlemen, it shows you are attending to what I am talking about, and that your minds are going along with mine. Correct me whenever I err, and you will oblige me greatly, each one of you. First, I ask that your minds will act with mine. Criticise carefully all I say. If I make a slip, correct me. If I state a wrong proposition do not agree with me. But where I state a right proposition, do not agree with anybody else.

For the apparel oft proclaims the man.

Says Shakespeare.

On this jacket (22 S), in connection with the suggestions I have made to you, there is a peculiar feature, to which I desire your attention. The "forty-five" is written over an erasure. They first thought they would make it eighty-four, according to the petition, but when they came to figure up and found that they could not make any money at that they scratched out the "eighty-four" and put in "forty-five."

Before I go any farther there is one peculiarity in this affidavit to which I wish to call your attention. I shall be brief about it, as I may have occasion to recur to it. This affidavit of John W. Dorsey's was filed April 26, 1879. It was filed in by S. W. Dorsey; so says Boone in his testimony, and so says Rerdell. I suppose the defendants claim that Rerdell filled in that affidavit, as he is the only man mentioned outside of the case or introduced in the case who is supposed to be capable of imitating Dorsey's handwriting. Now, the question is, did Rerdell fill in that affidavit, or did S. W. Dorsey fill it in? They say that Rerdell filled in that affidavit. I want you to just look at it and see the handwriting, and also the handwriting of the letter inclosing it. [Submitting to the jury 24 S and 25 S.]

The COURT. What is the date of that affidavit?

Mr. MERRICK. It is dated on the 26th of April, 1879. It is one of that batch that went up to John Dorsey, in Vermont. It was sworn to here. Now, I want you, gentlemen of the jury, to look at the "three," "four," "twelve," and "forty-five."

Mr. BLISS. What is the exhibit number?

Mr. MERRICK. 25 S.

Mr. BLISS. It was written by Kellogg.

Mr. MERRICK. The body was written by Kellogg, and the 3, 12, 45, and 32 are filled in by S. W. Dorsey, according to the testimony.

The COURT. When was it filed?

Mr. MERRICK. That is the point. It was filed on the 26th of April, 1879, when Rerdell was two thousand miles away from here. When that affidavit was filed Rerdell was in the far West, having left here, according to Mr. Ingersoll's analysis of the testimony, on the 17th or 18th of April. You recollect how he berated Colonel Bliss for having said he left here on the 15th. He did not get back until the 5th of May, which is conceded and admitted, I believe, all through the case.

Mr. CRANE (foreman of the jury). If Kellogg wrote the body of that he must have disguised his handwriting either in that or in the signature, for they are evidently different.

Mr. MERRICK. The signature is all right.

Mr. CRANE. I understood you to say that Mr. Kellogg wrote the body of that.

Mr. MERRICK. He wrote the body of it, according to the evidence.

Mr. CRANE. It is entirely different from the signature.

Mr. INGERSOLL. What is the file mark ?

Mr. MERRICK. 25 S.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The date of filing ?

Mr. MERRICK. April 26, 1879. I think on that very identical day Rerdell was proved to be at some particular spot in the West, I forget what place. The signature does look different from the body of the writing, and it is in a different ink. Boone swears that the body of it was written by Mr. Kellogg, and—

The figures 38113 and the words "three," "four," and "twelve," and figures "45," the word "three," and figures "11" and "32"—with the circumstances attending it—I should say were filled in by Stephen W. Dorsey. [Page 2701.]

That oath was administered on the 26th of April and the paper filed on the 26th of April, and on the 26th of April Rerdell was in the far West at some place, as to which Mr. Bliss will remind me.

Mr. BLISS. I think he was at Denver on the morning of the 25th.

The COURT. He left there on the morning of the 25th.

Mr. MERRICK. We had the hotel register here showing him there on the 25th.

Mr. BLISS. We did not fix him later than that.

Mr. MERRICK. That affidavit was sworn to when Rerdell was not here, was filed when Rerdell was not here, and Boone says the filling in is in Dorsey's handwriting; Rerdell says so, too; and it bears on its face the evidence of its being in Dorsey's handwriting, from its similarity to the handwriting in this case admitted to be his. It was transmitted by this letter, which is also in Dorsey's handwriting, and is dated the 26th. As we go along we might as well bear these interesting little points in mind. As to the letter transmitting the affidavit, Mr. Boone says, at page 2702:

Q. [By Mr. Bliss.] I hand you 30 S.—A. This is in the handwriting of Stephen W. Dorsey.

By Mr. INGERSOLL:

Q. What is it?—A. It is transmitting a sworn statement on route 38113.

I did not intend to go so fully into this, but the temptation is strong. For these men, although they were very cautious, left their tracks. Guilt is cautious, always cautious; but guilt sometimes becomes so bold that it exhibits recklessness instead of caution.

Mr. GREENE (a juror). If the affidavit was written by Kellogg it was not written on the 26th of April.

Mr. MERRICK. Why not ?

Mr. GREENE. Because it is in an entirely different ink and different handwriting from the signature.

Mr. CRANE (foreman of the jury). May it not be one of those affidavits that Rerdell filled out in blank ?

Mr. MERRICK. No; it could not have been of those, because you see it was sworn to on the 26th.

Mr. INGERSOLL. [To Mr. Merrick.] Do you claim that John W. Dorsey was not here on the 26th ?

Mr. MERRICK. No.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Do you claim that this was filled up after it was sworn to ?

Mr. MERRICK. I did not say anything about it. I have not come to that part.

Mr. CRANE. It might have been filled out before and left here for months, and then sworn to on that day.

Mr. MERRICK. Yes, certainly that might be; that is a possibility, but it is so remote a possibility that I do not think any one would consider it, especially in view of the proof and the letter of transmittal. According to all the testimony in the case, as it runs down from the beginning, you find that they took out these papers only as they wanted them, and the letter of transmittal generally bears date just before the order.

Dorsey did not come back here again in 1879 from his visit to the far West until some time in the spring, and Rerdell went out pretty soon after he got back. We might have a great many speculative theories, but we are not allowed to speculate. We have to confine our imaginations to the testimony in the case. Rerdell did not leave any of these affidavits filled up, but left blanks. Kellogg may have written that at any time, I do not know when; it does not make any odds, either, when he wrote it. It certainly is written with different ink from that with which he signed his name. The blanks in stock, which constituted the burglars' tools, were used when they wanted to make a burglarious entrance, and not until then. They were filled up and sharpened at that time.

The Perkins affidavit was made, I think, for eighty-four hours. Bear that in mind, Mr. Crane. That had already been filed on the 16th of April. That was on the theory of expedition to eighty-four hours. Turner testified, I believe, that that did not suit. So they concluded to put it down to forty-five hours for the purpose of realizing the profit I have mentioned to you, and to do that they must have a forty-five-hour affidavit. Now, looking at all the facts and circumstances surrounding the parties, my theory about it is this: That Brady sent for Dorsey, who was here—for I will show you that nearly all of these expeditions were made when Dorsey was here, and nearly all of these successive orders were made when Dorsey was here—and told him, "It won't do to put this down to eighty-four hours only, because it will be too flagrant a manifestation of misuse of authority; but get me an affidavit for forty-five hours and you can have your money." Dorsey goes and gets one of John W. Dorsey's affidavits that had been sworn to before Kellogg, fills that up with forty-five hours and puts it in, and in three or four days afterwards the order comes. Rerdell was not here. He could not have had anything to do with that transaction.

But I have been led too far away from my main point and I must come back to it. Nevertheless, I cannot say too much nor dwell too long on these affidavits for, gentlemen of the jury, they are the roots of the tree of whose fruit these sinners ate.

Mr. CRANE (foreman of the jury). I notice that Dorsey's letter says "fifty hours," and the affidavit "forty-five."

Mr. MERRICK. I have not examined the letter particularly. I was about to say that there was no time wasted in dealing with these affidavits, for I have taken you down to the roots of this tree. These affidavits are its roots. Those roots, watered with crime, nourished and fed with iniquity, could bring forth nothing but guilt and sin. I have not dealt with the leaves, nor with the boughs nor the bark. That has been done before. I have taken you down to the very roots, and if you find these affidavits to be founded in perjury, filled up by these different conspirators for the benefit of one another, the crime of conspiracy is proved, and we cannot escape it. It is from these affidavits that all the iniquitous profits on the several routes were derived.

Or, to liken these affidavits to something else, they are the fountain; and instead of judging of the waters by going down the stream and between the banks where they flow in a bad current, I take you up to the very fountain itself, and I show you the poison in that fountain. If it is not there, the Government surrenders its case. If it is there, in the name of the whole people of the United States I demand that retributive justice be visited upon the men that poisoned that fountain.

Now, gentlemen, why did Brady make this order expediting the time to forty-five hours? I will tell you why he made it—from his own testimony in part (page 3406):

Q. I will ask you why, when the contract price for one trip was $1,700 a year, and you could at that rate have made the route six trips for $10,200, you instead of that added two trips and expedited the time to forty-five hours at a cost of $13,606.25, thereby costing the Government $3,406.25 a year more than would have been necessary for six trips a week upon that route?—A. This seems to have been a route one hundred and sixty-five miles long and a very slow schedule, and they wanted three trips a week and expedition. It seems by the jacket that Mr. Teller and Senator Chaffee and others recommended it. Three trips a week upon a forty-five-hour schedule would be a far better service than seven trips a week upon a very long schedule. Anybody can see that without even a microscope. That was the reason that was done.

Q. Yes; but Senator Teller and the other people did not recommend a forty-five-hour schedule. Why did you take that?—A. Simply because we would not expedite it without making it fast.

Q. How did you happen to light upon a forty-five-hour schedule?—A. To make the running time, I think, about four miles an hour.

Q. Then you did not in that case follow either the petitions or the recommendations of the Senators and Members you have referred to, did you?—A. No. It looks a little as if in that case I had done as I pleased about it, just as I had a right to do, without petition or recommendation of anybody, under the law.

“I did as I pleased and as I had a right to do, without petition or recommendation of anybody, under the law.” And yet you are aware, from the explanations I have already made to you, that the law requires the exercise of this power only in an extraordinary emergency; and he not only did not have before him any evidence that the route needed to be expedited to forty-five hours, but he had before him the evidence of the people along the route that it needed expedition only to eighty-four hours. He not only failed to have before him the affirmative evidence, which according to law he ought to have had, but he had before him negative evidence showing that what he was about to do he ought not to do. In order to do what he did he should have had the proof that it was necessary to do it, in view of the exigencies of the country and the imperative needs of the people in the neighborhood of the route. Instead, however, of having evidence that it was needed by the exigencies of the case and the condition of the people along the route, he had the positive evidence that it was not needed; and having this positive evidence that it was not needed, he now says that he did as he pleased. Gentlemen of the jury, is official authority to assume autocratic powers in this country? Why did he make such an answer? Because under the searching and pressing cross-examination he was driven to a corner where he had to leap or die. He is a bold and reckless man. And these defendants have shown their recklessness in the conduct of this case from the beginning to the end, as well as in their transactions at the department. It has been one unceasing attempt to browbeat both court and counsel from the beginning of the last trial down to the present time.

But let us see something further of this. I have explained to you that the power to order expedition should be exercised only where certain conditions arise, as, for instance, where it becomes important to make connections with a railroad. You have a star route and that star route goes to a place which is on a railroad; if you can make connection by a slight expedition it is well enough to make it, so as to reach that office in time to receive the mails from the railroad and to give the mails from the star route to the railroad. What was the fact in this case? By Rawlins ran a railroad. White River, I believe, was the jumping-off place, where the pioneer caught sight of the red man and pushed him westward. The expedition was made (page 2059) without regard to the connection with that road, and according to the expedition the mail would have to lie over when it got to Rawlins twenty-two hours to go east, and to go west it had to lie over twelve hours. Would it not have been better and wiser, and more in accordance with the honest discharge of official duty, to allow that mail, instead of sleeping at Rawlins for twenty-two hours if bound east, and twelve hours if bound west to spend a part of those hours along the route, and thus have saved the United States this $8,600? It was a wild region of country, with but little enterprise, hopeful of the future, but practically not very active in the present, inhabited by a population engaged in pursuits that made it quite immaterial whether they got a letter at 8 o'clock in the morning, 12 o'clock noon, or at 5 in the evening. If they had any mail that needed to be rapidly carried it was the through mail, which contained the most important part of their correspondence. For the enterprise of the people of the West depends for the most part upon their connection with capital, and the materials for the development of that country are in the East, and not with their neighbors. Each pioneer is neighbor to every other, each striking his own tree, clearing up the forest which he has purchased; but each is clearing it up, in nine cases out of ten, with capital that he has brought from the East. And if expedition of communication is needed at all it is needed with the East. Expedition of communication in the various localities, of neighbor with neighbor, is not important. Do you not see that? Do you not know it? What was there on White River that needed to be sent with great rapidity to Rawlins? Or what was there at Rawlins that needed to be sent with great rapidity to White River? What was there between those two points that needed to be carried with such immense rapidity and at such heavy cost? And there was only one office between them. The local offices were surrounded by cattlemen and those engaged in the occupations of pioneer life. Why, gentlemen, it is plain to each one of you that there could be no possibility of any necessity for extremely rapid communication between people engaged in those pursuits. Their business was to develop the new country. Their music was the sound of the ax in the tree. Their daily occupation and their daily entertainment was to plant and see the plant grow. What cared they for the variations of the market of Wall street? What cared they for the changing prices and values in speculative matters that men deal with and by which they get rich and get ruined in half an hour? To them all that was nothing. They were pioneers and a primitive people, and the communication of one with another, in point of time, was utterly immaterial. The only importance of rapidity of communication was to get to the East, to get to Boston, to New York, to Philadelphia, to Baltimore. And yet this beneficent Government, acting through its Second Assistant Postmaster-General, expedites their mail at a cost of over $8,600, and then requires that mail to lie over twenty-two hours at Rawlins before it can be started East, and twelve hours at Rawlins before it can be started West. [Map handed to Mr. Horigan, a juror.] Look at that map.

Mr. HORIGAN. I have seen it before.

Mr. MERRICK. See where the railroad is. Here is Rawlins. [Indicating.] Drive a nail in there. The mail is nailed there for twenty-two hours going East and twelve going West.

Another route to which I will call your attention, and which manifests, by the orders Brady passed, what regard Brady had for petitions, is No. 44140, Eugene City to Bridge Creek. The service was once a week ; length of route, two hundred and seven miles ; contract price, $2,468. Twelve miles were cut off April 21, 1878, reducing the length to one hundred and ninety five miles ; pay, $2,324 93 per annum. The time was one hundred and thirty hours, but when they cut off twelve miles the time was made one hundred and twenty-one hours, I think, being a mile and six-tenths per hour. The oath was made January 22, 1879. Order for expedition was made June 26, 1879. The oath is the only paper on file which suggests a fifty-hour schedule. The only other paper which specifies any particular time is a letter from J. H. Mitchell (page 1336), and this asks for one hundred hours.

The COURT. What is the date of that oath ?

Mr. MERRICK. January 22, 1879.

The COURT. When was the order made ?

Mr. MERRICK. The order was made June 26, 1879, and the oath was filed May 24, 1879. This is one of the Peck oaths ; one of the stock in trade.

Mr. GREENE (a juror). Who fixes the schedule of time, in the first place ? It is done in the advertisement, I understand, but who fixes it ?

Mr. MERRICK. The advertisement fixes it.

Mr. GREENE. I understand that.

Mr. MERRICK. It is done in the office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, under the statute which I have read to you.

The COURT. It is in the regulations. Postmasters fix the time subject to the control of the department.

Mr. MERRICK. No ; they fix the schedule.

Mr. GREENE. I mean the original schedule of time.

Mr. BLISS. Section 3841 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. MERRICK. That is not it.

Mr. BLISS. That fixes the schedule, does it not ?

Mr. MERRICK. No ; that says that the Postmaster-General shall furnish to the postmasters at the termination of each route a schedule of arrivals and departures of mails at those post-offices respectively.

Mr. BLISS. That fixes the time.

Mr. MERRICK. I know it does, but I want the rule requiring the time to be fixed before the advertisement and put in the advertisement.

The COURT. This order, however, changed the original time.

Mr. MERRICK. Yes ; I wanted to explain it all to him. Here it is :

Provided, That the Postmaster-General shall cause advertisements of all general mail lettings of each State and Territory to be conspicuously posted up in each post-office in the State and Territory embraced in said advertisements, for at least sixty days before the time of such general letting ; and no other advertisement of such letting shall be required ; but this provision shall not apply to any other than the general mail lettings.—Richardson's Supplement to Revised Statutes, 177.

That is the act of 1880. Section 3941, Revised Statutes (page 769), is :

Before making any contract for carrying the mail, other than those hereinafter excepted, the Postmaster-General shall give public notice—

And so forth. That is section 3941 modified by the later law—and such notice shall describe the route,—

That is, at the original letting.

Mr. GREENE. I understand.

Mr. MERRICK. [Continuing to read:]

the time at which the mail is to be made up, the time at which it is to be delivered, and the frequency of the service.

Do you see ?

Mr. GREENE. I understand ; that is exactly what I wanted to get at.

Mr. MERRICK. The time is fixed by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, to whom, under the law, is assigned all matters relating to the mail contracts. The duties of the office are distributed. They are given by the statute to the Postmaster-General generally, and then the law provides that he may by regulations distribute them, and they are distributed among the different offices; and the office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General is the contract office in which everything relating to the contracts is done. Do you understand it?

Mr. GREENE. Yes, sir; I understand it. It seems to be an arbitrary rule as to the time.

Mr. MERRICK. Now, as I have shown you, that is the provision for the original advertisement. When a contract is taken by bid under that advertisement, the Postmaster-General has the right to expedite the time, as I have explained, and expedite the schedule.

Mr. GREENE. I understand that perfectly well. I only wanted to get at the one single point, how the original time was fixed by the advertisement.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Is it claimed that Mr. Brady fixed it?

Mr. MERRICK. It was fixed in his office.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Is it claimed that he fixed it?

Mr. MERRICK. It was fixed under his supervision. But I am answering the juror. I do not attack it at all.

The COURT. The indictment does not attack it.

Mr. WILSON. I do not know exactly what the drift of this argument is.

Mr. MERRICK. I am sorry that counsel cannot find out what it is about.

Mr. WILSON. I simply want to call attention to the fact——

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] I object to any interruption from the counsel, because he understands perfectly well that what I was saying was only in response to Mr. Greene's inquiry about the original advertisement.

The COURT. The interruption is unnecessary.

Mr. MERRICK. I think it is quite unnecessary. Mr. Greene wanted to know how it was done, and who did it.

Mr. GREENE. I simply wanted to know how the original time was fixed.

Mr. MERRICK. That being fixed in the advertisement, they proposed to change it, and this affidavit changed it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Will Mr. Merrick allow me to ask the court one question?

Mr. MERRICK. No; I would prefer, your honor, not to be interrupted.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I want to ask the court——

The COURT. You cannot ask any questions now, without his permission.

Mr. INGERSOLL. When a paper is produced to the jury hereafter, would I have the right to ask them to look——

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] I object to any interruption.

The COURT. [To Mr. Ingersoll.] No, you have no right to interfere in that way. He is making his argument. Whatever rights you have on your prayers are, of course, unaffected.

Mr. MERRICK. Of course, the court will hear all the prayers.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The point is whether I have the right——

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] I object. Your honor has decided it.

The COURT. The court has not allowed it.

Mr. MERRICK. Very well, let the counsel drop it.

The COURT. The counsel has dropped it.

Mr. MERRICK. As I have stated, gentlemen, the affidavit upon this route was the only paper that suggested a schedule of fifty hours. The only other paper filed upon the route which specified any particular time was a letter from J. H. Mitchell, which asked for one hundred hours. And I respectfully submit that that being the condition of the record on this route, it shows conclusively to the jury that Brady did just as he pleased; that Brady granted what the contractor asked, as against the petitions of the people, as against what the people said was needed, and in derogation of economy in the administration of his office; because what the people said was needed cost nothing, or very little, whilst what the contractor said they desired to have cost a large sum.

Why should he have done so? When a jury is considering the evidence produced before them they must bear in mind that outside of the testimony there is but one other piece of evidence properly subject to their consideration, and that is the immutable law of nature—the rules by which men ordinarily regulate their conduct, the impulses that propel men into an action. You must call that law to your aid in considering why Brady should have done these things when the people on the route asked for something inexpensive, when the people testified to Brady that the inexpensive service was all that was needed, when that testimony was uniform and unquestioned, and when the only testimony as to something else being needed than what they asked was in the oath of the contractor. Why should he grant what the contractor asked when it would involve the expenditure of thousands, while to grant what the people asked would save to the Government those thousands? Why did Brady respond to the request of the contractor and disregard the wishes of the people? Trace it to any motive that you can, gentlemen, to any reason that is consistent with innocence. Exercise your ingenuity and your judgment; give him the benefit of the doubt; consult yourself, Mr. Crane, and ask what you would have done under the same circumstances; give to him the benefit of every doubt, and I think after you have done that, and reasoned fairly upon what you know of the laws of human nature and the impulses of the human heart, you cannot, on this record, come to any other conclusion than that Brady must have been instigated by a corrupt motive—a corrupt motive known to and participated in by the contractor who made the oath.

The time for running the mails is not specified in any petition or paper. These affidavits, which were the only papers that speak of the time, indicate that they were matters of consultation and deliberation between Brady and some one or more of his co-conspirators, and were adopted as a part of the conspiracy in execution of the common design and common understanding to rob the Treasury of the United States. And I am impelled to a belief that the learned counsel upon the other side, at least one of them, felt the pressure of these circumstances, felt the pressure of the surrounding facts, felt the pressure of the conclusions to which all these facts tend. I cannot help but believe it when a learned gentleman like Mr. Ingersoll stands up before a jury and asks for the mercy of a verdict of acquittal——

Mr. INGERSOLL. [Interposing.] I asked for the mercy of an honest verdict.

Mr. MERRICK. The mercy of a verdict of acquittal or an honest verdict—for mercy, mercy! This place, under the Constitution of the United States, is not the seat of mercy. It is here that the scales are held up and the balance struck, and when the balance is struck and Justice raises the sword of retribution to strike the blow in accordance with the judgment pronounced, then sweet Mercy, who has until that hour had her back turned, falls at the feet of the executioner, and stays the descending blow. This court-room is the place for law and justice. Conscious of coming doom, mercy is what the gentleman seeks even before that doom is pronounced. Let him ask for mercy at the seat of mercy, and not here.

Allow me gentlemen to call your attention to one other route as a specimen route in this connection, and ask for it your patient consideration. It is No. 45155, Dalles to Baker City, Oregon. There are several interesting features upon this route, and they may lead me to two or three digressions from the direct line of my argument, which is on the affidavits.

Length of route, two hundred and seventy-five miles; service, twice a week; schedule, one hundred and twenty hours; annual pay, $8,288; oath by John M. Peck. This oath (14 L) has some peculiar features about it. The number of trips is not mentioned in the oath. The oath reads as follows:

CHICO SPRINGS, N. MEX., September 18, 1878.

HON. THOMAS J. BRADY,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General:

The number of men and animals necessary to carry the mail on route 44155, from The Dalles to Baker City, is eight men and ten animals, and the number necessary to carry the mail on said route with a schedule of seventy-two hours will be twenty-six men and sixty-six animals.

JOHN M. PECK.

You see how the original affidavit is filled in—blank trips, one hundred and twenty hours, eight men and ten animals; blank trips, seventy-two hours, twenty-six men and sixty-six animals, making ninety-two. The oath was administered and taken September 18, 1878, your honor. This remarkable paper does not specify the number of trips on either the present schedule or the proposed schedule. It is intended by the beneficiaries to measure the cost of expedition which would take from the Government annually many thousand dollars; yet in its incomplete form it was filed, and accepted by Brady. Perhaps some of you know how difficult it is to collect, ordinarily, even a just claim against the Government; with how much care, with how much explicitness the papers must be prepared. But this imperfect paper shows with what ease the autocratic Brady and his fellow-conspirators managed their business. In their haste to grow rich and in their fancied sense of security they often forgot even the externals of prudence.

October 2, 1878, Miner wrote in the name of Peck (page 1671) offering to carry the mails three times a week on a schedule of seventy-two hours for $18,648 per annum for increased speed.

Mr. BLISS. Three times a week.

Mr. MERRICK. Three times a week. Hence we may infer that three trips a week were intended in the affidavit of Peck on page 2344. This affidavit was sworn to in blank by Peck and filled up by Miner. Three round trips a week over a route two hundred and seventy-five miles long would make one thousand six hundred and fifty miles of travel each week, or over two hundred and thirty-five miles on an average each day. (Page 1682.) The evidence shows that double teams were used, hence, each one of Miner's ten horses was compelled to travel forty-eight miles a day. There were eight men and ten horses on the original schedule, and each one of those ten horses, according to his oath, would have to travel forty-eight miles a day. The proof is, at page 1682, that they had to carry it by double teams. After expedition we come to a singular antithesis. The thirty-three double teams were only required to make seven miles a day. Before expedition, each double team had to make forty-seven miles a day according to that oath. After expedition the double teams made only seven miles a day. In other words, they went at the rate of two and twenty nine one-hundredths miles per hour, for that was the time of the original schedule, a very little over two and a quarter miles per hour in going forty-seven miles a day for three hundred and sixty five days in the year. The oath says so. That is the result that comes from it, and nothing else can be derived from it. At first a span could make forty-seven miles a day, three hundred and sixty-five days in the year; but when the same span was lashed up to a speed of three and eighty-two one-hundredths miles an hour, less than four miles, a speed below that at which S. W. Dorsey wrote Anthony Joseph an ordinary horse could walk, the poor animals were exhausted at the end of seven miles. Seven miles per day was all they would have to go. Fisk and Madison, two practical drivers on the route, testified that forty-four horses were used for three trips a week before expedition was actually put on. Before I go further, I omitted a little piece of literature that I ought to have read the other day and will read it now. These horses had to go three and eighty-two one-hundredths miles an hour on the expedited schedule and on the original schedule two and a quarter miles an hour. I will now read you, from page 1104, a letter from S. W. Dorsey addressed to Anthony Joseph. When I was showing you the speed at which the horses had to go on the routes referred to heretofore, I omitted to give proof of the capacity of a horse for travel per hour, taking it for granted that the jury knew something about that matter themselves. I did not then think of this piece of literature:

ANTHONY JOSEPH, Esq.,
Taos, N. Mexico:

DEAR SIR:

So begins S. W. Dorsey, and then continues:

Your two letters to Mr. Rerdell have just come to my attention, and I make haste to answer them.

In regard to the schedule time of fifty hours from Ojo Caliente to Animas City being too fast, I have to say that you are evidently laboring under a singular misapprehension. Fifty hours' time is about three and a half miles an hour, which is slow walking time for a horse or man.

And yet I have shown you routes that were expedited and thousands of dollars paid for expedition where the speed did not reach three miles an hour; for instance, the Canyon City and Camp McDermitt route, where the time was expedited from one and ninety-one one-hundredths to two and fifty-three one-hundredths miles per hour, at a cost of $29,950.

Dorsey further says in this letter:

Fifty hours' time is about three and a half miles an hour, which is slow walking time for a horse or man; a good horse will walk four miles an hour for eight hours every day in the year.

A good horse will walk four miles an hour for eight hours every day in the year, and yet the expedition upon this route was from two and twenty-nine one-hundredths miles per hour to three and eighty-two one-hundredths miles per hour, and according to the proof that was given by S. W. Dorsey a good horse should walk that every day in the year.

As I said, two practical drivers on the route testified that forty-four horses were used for three trips a week before the expedition was actually put on, though it had been ordered. Their testimony is corroborated and confirmed by the absurdity of the conclusion necessarily drawn from the affidavit, which is that on that affidavit on the original schedule each horse had to travel forty-seven miles every day. Perfectly absurd! Perfectly and manifestly absurd!

Mr. Foreman, you asked me a question the other day, to which I wish to refer now. Perhaps some of the jury do not understand the matter, although I think you do. I see from the report that you inquired whether they did not cheat themselves by swearing to too small a number as the number of men and horses required to be used on an existing schedule. That is the way it is reported. I want now to explain right here how the thing was done. According to the section of the law that I read to you, the expedition shall not be in excess of the exact proportion that the stock and carriers on the existing schedule bears to the stock and carriers on the proposed schedule. For instance, suppose you have twenty stock and carriers on the present schedule, and you swear that thirty will be required in the new schedule, and $5,000 is the amount paid for the old service. As the stock and carriers on the existing schedule are to the stock and carriers on the proposed schedule so is compensation on the existing schedule to the compensation to be paid on the proposed schedule. It is the simple rule of three. Therefore where you reduce the stock and carriers on the present schedule below what is the truth you defraud the Government, for you make your compensation on the proposed schedule larger than it otherwise would be. Wherever you reduce your divisor you necessarily increase the sum you are to receive on the proportion that I have given you. To reduce the number of stock and carriers on the present schedule is one mode of fraud; to increase beyond necessity the number of stock and carriers required on the proposed schedule is another mode of fraud. You can cheat at either end, but the cheating is in a little different way. It is done by making the present required number of stock and carriers less than they ought to be, and it is done by making the number of stock and carriers on the proposed schedule more than will really be required. For convenience of illustration, we will assume that twenty horses and carriers are required on a route before expedition, and that on increase thirty are necessary. The legal proportion would then be: twenty is to thirty as the original compensation is to the allowance. You multiply the original compensation by thirty, and you divide by twenty, and the smaller you make the figure you have to divide by the larger comes out your new compensation. I thought possibly, Mr. Foreman, you did not appreciate that the other day.

The FOREMAN (Mr. Crane). The other day the way it struck me was that the contractor, making oath that he required a less number of men and animals than he did actually require, was cheating himself.

Mr. MERRICK. I thought you were under that impression, and that would be a very natural impression for almost anybody. I thought possibly that some of the other jurors might have that idea, and therefore I deemed it best to call attention to it. It is just the other way. The smaller the number that is stated as being the number required on the present schedule, the more you cheat the Government. The larger you make the number on the proposed schedule the more you cheat the Government. You see here is what he has on the present schedule, twenty. [Exhibiting calculation.] He needs on the new schedule thirty. As twenty is to thirty so is the original compensation to the new compensation. You have to multiply thirty by the original com-compensation and divide by twenty, and the smaller the divisor the larger the quotient will be. In order to cheat the Government, as to the first sum, he must lie down by diminution. In order to cheat the Government in the second sum he must lie up. Generally they lied both ways. Under Brady's auspicious care they lied securely; but now I think we will, as he has manifested so much desire to enjoy the benefit of Governmental funds, take care of him for a few years at the expense of the Government.

But let us return to our sum. As twenty is to thirty so is the original compensation to the new compensation. Suppose that in an affidavit the contractor should state the number actually in use on the original schedule at ten instead of twenty. The false proportion then would be as ten is to thirty, so is the original compensation to the new compensation. Then you would multiply thirty by the original compensation, and divide it by only ten, and that would double or treble your compensation.

The COURT. It would give you more than three times as much.

Mr. MERRICK. It would go from 50 per cent. to 200 per cent.

The COURT. It would be the difference between ten and thirty.

Mr. MERRICK. With the permission of the court I will hand this paper to Mr. Crane and let him look at it and let him put it in his pocket.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I have no objection to that, provided the court will allow all the papers in this case to go to the jury.

Mr. MERRICK. Give it back then, I do not want any confusion caused. I have read the paper, and it is simply a stated sum.

Mr. WILSON. We are willing that everything should go to the jury in this case.

The COURT. I think that would probably lead to a good deal of trouble in making up a verdict.

Mr. MERRICK. I do not think the jury would like to have all the papers. The proposition is, of course, preposterous to take all these papers and give them to the jury and let them look at them. They do not want them.

The COURT. Counsel addressing the jury has a right to exhibit any calculation he thinks proper in the course of his argument; but the jury will not take his papers with them.

Mr. MERRICK. Take the paper and look at it, Mr. Crane, I want you to see it, and get the idea. When you once get the idea you are all right.

The FOREMAN (Mr. Crane). I am not enough of a mathematician to figure on it here, and have not the time.

Mr. MERRICK. You have had some figuring to do before.

The COURT. It is the simplest thing in the world. I think there cannot be any difference of opinion on either side.

Mr. MERRICK. There is no difference of opinion. We all agree, and that is why I want to let the jury have the paper.

Mr. WILSON. If the court please, we have not objected to Mr. Merrick's paper; not at all.

The COURT. I do not understand you to object.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Merrick has done a very extraordinary thing, to which I do not take any exception: Handing a juror a paper and asking him to put it in his pocket.

The COURT. The court will not allow that.

Mr. WILSON. I am not objecting. I want to say here now that so far as we are concerned the jury can have every one of these papers.

Mr. MERRICK. I would have never handed the paper to the jury in the world unless all sides had agreed to the paper. I did not suppose there was a man in the court-room that did not agree with this paper. It is simply a statement in the rule of three.

Mr. WILSON. If your honor please, nobody has seen it but Mr. Merrick and the jurors.

Mr. MERRICK. I have read it.

The COURT. It is a part of his argument.

Mr. WILSON. I understand that, and do not want to be understood as objecting, for I have not. I consent now that Mr. Merrick may give the paper to the jury. If the jury want it, they may take it and examine it at their convenience, that there may be no misapprehension.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I object to it. It is a very dangerous paper.

Mr. MERRICK. The gentleman is right. It is a very dangerous paper.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Wonderfully dangerous!

Mr. MERRICK. It shows the way the sum was done, and it shows that unless perjury gives the quantities, a losing route can never become a gaining one. Mr. Ingersoll cannot sneer it away. He cannot laugh it away. He may smile his blindest smile, and shake his round red head and fat cheeks to the end of time, but this calculation justly and honestly made by arithmetic shows the foundation of this case to be in falsehood, in perjury, and in corruption.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Then you do not blame me for objecting to it.

Mr. MERRICK. Indeed I do not. Indeed I do not. I do not blame the counsel for any of his efforts to keep light from the jury. I do not blame the counsel for any of the things he said to the jury which are not in entire conformity to the record, through errors I will explain when I come to them, for I have references to them. I do not blame the counsel for his appeals to your hearts and his tear-stirring and pathetic addresses, for the simple reason that he was required to do his best for his clients, and as your judgments on the facts are beyond his reach, he went for the part which his efforts could enable him to touch.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I object to his statement of the record. I have said again and again that I wanted from this jury an honest verdict according to the evidence; that they had no right to be governed by prejudice or by fear, but that they must be governed by the evidence. I have never asked of this jury any mercy except the mercy of honesty, the mercy of courage, and that is all I ever shall ask. I do not like to have it said that we have asked this jury to disregard the evidence and give a verdict on account of mercy. We have asked no such thing.

Mr. MERRICK. Counsel takes back his speech.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do not. I will read it now.

Mr. MERRICK. I understood the counsel to state what he now says in brief. If the pathetic appeals were not in the evidence, and that was all he wanted, and wanted to reach it by the facts, why these pathetic appeals? Was the home of Dorsey in the record? Were his wife and children in the record? Was his standing as a man heretofore and his standing now in the record? I admit that counsel asked for an honest verdict, and only an honest verdict, and asked it repeatedly on the evidence. I admit that. It is in his speech. But the other also is in his speech, and whilst with one word he asks for an honest verdict founded on the evidence, which verdict should be reached by judgment, he addressed the jury a pathetic appeal, that tears might moisten and obscure the vision of the jury.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Just let me read exactly what I did say upon that point:

You have no right to be guided or influenced by prejudice. You have no right to act from fear. You must act with absolute and perfect honesty. You must beware of prejudice. You must beware of taking anything into consideration except the sworn testimony in this case. You must not be controlled by the last word instead of by the last argument! You must not be controlled by the last epithet instead of by the last fact. You must——

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] Allow me to interrupt the counsel a single moment.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Wait until I have finished.

Mr. MERRICK. I ask to interrupt him.

The COURT. That is his speech.

Mr. MERRICK. I object. I want to say to your honor after what I have said, am I to be corrected? Have I not stated truly? Is the counsel to read his appeal to the jury over again?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I just want to read one line more.

Mr. MERRICK. I object.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do not want——

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] I object.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do not want it said that I have asked for mercy.

The COURT. You had a right to interrupt Mr. Merrick on that ground and the court would sustain your interruption. The regulation of the court was with you. I know that your appeal was for the mercy of an honest verdict, as you said.

Mr. MERRICK. Certainly.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I said they must give it.

The COURT. I understand that. These appeals to the sensibility of the jury are in place always on the part of counsel.

Mr. MERRICK. Certainly. I do not deny that.

The COURT. If appeals on the one side are made to the prejudice of the jury, appeals are made on the other side to their sensibilities, and the one is just about a set-off to the other on the subject. After all, the jury will have to decide the case according to their consciences and according to the law and the evidence.

Mr. MERRICK. Unquestionably.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is all I ever asked.

Mr. MERRICK. Let us take a recess now.

The COURT. We will take our recess.

At this point (1 o'clock p. m.) the court took its usual recess.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. MERRICK. [Resuming.] With submission to the court and gentlemen of the jury: There are some interesting features connected with the route known as the route from The Dalles to Baker City, besides those to which I have already called your attention, and I will reach them directly when I complete a few more observations that I think ought to be made in reference to the subject already considered. At page 1682, and also at page 1700, it will be found that Fiske and Madison, practical drivers on the route, testified that forty-four horses were used for three trips a week before expedition was actually put on the route, although it had been previously ordered. The evidence therefore of these men refers to the number of horses required to carry that mail over that route upon the original schedule, and they who were the practical drivers upon the route testified that forty-four horses were necessary for that purpose. You will bear in mind that the oath of Peck, which was filled up by Miner, states that on the original schedule ten horses only were necessary and used, thereby diminishing the divisor at least three-fourths. In filling up the blank affidavit Miner was guilty of a falsehood when he stated the number of animals required on the original schedule at less than one-quarter the number actually used. In other words, perjury reduced the first term of the proportion from forty-four to ten. The evidence does not show how much he enlarged the other term for his own benefit. It suffices however, for the purpose of showing the wrong perpetrated on the Government to prove the falsehood of one of the terms of the proportion. He may possibly have enlarged the other term as greatly beyond the truth, as the evidence shows he diminished the first term. The original pay on that route was \$8,288. This route is one of the routes, I believe it was conceded, upon which Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey received the original pay. On October 29, 1878, Brady added one trip from November 15, at a cost of \$4,144. In the same order he expedited the time from one hundred and twenty to seventy-two hours, at a cost of \$18,648. From July 14, 1879, he added four trips, at a cost of \$41,440, carrying forward in that addition the expedition, and making the total pay upon that route \$72,520. Seven trips alone cost at that rate an aggregate of \$29,008 per annum, and the expedition cost \$43,512, every cent of which was the criminal fruit of the perjury in that affidavit. Here is the interesting feature to which I referred. Though this costly expedition was ordered to be put on from November 15, 1878, it was not started or actually put on until a year later, or very nearly a year. Bear this in mind. The expedition which was originally provided and ordered at a cost of \$18,648, and which under Brady's fostering care finally grew to \$43,512, ordered from October 29, 1878, was not actually put on for one year. Vaile and Miner during that period walked coolly up to the Treasury at the end of every quarter and drew and pocketed the full amount of this theft. I can call it by no other name. Whilst I am not disposed to deal in harsh terms, I think plain English is best suited to forensic discussion, and I prefer to call things by their right names when I know what the right names are. They pocketed this amount every quarter, barring, of course, deductions suffered on account of the percentage due to Mr. T. J. B.; for however careless he may have been in percentages in other instances, in an instance where he so manifestly sold out his personal and his official honor, I think you cannot fail to appreciate that he was careful to get his $33\frac{1}{3}$ per cent. It was not until the investigation leading to this trial was begun that this fraud was discovered. During the year that the Government was paying for an expedition which it did not get, not a murmur came from the people who had petitioned under the stimulating appeals of the contractor for further trips and faster time. They did not seem to care. Now, gentlemen, do not allow that single incident to pass unchallenged, nor the fact to drop upon your ear without being recorded in your memory. I will tell you the reason why. The fact is that the people had petitioned for faster time under the stimulant of the contractors and through the energetic efforts of their agencies, and Brady passed his order for faster time, but for one year from the date when that order was to go into effect no faster time was put upon the route, and yet the people along the route, so anxious for faster time apparently, petitioning the authorities of the department to grant them faster time, made no sound, gave no sign, uttered no complaint, sent forward a repetition of petitions. Their voice was silent during the year, although they had no expedition—the thing they had prayed for and desired. Why? Because the agencies of the contractors had accomplished the fraud for the contractors, and their voice in sending forward the petitions had been the voice of the people which they had recorded on the petitions signed by the people. I want you to keep this fact in your memory, because it is one of the means by which we may estimate the value of these petitions. By this means you may learn whence these petitions came, and in this fact you will see that the petitions came from the contractors, they throwing their voices into the stomachs of the people and causing the people to utter their wish. For one year after the order there was no expedition of service, and yet no murmur. For one year after the order, expedition was not put on and was not performed, but the price of the expedition was paid to the contractors by him who thus faithlessly trod upon his trust—Thomas J. Brady.

I desire by this map, gentlemen [exhibiting map of route], to show you that the through mail, instead of going across the route from The Dalles to Baker City, went around by Pendleton, a route upon which there was a railroad, part of the way at least. The proof in the case is that the route from The Dalles to Baker City carried no through mail, but that it went around the other way. Even where a letter was started near either of the termini of The Dalles and Baker City route, it was taken to the nearest termini and from the nearest termini went around upon the other route. Yet upon this route, thus purely local, running among a purely agricultural people, through a sparsely settled country, with a few local post-offices along it, the pay was run up to $72,520, of which $43,512 was paid for expediting the mail to a class of people whose habits, pursuits, and occupations made it utterly indifferent to them whether they received their mails in the morning, at noon or at night.

Gentlemen, these things must strike you with amazement. The facts show that Brady, upon certain routes to which I have referred disregarded the petitions of the people and allowed money to the contractors upon their affidavits, and their affidavits alone, as to the time that was required. They show to you how highly Brady appreciated the petitions of the people, and come in as strong corroboration of the testimony of Mr. Walsh, to which I shall have occasion to refer hereafter, but part of which I deem it proper to read to you in this connection. What does Brady say to Walsh, at page 2207?

Q. You held that contract?—A. Yes, sir; at that time. He informed me that he had expedited that very largely, had increased the service; the pay had been largely increased as the result, and that he did not really think that he owed me anything; that he did not see how I thought he could possibly owe me. I reminded him of the fact, as I had repeatedly told him, that the contract, even viewed from that standpoint, was unremunerative; that it had been a source of no profit to me; on the contrary, a loss; that he himself was largely instrumental in my ever having entered into it, and that I felt that such increase and expedition as had been accorded me was made under the law. He smiled at that, and asked me if I had not seen cases where petitions, &c., very numerous and largely signed, had not effected any result whatever. He then referred to the fact that after he had cut my trips down from 1876, that all the petitions that had come from that country had not succeeded. He said, in brief, that the matter of petitions was simply to enable him to act within the law, and that any man might have understood that, not seeing half as much as I had.

Further on, at page 2211:

Q. You have already stated that, and in a connection where it is appreciable, I think. Did he say anything about what you may have supposed to have been his reason for making these expeditions?—A. Oh, well, he said that he didn't think for a moment that I thought it afforded him any amusement to make expedition. I told him that I didn't know that I did, but I supposed the law directed him. He said that petitions simply enabled him to act within the law; that the petitions were matter of form. The petitions worked all right if it was all right; and when it was not, they didn't.

These gentlemen undertake to protect Brady behind the paper wall of his petitions when a witness on the stand testifies that Brady told him they were only used to serve as a hiding-place for his villainy. That witness is corroborated not by the word that goes out on the air and is lost, but corroborated by Brady's own record, by his official acts which showed that petitions when they were right were all right, and when they were not right failed.

How was it, gentlemen, in reference to petitions and the recommendations of members of Congress on the route from Vermillion to Sioux Falls? Let us see in order to illustrate further and to further corroborate Walsh's testimony. Alexander Millie, a carrier, testifies, at page 1980, that on the route from Vermillion to Sioux Falls the mail was very light indeed. Sometimes he had a postal card, and sometimes three or four or five letters and two or three papers. He carried the mail from Kidder to Sioux Falls, half way. This route was advertised as fifty miles long. The actual distance was from seventy to seventy-five miles. Brady's attention was called to the error in the distance before the award was made by a letter of A. Boynton, referred to the department January 14, 1878, with J. P. Kidder's indorsement. Notwithstanding the fact that the route had been let at fifty miles and was seventy-five, and his attention was called to it, he expedited the route to ten hours, something over seven miles an hour, and afterwards refused to extend the schedule or revoke that order upon a petition of all the postmasters upon the route representing to him that the time was too fast and beyond the needs of the people, and in view of the character of the country beyond the power of the carrier to obey the order of expedition. Vaile himself on the stand testified when pressed that it was too fast.

Mr. HENKLE. He testified to it on the examination of his own counsel.

Mr. MERRICK. It is not worth while for me to trouble you by looking at the jacket as I want to get along rapidly. Bennett, upon whose recommendation Brady had granted expedition, appreciating that the Government was being wronged by paying for expedition where it was not needed and could not be performed, wrote Brady asking him to take off the expedition and extend the time for the carrying of the mail on that route. What was Brady's answer? Brady who respected so much the slightest breath from a member of Congress; Brady who heeded what the people's representatives asked for, said what to Bennett when Bennett asked him to take off part of this expedition? Taking off part of it would necessarily have involved taking off a portion of the contractor's pay. Let me read the petition of the postmasters:

SIR: We, the undersigned, postmasters on United States mail route No. 35015, from Vermillion to Sioux Falls, Dakota Territory, do respectfully represent that the mail on the above route is now carried between Vermillion and Sioux Falls—distance seventy miles—on ten hours' time between the two places.

In our opinion there is no reason why the time ought not to be extended. We therefore ask and petition that the time for carrying the mail on the above route between Vermillion and Sioux Falls be extended to sixteen hours.

That would reduce the contractor's pay and limit Brady's percentage. It seems that Bennett wrote on the back of that as follows:

Respectfully recommended.

GRANVILLE G. BENNETT.

He was the recommendation of their Representative in Congress. What does Brady say? He addresses a note to Brewer:

BREWER: Write Judge B. it cannot be done.

It could not be done. Why? Because it would limit the pay of the contractors and stop part of the theft. He was helping the contractor to plunder the Treasury of the United States. We then have this condition of things on the routes I have explained to you. Where the people asked for a schedule of eighty hours, and nothing in the record but the affidavit specified forty-five hours, Brady gave forty-five hours in order to increase the contractor's pay. This was upon a route advertised at a mistaken length of fifty miles. It turned out to be seventy-five, and that fact was brought to Brady's attention, and yet he expedited it to a fast time beyond the power of the carrier to execute the order. Then Judge Bennett indorsed the petition of the postmasters along the line asking that the time might be made longer and Brady refused. We have him there in both conditions, one granting the request of the contractors as against the people, and the other refusing the request of the Representative and the postmasters in order to benefit the contractors. I respectfully submit that these papers and these conditions corroborate and confirm Walsh, who stands before you unimpeached by a single witness, and was a witness whom they did not dare to cross-examine.

Now, gentlemen, I will briefly call your attention to peculiar circumstances upon another route, and on this route I shall introduce one or two additional actors with Mr. Brady. It is the route the transactions in respect of which were largely discussed by Mr. Ingersoll. It is the route, gentlemen of the jury, in reference to which were filed in the department those two affidavits of John W. Dorsey of the 21st of April, 1879, and in reference to which the foreman asked Mr. Ingersoll some questions. I beg your patient attention whilst I call your attention to some of the features of this route. The length of this route was forty-nine miles, and the schedule was one trip a week in fifteen hours. The first oath of John W. Dorsey was made in Addison County, Vermont, April 21, 1879. It contemplates seven trips a week, and declares as requisite on existing schedule of time three men and twelve animals, making fifteen; and on the expedited schedule, seven men and thirty-eight animals, making forty-five, an increase of 250 per cent. The letter sending the first affidavit to the Post-Office Department will be found on page 866, and the letter asking to withdraw it and correct the error will be found on page 868. I will refer to those letters. Now, Mr. Foreman, I am going to tell you how it was that these two affidavits were made. I have referred to the first affidavit. I will come to the second. It is obvious that some clerk in the contract office, or most probably Brady himself, objected to this affidavit because it led on its face to a plain and manifest absurdity. I will show you that that affidavit is of all the affidavits in this case one of the most absurd; that it led to calculations so grotesquely absurd that any one who saw it as the basis of an order would immediately conclude that the order was founded in corruption. Thirty-eight animals on a route forty-nine miles in length, seven times a week, and the trip to be made in ten hours! The ten hours would make the speed at the rate of about five miles an hour.

The COURT. Not quite.

Mr. MERRICK. About that.

The COURT. A little short of that.

Mr. MERRICK. A little short of it. I will give them the benefit of what there is. They are welcome to it. Thirty-eight animals and forty-nine miles! Thirty-eight animals on a route forty-nine miles in length provides a horse for every one and one-third miles. As there are but ninety-eight miles of daily travel each horse would be required to travel each day but two and fifty-seven one-hundredths miles—about two and a half miles. Each horse would have that task and that task only, gentlemen. I am sure that you [addressing Mr. Horigan] will appreciate that at that rate the horse would never wear out his shoes. As the speed was five miles an hour the carrier would have the privilege of changing teams every thirty-one minutes. Ninety-eight miles divided by thirty-eight horses equals two and fifty-seven one-hundredths miles of daily travel for each horse. How was it that such an absurd affidavit was written? Rerdell was following general instructions. “Mr. Dorsey, how many horses shall I say?” “Oh, that does not make any difference. Preserve the proportion. Get 250 per cent. That is all you need do. Preserve the proportion,” says Dorsey to Rerdell, and Rerdell was doing it when he filled up this affidavit. This absurdity was too palpable and monstrous for even the officials then in charge. It endangered Brady’s record too plainly, should that record ever be examined. It never would do to found an order taking money out of the Treasury on an affidavit like that. To have made an order on it would have left the official who made the order no alternative but to surrender all claims to common sense or admit the truth of the charge that corruption was his only motive. This paper was filed May 6, 1879, having been sworn to April 21. On May 8, 1879, a second affidavit from John W. Dorsey, on the same route, for the same service, and sworn to on the same day, was filed; this, like the other, being sworn to in Addison County, Vermont. It provided for seven times a week on a schedule of fifteen hours, two men and six animals—eight. On the reduction to ten hours it provided for six men and eighteen animals.

The FOREMAN. He swore to nothing.

Mr. MERRICK. He swore to that.

The FOREMAN. Was the affidavit sworn to in blank?

Mr. MERRICK. I think so. That is just what I am coming to.

The FOREMAN. He swore to nothing.

Mr. MERRICK. He swore to nothing. The record of that oath is not as against John W. Dorsey on the books of heaven’s chancery, except in so far as he was a member of the conspiracy that filled up the blank he swore to. But to prove that it was in blank is the point. Whilst Mr. Ingersoll denied at first that any of these oaths were sworn to in blank, he afterwards, in the course of his speech, ingenuously glided into a vindication of swearing to blank affidavits and filling them up afterwards. Among the things of which I want to convince this jury, and one of the most important things for me to convince them of, is that these affidavits were made out in blank and filled up afterwards to meet the exigencies of any case as those exigencies might arise; in other words, that these swearers, that these “good affidavit men,” as Miner called them, were ready to swear in blank and let anybody put in anything. I desire to show to the jury that these blank affidavits were kept in stock and were used when required; that the conspirators prepared and manufactured the burglars’ tools and handed them over to those who were to be actively engaged in the burglarious operations for the benefit of the common fund. The percentage of increase on this second affidavit is precisely the percentage of increase on the first affidavit. Suppose, for an instant, that John W. Dorsey did swear to them, both of them, and that they were filled in and complete when sworn to;

then it follows that, although they preserve the same proportion, one or the other of them must be a lie. He swears in one affidavit on the proposed schedule of ten hours that it will require thirty-eight animals, and in the other affidavit he swears that on the same schedule it will require eighteen. Both cannot be true. One must be false. If you recollect, gentlemen, when I handed him the affidavits and told him to pick out whichever he chose and tell me which was true and which was false, he could not do it. I will go on with the narrative and reach the point. The only difference between them is that the second affidavit looks more reasonable, and hence is less liable to provoke adverse criticism than the first one. Why? Because it calls for eighteen animals for a ten-hour schedule on a route of fifty miles. The first was absurd on its face because it required thirty-eight animals. The second oath was filed to take the place of the first for the reason that the second was not such a manifest absurdity as the first. It is perfectly plain, gentlemen, that the change in the affidavit was suggested in the department. The affidavit was filed but could not be acted on, as I have told you, because of its absurdity. I suppose that Brady saw that an order on such a manifestly absurd paper would disclose guilt in the record to the most casual observer, and he probably said to Rerdell, or S. W. Dorsey most likely, who was then here, and who was here whenever any one of these important orders was passed, "You may have the full amount of money you want, of course, but for Heaven's sake give me another affidavit that will be in reason." He did give him another affidavit preserving the precise relative proportions as the first, but which on its face did not disclose the criminality of the order that was to be made. Why was not the first affidavit withdrawn from the files? Brady could not put himself in the power of his clerks by thus mutilating his records. In this he was sensible, for crime is more frequently detected by an attempt to conceal truth and suppress evidence than in any other way. Before I get through this argument I will show you how the defense have suppressed evidence through their witnesses on the stand when called for and demanded; how they have sought the darkness when we had a right to see the light, and how they have kept concealed from the jury what it was the jury's right and privilege to see. I will show you how guilt has sheltered itself behind a refusal to testify to what might convict, although the defendants stood ready to testify to anything that tended to acquit. Had he not already known it, these two oaths should have shown General Brady the utter worthlessness of such papers. Both emanated from the same source, were sworn to on the same day, and came through the same channel, and yet in all their elements were so widely apart as to notify Brady that at best they were but wild and random guesses, or manifest and reckless perjury, and that any honest man could swear to two such widely variant statements on the same day was impossible.

The FOREMAN. You seem to lose sight of the fact that he did not swear to them; that they were filled up here in Washington.

Mr. MERRICK. If you are satisfied of that then I am done.

The FOREMAN. That is your evidence.

Mr. MERRICK. That is my evidence and that is the fact.

The FOREMAN. What troubles me is, that when they had the affidavits here in blank, and plenty of time to consider and consult with Brady, they should make that blunder and file one, and then two or three days after take it back and file another.

Mr. MERRICK. I am very glad you suggested that. That is true. That troubled me. I will show you now how it was. I am very glad indeed that you made that suggestion. It shows you are thinking exactly in the line of what came across me. I solved the question to my satisfaction, and I am going to solve it to yours. I am not going to leave anything of these two affidavits. That any man should make them is proof of his guilt. I do not believe he did make them in their present shape. But if he did, if Mr. Ingersoll was right, and John W. Dorsey swore to those two affidavits, you have no more to do with John W. Dorsey. You can just drop him out of your calculations. If he swore to those two affidavits on that same day with those figures in them, it is a confession of his guilt. I do not say he did, and I do not believe he did. The first affidavit, gentlemen, called for thirty-eight animals on an expedited schedule, and the second for eighteen, or less than one-half. They were made to draw money from the Treasury of the United States, and one of them, as I have said, must have been false. Yet Brady accepted the second one with the first lying open there before him, and without inquiry, though it took from the Treasury just as much money as the first affidavit would have taken.

Brady is the character now, gentlemen, that is on the stage in this drama. He had those two affidavits both lying there before him when he made the order. He calculated the proportions, and he saw that the proportions were the same; that an order passed on either would give the same amount of money, and whilst he discarded the first he acted on the second, although the first gave him notice that the second was a lie, if the second did not give him notice that the first was a lie. There was a lie between them, and he never took the trouble to settle upon which the lie should rest, but quietly accepted the second as an instrumentality for drawing money from the Treasury of the United States. Can official delinquency go further in order to make it criminal?

Rerdell testified that Peck and John W. Dorsey swore to packages of oaths in blank.

The COURT. Mr. Merrick, before you go to that, be kind enough to explain how it is that those two affidavits, if acted upon, would produce the same amount of money. The first affidavit called for thirty-eight horses; that was a very liberal supply of horses for a fifty-mile route. Now, the second affidavit avoided that but produced the same result. How?

Mr. MERRICK. Let me show you how that was done, gentlemen of the jury. The first affidavit called for three men and twelve animals; that makes fifteen men and animals, on the existing schedule, and it specifies as required on the proposed schedule seven men and thirty-eight animals, making in all forty-five—and the sum would be stated as follows:

Mr. BLISS. As fifteen is to forty-five.

Mr. MERRICK. Yes; thirty-eight animals and seven men make forty-five.

Mr. BLISS. The original compensation was $388.

Mr. MERRICK. Give it to me on paper.

Mr. BLISS. Work it out, do you mean?

Mr. MERRICK. No; not fully. As the number of men and animals required on the original schedule, is to the number of men and animals required on the new schedule so is the compensation on the original schedule to the compensation to be paid on the new schedule; that is, as fifteen is to forty-five so is three hundred and eighty-eight to what you are to allow for the new service. You multiply the three hundred and eighty-eight by forty-five and divide by fifteen, and you get the result. Now, as eight is to twenty-four in the other case, so is three hundred and eighty-eight to the compensation. If you multiply three hundred and eighty-eight by twenty-four and divide by eight it amounts to precisely the same result as if you multiply three hundred and eighty-eight by forty-five and divide by fifteen.

The COURT. In the second affidavit the original number was reduced to eight from fifteen.

Mr. MERRICK. Fifteen will go into forty-five three times, and eight will go into twenty-four three times.

Mr. CRANE. All this shows the importance of what I asked for in the beginning. There are about five thousand pages of testimony, which it has taken six months to lay before us, and the counsel have talked to us and explained their figures. If we had had the volumes to refer to ourselves, and could turn to the evidence at any time and figure it out to our satisfaction, I think it would have been much better.

Mr. MERRICK. As a general rule, juries analyze speeches that are delivered much more closely without papers than they would with. If you find that my conclusions will be reached by a process of reasoning with which you find no fault, and you retain that in your memories, it will be less troublesome, probably, than to go over these pages.

Mr. CRANE. We should not want to go over them now; but if we had had them as we went along to refer to, it would have served to impress the testimony better upon our memories.

Mr. MERRICK. I will read anything to you with great pleasure that you may desire.

Mr. INGERSOLL. We are willing that the jury should have the printed testimony.

The COURT. That is a proposition which the court cannot entertain. If this evidence were tumbled into that jury-box, when should we have a verdict? How long would that jury take to examine these volumes of evidence which it has taken us six months to get before them, and with all the controversies we can imagine that would arise amongst them? Disputes would probably arise over each piece of evidence. The evidence would become separated. There could not be a device suggested that would be better calculated to mislead and confuse the minds of the jury than that.

Mr. MERRICK. I do not think, gentlemen, that you will care about it when I am done. Not that I claim any peculiar power, but I have been studying this evidence with some diligence and will explain it to you frankly and fairly. I have had trouble in solving many points, and one of them was the point suggested just now. If you are like me, you would thank anybody to unriddle the riddle for you rather than have the trouble of unriddling it yourself.

Your honor thought I was going to something else, but I am still on the affidavits, and do not intend to quit them until I have laid bare their character and exposed their falsity.

The COURT. My idea was this, in regard to those two affidavits: The proportion between the one and the other is exactly the same, and the result in money is the same, taking either one. The first is as fifteen is to forty-five. The forty-five is manifestly an exaggeration of the number of men and horses necessary to perform that work. The second corrected that error by diminishing the present number to a lower figure than the proposed number in the second affidavit, which was as eight is to twenty-four, which is the same as fifteen is to forty-five.

Mr. MERRICK. That is it.

The COURT. The question for the jury to pass upon as to the object of this second affidavit is whether the present number necessary to perform that service was actually eight. If it was actually eight, and no more than eight, there was no harm there, because it was the truth. If eight was too small a number, though that leaves the question for the jury to pass upon as to the good faith of the parties using or filling up the affidavit, as the case might be—if the second affidavit had been filled up with the first number, fifteen, and the number of horses and men reduced to twenty-four, then the difference between fifteen and twenty-four would measure the increased compensation.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Decreased compensation?

The COURT. Would measure the increased compensation.

Mr. MERRICK. But would decrease that.

The COURT. The difference between fifteen and twenty-four would be only nine. But that seems not to have been the scheme upon which the affidavit was drawn. When the first affidavit was rejected, which stated the present number necessary as fifteen, and a second affidavit was prepared, the second affidavit reduced the fifteen to eight. Eight bears the same relation to twenty-four that fifteen does to forty-five, so that the compensation really is the same under one affidavit as the other. But that is not the question. The question is whether the second affidavit or the first was made in good faith; whether the party who made that affidavit, or filled up that affidavit, did it with an honest and fair purpose. That is the question which Mr. Merrick is arguing before you.

Mr. MERRICK. That is the question, and I am endeavoring to show you that as the same party made both affidavits, and the same party filled them up, both of them could not by any possibility have been made in good faith; one must have been in bad faith.

Rerdell testifies that Peck and John W. Dorsey swore to packages of oaths in blank, and these were then taken to the office of S. W. Dorsey, in Washington, to be filled up for such routes and at such times as the convenience of the contractor might demand. These two papers, therefore, furnish corroboration on that point of his evidence. I want you to bear in mind, in the remarks that I shall make, that one of the objects I have in view in this particular is to corroborate Rerdell, the "dead man" who was buried here before you with a rhetorical flourish. One of the other objects I have in view is to show you that John W. Dorsey, the living man, ought to be dead.

The COURT. Well, but, Mr. Merrick, if John W. Dorsey made these affidavits in blank, somebody else must have filled them up.

Mr. MERRICK. I am not going to talk of that—something else, your honor. I want your honor's kind attention, and you will see the most significant fact—fixing the time when the affidavits were filled in, and that they were blank when sworn to—remains. Now, I propose to show to you when they were filled in, and that they were blanks; and in that connection I propose to show you that John W. Dorsey on this stand committed perjury in this case—not in the affidavits; I am done with that now. The perjury was here, your honor. They were sworn to on the 21st of April, 1879; that is conceded. The first affidavit was filed May 6, 1879, sixteen days after it was sworn to. The second oath was filed May 8, 1879. When was the so-called or alleged mistake discovered in the first affidavit? Bear in mind that Rerdell left here on the 15th, 16th, 17th, or 18th of April, I do not care which; but the evidence shows, I think, that he left here on the 17th or 18th.

Mr. BLISS. The night of the 17th.

Mr. MERRICK. The night of the 17th. He left here on the night of the 17th of April and returned here on the 5th of May. When was the so-called mistake in the first affidavit discovered? Manifestly after the first oath was filed, and it was sworn to on the 21st of April, and filed on the 6th of May. I say it is manifest that the mistake in that oath was not discovered until after it was filed. Why? These oaths were both filed by Rerdell (3 C, page 866; 6 C, page 868). If before filing the oath he had discovered any error to be corrected, why should he file it at all? Can you answer me that, gentlemen? He filed the oath on the 6th of May which had been sworn to on the 21st of April. On the 8th of May he asked to withdraw it and file another, stating that there was an error in the first. If he had discovered the error in the oath he filed on the 6th of May before that time why file it at all? Can you answer me that? No man in his senses would file a paper in a department of the Government, which he knew at the time would have to be corrected and could not be acted upon until corrected, and which he then intended to withdraw and correct. That would be the height of folly. No one but an absolute idiot would have done such a thing. It is therefore plain that Rerdell did not discover any error on the 21st of April, 1879, nor until after the filing of the affidavit in which it is said the error existed.

But John W. Dorsey says that he received a letter from Rerdell on the morning of the 21st of April, asking him to make another oath correcting the error and saying he would destroy the first oath. How reconcile these? On the 21st of April Rerdell had not discovered any mistake. On the 21st of April, and from that date down to the 6th of May, when he filed the paper, he regarded the paper as a valid and correct paper and the sufficient foundation of an order to draw money to put in his master's pocket. On the 21st of April he could not possibly, therefore, have known of any error or have seen any defect in the paper that would impair its usefulness in the Post-Office Department. John W. Dorsey says that on the 21st of April he got a letter from Rerdell; that Rerdell told him he had discovered the error; asked him to write another oath, and said he would destroy the first oath in which the error occurred. Did he destroy it? No. What did he do with it? He kept it. What more? He filed it as a valid paper. Did not John W. Dorsey lie when he detailed the contents of such a letter? I say, gentlemen, that he committed willful and deliberate perjury on this stand when he swore that he had such a letter from Rerdell, and that his perjury is made out, not by the oath of another man, but made out by those circumstances which constrain your belief, even as against your will, if you should have willed against it. Rerdell never wrote such a letter. It is plain, too plain to talk about further.

This shows not only that John W. Dorsey cannot be credited, even as against the statement of Rerdell, but shows Rerdell and S. W. Dorsey in close communion with the officers of the contract office, and together in that office manipulating these affidavits. I have already said to you that the alleged error could not have been discovered until after the affidavit was filed, for if it had been discovered before it was filed it never would have been filed at all. After it was filed it turns out, however, that they have another one put in as a substitute. Therefore, the character of the affidavit in its objectionable features first became apparent and were developed after it came into the department. These circumstances not only corroborate Rerdell on the identical point in controversy as to all these affidavits, but condemn and blacken the testimony of Mr. John W. Dorsey, by showing that he has devised and concocted a narrative of falsehood. They also clearly show the relation in which these parties stood to Brady, and throw a flood of light upon the entire case. What did John W. Dorsey swear? Do you remember it? That on the morning of the 21st of April he made the first affidavit; that he then got a letter from Rerdell, telling him that there was an error in the first affidavit, and saying that he wanted him to swear to another to correct that first affidavit and send it on, and he would destroy the first. He concocted a whole consecutive narrative so plainly inconsistent with the circumstances in the natural order of the transaction that there can be left no doubt upon your minds that it was an ingeniously devised story told with the intent to delude and deceive the jury. I say Rerdell towers in character above that man, his co-conspirator, his confrere, the brother of Rerdell's teacher, tutor, master, and his leader in a life of iniquity.

To make it clearer that manifest perjury was committed by John W. Dorsey, I must recur to what he says in another part of his evidence as to these affidavits. You will observe that the affiant is designated as "subcontractor." Now, what does he say to that? [Two original affidavits handed to the jury.] You see the word "subcontractor" is written under John W. Dorsey's signature. I want to make this perjury of John W. Dorsey so plain to you that you will see it on the wall to-night after the candle is blown out. Let me read from page 4136:

Q. But you have no recollection of what he said to you when he sent you these affidavits, have you?—A. No, sir; nothing particularly.

Q. No independent recollection?—A. He wrote that word "subcontractor" in there. That is one of his tricks.

Open the affidavits and look at it.

The COURT. That is in the body of the affidavit, is it not?

Mr. MERRICK. No, sir; it is under Dorsey's name. Dorsey signed his name, and you see under his name is the word "subcontractor."

He wrote that word "subcontractor" in there. That is one of his tricks.

Q. How do you recollect it?—A. It is his handwriting.

The COURT. That is true.

Mr. MERRICK. That far it is true; now we will come to what is not true:

Q. He wrote that in there for you to swear to, and you swore to it like a man?—A. He wrote it in there after I swore to it. I never swore to any "subcontractor."

Q. You did not?—A. No, sir.

Q. Was there anything else written in there after you swore to it?—A. I don't know, sir.

That was written in there after John W. Dorsey swore to it, your honor. And yet John W. Dorsey testifies that he swore to that affidavit in the morning; that at the noon mail he got a letter from Rerdell saying that there was a mistake in it; asking him to make another and send it to him, and he would destroy the first; and yet he now says that the word "subcontractor" was written in there by Rerdell after the affidavit reached Washington City, and after Rerdell had written to him that there was a mistake in it, when there was no use in it, and he was going to destroy it.

Mr. CRANE. I do not see what the object was in writing the word "subcontractor" there.

Mr. MERRICK. He was neither contractor nor subcontractor, but the reason was this—

Mr. CRANE. [Interposing.] I remember now.

Mr. MERRICK. [Continuing]—that it required an oath from the contractor or subcontractor.

Mr. CRANE. Who was the contractor on that route?

Mr. MERRICK. Miner. The subcontract was on file, was it not?

Mr. BLISS. Not at that time.

Mr. MERRICK. No; it was S. W. Dorsey.

Mr. BLISS. Hanson's was the only subcontract on file, and that was not put on file until October, 1879.

Mr. MERRICK. Now, bear in mind that John W. Dorsey says that Rerdell wrote that word "subcontractor" after he swore to it; therefore that word must have been written in after the affidavit came back to Washington. You recollect, gentlemen, how I pressed him on that subject. You know I had him here on the stand for two or three days under a tolerably severe cross-examination. On page 4139, which I have already read, Dorsey gives his explanation. The theory of the other side is that Rerdell, on some day prior to the 21st of April, sent on one affidavit, and then on the morning of the same day Rerdell, finding that he had made a mistake in this first affidavit, sent on another in the same mail or the next mail of that same day. This must be so if both were received by Dorsey on the same day, as he says they were, one in the morning mail of the 21st, and the other in the afternoon mail of the same day. If they reached there on the same day, they started from here on the same day. Their theory is that Rerdell wrote the first affidavit, and sent it on in the morning mail of one day, then discovered his mistake, and then on that same day he wrote and sent on another. It may be asked, why did John W. Dorsey return both of these affidavits? He was mistaken in the first, and the first was to be destroyed. He swore to one in the morning, got his second letter at 12 o'clock, saying that there was an error in the first, and asking him to send on another. Why did he return both?

Mr. CRANE. He had already sent on the first affidavit.

Mr. MERRICK. That might have been the case.

The COURT. That is what he says.

Mr. MERRICK. Is that what he said? Well, he had sent on the first one as soon as he swore to it. But here is a somewhat peculiar circumstance: The word "subcontractor" was not on the paper when he swore to it. He mailed that paper on the 21st, say, and he could not have mailed it earlier, because he swore to it on that day. He states in his testimony, which I have read, that Rerdell wrote him that he would destroy the first affidavit, as useless, because of the mistake in it. A letter mailed in Vermont on the 21st would get here at a time when everybody on all sides concedes that Rerdell was in the far West. Rerdell was thousands of miles away, as conceded by everybody at that time.

The COURT. Mr. Merrick, I understand the explanation that John W. Dorsey made was this: That the 21st of April was Monday, and Rerdell left here on the 17th or 18th; the 17th would be Thursday, and the affidavits were probably prepared by Rerdell some time on the 17th; it might have been the night of the 17th.

Mr. MERRICK. Yes; I think that is so.

The COURT. And not put in the office until the 18th; that would be Friday; then, Sunday intervening, the affidavits would not reach him before Monday; one came before the other.

Mr. MERRICK. Reach Dorsey?

The COURT. Yes.

Mr. MERRICK. Yes, that is so. I do not think your honor caught my remark; my back being turned to you, I think a word must have escaped you.

The COURT. Perhaps.

Mr. MERRICK. It was not as to the time the affidavit reached Dorsey; it was as to the time that the letter inclosing the affidavit reached Rerdell.

The COURT. And Rerdell was back here by the 5th of May?

Mr. MERRICK. Oh, yes; I am coming to that.

The COURT. And the first of these affidavits was filed on the 6th of May, and the other on the 8th.

Mr. MERRICK. Yes, that is right.

The COURT. So that if the affidavits, as John W. Dorsey testified, were sent back by him on the 21st, they might have lain in the office until the return of Rerdell.

Mr. MERRICK. I suppose they did.

The COURT. And he would then have received them both at the same time.

Mr. MERRICK. He would then have received them both at the same time; but if he received them both at the same time, why, in the name of all that is good and bad, would he write "subcontractor" on the defective affidavit which he had determined to destroy, and proceed to file it, with a good one in his pocket? Why should he proceed to perfect that which was beyond the reach of being perfected, when he had the perfect thing in the same envelope that contained the imperfect one?

Mr. INGERSOLL. How could he have had them in the same envelope if they were sent at different times?

Mr. MERRICK. In another envelope, then, and both in his pocket at the same time.

Mr. INGERSOLL. There is no evidence that it was in his pocket.

Mr. MERRICK. No, sir; say in his office, then, on his table; and there on his table laid the erroneous affidavit by the side of the correct affidavit, and he sits down and attempts to perfect the erroneous affidavit, and then goes and files it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is the first one he picked up.

Mr. MERRICK. That is your theory.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is my theory.

Mr. MERRICK. Wise, learned man! I again must use his term—"Infinitely" learned man! [Laughter.]

This case, Mr. Foreman, is not to be decided by accidental circumstances, but by facts, facts in their relation and connection with each other, and according to the logic of events, according to the logic which we know belongs to the course of human conduct under ordinary circumstances.

Rerdell was at Sidney, Nebraska, on the 21st of April; that is conceded; and at Greeley on the 23d or 24th. The letter written on the 21st, therefore, reached here when Rerdell was away, and lay here. The consequence follows, if John W. Dorsey is to be credited, that Rerdell, after his return on the 5th of May, wrote the word "subcontractor," having accidentally picked up that affidavit without reading it, and then, still without reading it, without knowing which one it was, took it up to the department and filed it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. He had two petitions.

Mr. MERRICK. He wrote the word "subcontractor" under Dorsey's signature. You see how they are disturbed, how in regard to perjury in this case they strain at gnats and yet swallow camels. He wrote the word "subcontractor" to complete and make available this paper which he had promised before the 21st of April to destroy as useless, and at the same time had asked for and had obtained a correct paper to take its place. Gentlemen, do counsel suppose that you are thus to be played upon?

Mr. LOWERY (a juror). The word "subcontractor" was not written on both, was it?

Mr. MERRICK. Yes, written on both; that is the fact. Rerdell was a jolly boy. He served his master faithfully, profited by his instructions, and learned his lesson well.

Such subterfuges, gentlemen, from men of the ability of the counsel on the other side are only made in those desperate conditions when, overwhelmed by evidence, in their agony and in their despair, they substitute sophistry for logic, and strive by jeers, such as we have just seen, to push away stern facts. Mr. Ingersoll says that innocence is free and frank and careless, and makes no preparation for days of disaster. That is true. But let me say to you, gentlemen, that conscious guilt is apprehensive, cowardly, and given to the habit of endeavoring to escape the consequences of one crime by the commission of others oftener of greater magnitude. If a defendant, like John W. Dorsey, lies when on the witness-stand, it is from conscious guilt. He lies with the intent and the hope to escape conviction by his perjury. Better, far better, for a defendant, that one or more of his witnesses should tell a hundred falsehoods than that the defendant himself should tell upon the witness-stand a single lie. His lie is a confession of his guilt, and no human sophistry, no human reasoning, though the heart may swell to bursting with pity and sorrow at the admission, can deny this conclusion drawn from the immutable laws of nature.

I am now about to pass upon another subject, if the court please, which will occupy greatly more time than remains until the usual hour of adjournment. If agreeable to your honor, it would accommodate me if you would now adjourn the court.

The COURT. Adjourn the court.

Thereupon (at 3 o'clock and 47 minutes p. m.) the court adjourned until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

FRIDAY, JUNE 1, 1883.

The court met at 11 o'clock.

Present, counsel for the Government and for the defendants.

Mr. MERRICK. [Resuming.] With submission to the court and gentlemen of the jury: I am sure that you will pardon me if I recur to a subject already discussed and trouble you again for a few minutes with some further explanation of the process of calculation by which the result of additional compensation upon expedited routes is to be reached according to the rule laid down in the law. I do this, which you may suppose to be almost a work of supererogation, for the reason that I deem it important that each one of you should clearly comprehend this process in order to appreciate the manner in which this business was conducted, and because a great many persons would, upon a first statement of these propositions, almost naturally be led to suppose that where a contractor in making his affidavit swore to a less number of horses and carriers on the existing schedule than were really required, he would be seeming to cheat himself; whereas, in point of fact, the reduction of the number of horses and carriers in the affidavit below the number actually required on the present schedule is the elementary and first fraudulent step in the transaction of getting wrongful compensation upon the expedited schedule. You will recollect that I read you the law, and I have no doubt that you bear that law pretty accurately in mind. It prescribes the process the department was required to adopt in such cases where, after examination, it might find additional horses and carriers necessary to execute the order for expedition. I will read it to you again:

No extra allowance shall be made for any increase of expedition in carrying the mail unless thereby the employment of additional stock and carriers is made necessary, and in such case the additional compensation shall bear no greater proportion to the additional stock and carriers necessarily employed than the compensation in the original contract bears to the stock and carriers necessarily employed in its execution.

Now, as this proportion must remain, as I have explained to you, through all changes and all conditions, therefore, as I have demonstrated, I am sure, to your satisfaction, under the law no losing contract can ever become a gaining contract by expedition. I showed you by the testimony of Brady and Vaile that my demonstration was correct. I now desire you to appreciate the rule more clearly as laid down in the law. The wider the difference between the present number of horses and carriers on the present schedule, which is taken by advertisement, and the number of men and horses to be required on an expedited schedule, the greater will be the pay on the expedited schedule. To make the difference wider you may adopt one of two processes, or you may adopt both. You may diminish the number required on the present schedule below what that number ought to be, or you may increase the number on the proposed schedule beyond what that number ought to be. If you give the number required on the increased schedule accurately, as it ought to be, and reduce the number required on the present schedule below what it ought to be, you increase the distance between the two numbers just by the amount that you reduce the number on the present schedule below what it ought to be. If you reduce the number on the present schedule below what it ought to be and increase the number on the proposed schedule beyond what it ought to be, you make the difference wider still by being faithless and false at both ends. There seemed to be some little trouble about understanding exactly how these proportions were preserved in the two affidavits of John W. Dorsey on the route from Pueblo to Rosita. I have just stated the sum here on paper so that you might understand it. The first oath was: fifteen hours, seven times a week, three men, and twelve animals, making fifteen in all; ten hours, seven times a week, seven men and thirty-eight animals, making forty-five. The second oath was: fifteen hours, seven times a week, two men and six animals—eight; on the proposed schedule, six men and eighteen animals—twenty-four. The animals differed in the two oaths by the difference between eighteen and thirty-eight, which is twenty.

These proportions were observed so as to make exactly the same result and to fill therefore the same amount of compensation. How that was done seemed to me to be somewhat of a perplexing question. The way was simply this: The original pay was, for one trip, $388; for six additional trips, $2,328; for seven trips, $2,716; cost of expedition, $5,432; making in all, $8,148. Instead of regarding the $8,148 as an unknown quantity we take it as a known quantity. Now for the first oath, as fifteen men and horses on the present schedule are to forty-five on the proposed schedule, so is the pay on the present schedule, $2,716, to $8,148. Now take the other oath. If you figure that in the same way you will find the result just the same.

But the plainest way to understand it, and I am surprised that I find some people outside who do not understand it, is to bear this in mind: That, according to the law, as the proportion must be observed, the wider the difference you make between the number of horses and carriers on the present schedule and the number of horses and carriers on the proposed schedule the larger will be the pay. Therefore in order to cheat, you may reduce the number required on the present schedule, or enlarge the number required on the new schedule, or do both. I shall show you further that on these affidavits they invariably did one or the other, and generally both. I have recurred to this subject for the reason that I observed that some of the jury did not seem fully to understand the matter.

There is another circumstance connected with John W. Dorsey's two affidavits on the Pueblo and Rosita route, which I explained to you yesterday in connection with his testimony. In that explanation I am satisfied I convinced you beyond the possibility of a doubt that John W. Dorsey had been guilty of deliberate perjury on this stand before this jury; not accidentally at all, but deliberate perjury, and that he had devised a consecutive narrative in order to protect himself from the peril of your verdict against him. He thus convicted himself, for when a defendant goes upon the stand under the privileges of the law that he may testify, and testifies to what the jury believe he knows to be a lie, it is equivalent to a confession of guilt.

The FOREMAN (Mr. Crane). There is one thing I cannot understand—how those affidavits of John W. Dorsey as subcontractor were ever allowed to be filed in the department. Only the contractor could file them.

Mr. MERRICK. Only the contractor.

The FOREMAN. I do not understand how they ever got on file.

Mr. MERRICK. Only the contractor under the regulations could make an affidavit for expedition, but according to the testimony I think Mr. Vaile asked to have some subcontractor's affidavit filed and Mr. Brady consented to accept the affidavit of the subcontractor, against the regulations.

The COURT. Mr. Brady said that he saw nothing in the way of accepting the affidavit of the subcontractor where the subcontractor had an assignment, in effect, of the whole interest.

Mr. MERRICK. Yes, sir; that was plain enough.

The COURT. That is, where the subcontract showed that 100 per cent. of the increase should be his. He had the contract, and if an increase of service or expedition was allowed he was by the terms of his contract entitled to the whole of it. I understood Mr. Brady to say that he regarded that as placing the subcontractor upon the same footing in regard to the affidavit as though he had been the original contractor, because he had a whole interest. That was his position as I understood it.

Mr. MERRICK. That was the position he took, and that was all the explanation he gave. There was some sense in that explanation, too, because where the subcontractor takes the route at full pay the original contractor has no further pecuniary interest in it, although he is still subject to a possible pecuniary liability. Having made his contract with the Government he can never release himself from the bond he has entered into to the effect that the work shall be performed according to the orders of the department. Although he may subcontract it at the full pay he still remains in subjection to the covenants of the bond. The only way of securing himself would be to take a bond of indemnity from the subcontractor. When he gives the contract to the subcontractor and the subcontractor is to receive all the pay, then the contractor need not look further after the work except to see that he does not become liable on his bond by reason of the delinquency of the subcontractor; and as the subcontractor has assumed the burden of doing the work, then it is very reasonable that his affidavit should be as good as the affidavit of the contractor, and probably better, because he knows more about what is going on and is able to give a statement of greater accuracy, derived from greater intelligence and information. But your honor, in the case inquired of by Mr. Crane, as in the greater part of these cases, the subcontractor who filed the affidavit was not subcontractor at the full amount of the pay. The subcontractor only had part. In the particular case before us John W. Dorsey, whose name was designated as a subcontractor, was neither contractor nor subcontractor.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Merrick, I dislike exceedingly to interrupt you, but if you will point out a case of that kind I will be very much obliged to you.

Mr. MERRICK. John W. Dorsey was neither contractor nor subcontractor on the Pueblo and Rosita route.

Mr. WILSON. You are mistaken.

Mr. MERRICK. How am I mistaken? Show me wherein I am mistaken. If I am mistaken I will take it back.

Mr. KER. You are not mistaken.

Mr. MERRICK (to Mr. Wilson.) You cannot do it. The record shows he was neither one nor the other, and you know it.

Mr. WILSON. Now, Mr. Merrick, you ought not to say that I know it.

The COURT. That is personal. A lawyer is not bound to speak of his own knowledge.

Mr. MERRICK. Pardon me, I did not want to say that.

Mr. WILSON. I do not object to Mr. Merrick's saying I know it.

Mr. MERRICK. I will say to Brother Wilson that the record does not show it.

Mr. WILSON. Before you get through I will point it out to you.

Mr. MERRICK. Do it now.

Mr. WILSON. I cannot do it now without the record before me. I must have a little opportunity to look it up.

The COURT. It would be a wise lawyer who knew this entire record.

Mr. MERRICK. I venture to say that there is no subcontract on file with John W. Dorsey on that route, and John W. Dorsey on the stand swore he did not know whether he was subcontractor or not. It was the "Don't know" and "Don't remember" that ran down the line of these defendants like the serpent trail of iniquity, to be followed by the lightning stroke of retribution.

Mr. WILSON. I know you will correct it when the record is shown.

Mr. MERRICK. I will correct it if it is in the record.

Mr. WILSON. I know you will, and at the proper time I will show it to you.

The COURT. I see on the record that John R. Miner was the contractor on this route and there was a subcontract to Eli Hansom.

Mr. MERRICK. And a subcontract to S. W. Dorsey, but not to John W. Dorsey. John W. Dorsey never was a subcontractor. I say this subject to correction. I will take it back if I am in error, for I intend to be as frank with you as I could you see through my bosom into my heart. I say, subject to correction if I am in error, that John W. Dorsey was neither contractor nor subcontractor. There are other routes of the same kind where affidavits were made by parties who were neither contractors nor subcontractors, and I will refer to them. Mr. Crane asks how was it that that affidavit was accepted? How was it that all these things were done? How was it that routes taken at less than $50,000 per annum in a short time paid the parties that took them at that small sum, nearly half a million dollars per annum? How did that thing happen? When you ask me how these things happen I say that you have marched far on the road to the ultimate conclusion to which I am endeavoring to lead you by the force of the facts in this case, endeavoring with sorrow and regret that I am obliged and constrained by the facts to lead you to that conclusion. I say, gentlemen, that when you ask that question you are far on the road and have passed a point beyond which you cannot turn back, unless the facts I state are erroneously stated. How could these marvelous things be? What said his honor when they were presented to him, as I read you the other day, and to which I will again in this connection call your attention. His mind was asking itself the same question you were asking me. What said he? I read from page 2052:

As to the official acts of Brady, we have in evidence the appropriation made by Congress, the extravagant expenditures in regard to star-route expenses by which those appropriations were exhausted; application made to Congress for new appropriations, and the expenditure of those appropriations; the character of these different acts; these sudden orders for increase of service and increase of expedition which the jury have a right to pass upon and compare with the necessities that existed, or with the requirements of the service; and for myself, as I have to decide this question upon the effect of these acts upon my mind, I must acknowledge that they have made a very deep impression of an adverse character to the bona fides of those orders.

The only answer to these inquiries, Mr. Foreman, is that these orders and these proceedings were not in good faith. In other words, the answer to your inquiry is the indictment found by the grand jury and now before the court, which you are trying, namely, the charge against these men that they were co-conspirators in these transactions, disregarding the obligations of law and trampling upon its forms and its substance in order that they might rob the Treasury and defraud the United States. The answer to your question, sir, is "guilty as charged in the indictment." The indictment answers the question. It says there was conspiracy and collusion in order to produce the criminal result of robbing the Government. Hence, Mr. Foreman, you cannot be surprised at anything done which to your mind ought not to have been done. You cannot be amazed at any act which shocks your sense of propriety. You cannot wonder at any proceeding which in your judgment is plainly contrary to law. The organization itself among these men shocks our sense of propriety. The proof shows that the proceedings of the organization in order to carry out its object were all in violation of the law. When you have determined that there was such an organization and that this was its object and this was the mode of prosecuting its design, you have answered all the inquiries that arise in the mind of an honest man as to why, whence, and wherefore these things were, and were done. It is an interesting circumstance in the case in connection with your inquiry that an affidavit written by one conspirator, Rerdell, sworn to in blank by another conspirator, J. W. Dorsey, was filled up in its material parts by Rerdell, and under the name of J. W. Dorsey was written by Rerdell the designation of his relation to the contract, namely, that he was the subcontractor. Then J. W. Dorsey came before you and swore that he never wrote that word, and did not know that he was subcontractor or had any relation whatever to that route. Does not this help you to answer, and have not you since you asked me the question moved still further on that road towards ultimate conviction and satisfied opinion?

Now, gentlemen, there is an interesting circumstance connected with the 21st day of April, 1879, in the history of John W. Dorsey. It seems by the evidence that we have been considering that he made two affidavits on that day in reference to the route known as the route from Pueblo to Rosita, but was that all the work he did in a moral way on that day? Was that all his moral mill ground out in the way of affidavits? No, gentlemen. On that day John W. Dorsey was much occupied in the affidavit business. He not only swore to those two affidavits on the Pueblo and Rosita route on April 21st, but he swore to another one equally false on the Silverton and Parrott City route, and on the same day another one equally false on the Tres Alamos and Clifton route—that is, if he swore to them at all. He made four affidavits on that day. I say he was making blank affidavits to go in stock, to be filled up as the emergency required by whoever was designated by the conspiracy to manipulate and fill them up, for he made four on that one day. That was enough; that exhausted his moral nerve, swearing to four blank affidavits in one day, leaving them to be filled up with he knew not what, nor cared he what. So he suspended, and he laid by for five days. Then he began again. On the 26th day of April, five days afterwards, he swore to a blank affidavit on White River to Rawlins; on the 26th of April he made a blank affidavit on Trinidad to Madison; on the 26th day of April he made a blank affidavit on the Ojo Caliente route. Then, fatigued with his burdens, he sank down. He made four blank affidavits on the 21st, and three blank affidavits on the 26th. By the 26th the stock was running a little short and had to be filled up. It was filled up in the same way. I shall consider now some of those affidavits of the 26th, as I go along.

I will first take the route from Trinidad to Madison, No. 38140. John R. Miner was the contractor; subcontractors, De Busk and Burgner; length of route, forty-five miles; service, one trip a week in thirteen hours (page 1026); original pay, $338. November 13, 1878, Raton was added to the route (page 1028) and paid for at the rate of $172.75. You will recollect, gentlemen, I may say in passing, how both Mr. Bliss and Mr. Ker explained to you the manner in which Raton was added to that route; and I will give it some little further explanation than they gave, in order that you may have it implanted in your minds, but not just at this moment; I am now on another matter. April 22, 1879, increased two trips; pay, $1,021.50. May 19, 1879, expedited from nineteen and three-quarters to twelve hours; pay, $2,758. Total pay, $4,290.30. The oath of John W. Dorsey, in which he is designated as subcontractor, was sworn to before Kellogg, April 26, 1879, and filed April 30, 1879. (I will just remark, in passing, that you know Rerdell was not here then; he was out in the far West.) The oath was taken before Kellogg April 26, and filed April 30, 1879. Schedule for nineteen and three-quarter hours, three trips, one man and four animals. For twelve-hour schedule, three trips, three men and eleven animals.

Now, who filled that affidavit in; and was it blank when sworn to? These are the questions to which I shall now direct your attention upon those affidavits.

Boone swears (page 2692) that the figures "38140" and the words as written out, "three," "one," "four," "three," "three," "eleven," and "subcontractor," are in different handwritings, and that, to the best of his judgment, the oath was filled in by S. W. Dorsey, taking the circumstances in connection with it; that the word "twelve" is in another handwriting, and resembles Rerdell's. Now, there are three handwritings in that affidavit. (Follow me along closely, gentlemen, and bear these things in mind.) That the body of the oath was written by Kellogg, but that he is doubtful as to whether the signature of John W. Dorsey is genuine. There are four handwritings. (We are getting these gentlemen pretty close together.) The body of the oath was written by Kellogg; that is conceded. Boone swears that, in his judgment, taking into consideration the circumstances, all the material parts of the oath were written by S. W. Dorsey—the number of men and animals, the time, and the name of the route; that the “twelve” he thinks was written by Rerdell; he does not think the signature of John W. Dorsey probably his. In that he is mistaken, as I will show you. The signature of John W. Dorsey is genuine. Rerdell did write the “twelve,” Kellogg wrote the body of the affidavit, and S. W. Dorsey wrote all the rest. Here are three of the conspirators and their agent, Kellogg, having a hand in this affidavit. And I will show you, gentlemen, that that word “twelve” written in there by Rerdell was written in the department after it was filed, when Rerdell scratched out another word and wrote the word “twelve” to suit Mr. Brady.

Rerdell's testimony (page 2336) is to the same effect as Boone's, except that he says that the signature of John W. Dorsey is genuine, and that, further, he (Rerdell) filled in the word “twelve” after the oath was filed, having previously erased the word “fifteen.” The oath on its face bears evidence of having been filled up in different colored inks and handwritings, and, gentlemen, I want to call your attention to the fact that this oath (6 E) says “one men,” and therefore that circumstance shows that that was written before the word “one,” and you will see the different hands. [6 E handed to the jury.] Just look at it and you will see where “twelve” is written over an erasure. I want you to examine it and see if that is not so, as Rerdell says it was. I know I am a little tedious about this business, gentlemen, but although I may fatigue you, I think I can flatter myself that you will be better satisfied that I take so much time, because I feel convinced that I am enlightening you.

The COURT. What is the date of that affidavit?

Mr. MERRICK. Twenty-sixth of April.

Do you suppose, gentlemen of the jury, that any man, educated as all these men are, and especially S. W. Dorsey, according to Mr. Ingersoll's description of him, would write “one men?”

Now, gentlemen, I will hand you, in connection with that affidavit, just in passing, as a matter of incidental interest to you, the letter transmitting it to the department. [5 E handed to the jury.] The letter of John W. Dorsey, dated April 28, 1879, transmitting the oath, was both written and signed by S. W. Dorsey. That looks like John W. Dorsey's handwriting. He tried to imitate it. This pure and high-minded statesman, so far above ordinary men that the law cannot reach him, in the opinion of his counsel, sits down to the small business of an attempted forgery. That is what Boone says.

Mr. CRANE (foreman of the jury). Was not John W. Dorsey here at the time?

Mr. MERRICK. At the time that letter was written?

Mr. CRANE. Yes, sir.

Mr. MERRICK. I cannot answer.

Mr. CRANE. I think there is some evidence on that point.

Mr. MERRICK. I think it is very likely he may have been, but I do not know of any evidence of the fact.

Mr. WILSON. I understand he says he was.

Mr. MERRICK. Very well, that is no evidence of that fact, but I think we will accept that for the moment, and suppose he was; he says he was.

Rerdell was not. Boone swears that that letter was written and signed by S. W. Dorsey, from his knowledge of Dorsey's handwriting; and so does Rerdell swear the same, and S. W. Dorsey went on the stand and does not deny it, and does not deny having filled in the affidavit. I will hereafter deal with S. W. Dorsey in personam. But suffice it for the present that both Boone and Rerdell testify that S. W. Dorsey wrote that letter and signed John W. Dorsey's name to it. My only reason for showing you the letter was to show you that S. W. Dorsey attempted to disguise his handwriting and make it look like John W. Dorsey's. And, according to his statement, S. W. Dorsey was himself the only man interested in the route at that time. Whether that be true, or not true, it is what he says, and for my purpose I will adopt it. No other man on earth had any motive in making an affidavit and in filling it up and manipulating papers, or in dealing with the matter of increase and expedition, according to his statement. This was one of the routes which, according to his statement, had been divided up the 1st of April, 1879; and I will show you that that division—when I reach that point of the case—was a division of the spoils of robbers, and that the taint which they bore on the 1st of April followed them, growing still worse and more noxious in the air through the sultry summer months, even on down to the time of this investigation. The division was a mere sham and a fraud. If honestly intended to be carried out and executed according to the contract, if the conspiracy existed at that time and these routes were tainted, no one of the conspirators could by such a division free himself from the body of the death of the crime that had attached to themselves.

The affidavit was made during Rerdell's absence in the West. That, I suppose, is a conceded fact; and if the testimony of Boone is correct, Rerdell wrote the word "twelve," which appears to have been written in after it was filed, as testified to by Rerdell. The oath was filed on the 30th of April. On the 5th of May the oath had been filed. It was sworn to after Rerdell left here, namely, on the 26th of April. The latest day that anybody fixes for his departure is the 18th of April. It was sworn to on the 26th, and filed on the 30th. It was therefore sworn to and filed during his absence from the city. If, then, the word "twelve" was written by Rerdell, that was written after he came back on the 5th of May, and consequently after the oath had been placed among the records of the department. That is plain. If that is so, gentlemen, is this not strong corroborative proof sustaining Rerdell—Boone swearing that Rerdell wrote the word "twelve?" Does not Boone's oath corroborate Rerdell's? And do not all the surrounding circumstances corroborate him—his absence at the time of the filing, his absence at the time of the swearing, and his presence subsequently? As I go along I shall accept the various incidents as they arise, connected with that fact, and use them for the purpose of corroborating Rerdell.

S. W. Dorsey filled in the oath and wrote and signed John W. Dorsey's name to the letter of transmittal on a route on which Miner was contractor. None of the papers name any specific time, except the letters of Chaffee and Belford, which ask to have the trip made in one day, and the oath of John W. Dorsey is erased so as to conform to a twelve-hour schedule. On this forged, erased, and altered oath by a man who was a total stranger to the route, so far as the records of the department are concerned, Brady allowed $2,758.05 per annum. But my purpose in bringing it to your attention in connection with the line of argument I am pursuing is to satisfy you as to the manner in which these oaths were manipulated, and incidentally that Brady was a party to such manipulation. At the same time these corroborations of Rerdell are calculated to give him such vitality as will presently cause him to make some noise in the coffin in which Mr. Ingersoll supposed he had so tightly nailed him.

I say, gentlemen, it proves that Brady was helping this manipulation. How and why? Rerdell, as I told you, swears that he wrote the word "twelve," and wrote it over an erasure. Boone swears that it is his handwriting. I have shown you that he could not have done it up to the 5th of May on account of absence, and that on the 5th of May it was in the department. How could Rerdell get access to a paper in the archives of the department, in the office of General Brady, without General Brady's consent? Who had the paper in custody? In whose charge was it? Who was its guardian, its protector? It belonged to the files of the department. It was the foundation, the groundwork upon which was to be built the order taking money from the Treasury of the United States. That order taking money from the Treasury of the United States was to be passed by Brady. To Brady, therefore, was given the custody of the papers that formed the conditions precedent of the order. In Brady's charge was this paper, in Brady's desk was this paper, and in his hand belonged this paper. Without disturbing that hand, and without knowledge to him, Rerdell could not have gone into the Post-Office Department and have obtained possession of this paper and erased one word and written in another.

Again, why was not the order passed on the paper as it had originally stood without the change? Because Brady wanted a change. Brady, gentlemen, did not choose to pass the order on the affidavit as it stood, and when Rerdell came, as the agent of S. W. Dorsey, to inquire into the condition of things, and to know why the order was not made, Brady tells him, I have no doubt, "I do not want to pass it on that affidavit; there is some objection to it; here, take it and have it fixed." So there in Brady's office Rerdell takes the affidavit, scratches out the objectionable word, whatever it may have been, and over the erasure writes a word that Brady wanted in order to pass the order the contractors desired.

You not only see, gentlemen, by this single paper how these affidavits were made, with what utter disregard of the truth, with what utter disregard of even the decencies of a respectable appearance in reference to the truth, but how these affidavits were made by the manipulation of all the conspirators. And you see enough here to bring these parties directly together—Brady in his office, Rerdell taking the paper from his custody in order to perpetrate a forgery and erasure, John W. Dorsey swearing to it, S. W. Dorsey filling it up, and Rerdell having no relation to it, except as the agent of Dorsey, and going there to see about it. With these simple facts you tie these four defendants up in one solid mass of conspiracy; you tie them up as combined conspirators mutually acting for the benefit of some one of them, and each one doing some co-ordinate act necessary for the consummation of the final fraud of which they, or some of them, were to become the beneficiaries.

What more need you to establish a conspiracy than evidence such as that? But upon the conspiracy itself I shall dwell more largely at another time. I am done with those papers (5 E and 6 E). Let them go, but bear them in mind, gentlemen.

Now, I am tempted to do what I regret to do, to digress a little from the line of my argument in order to call your attention to a most remarkable state of affairs on this route. There is a feature about the route from Trinidad to Madison that is so peculiar that I must bring it to your attention. The route was let at forty-five miles over a direct road; the schedule was thirteen hours; that would be three and forty-six one-hundredths miles per hour. September 18, 1878, S. W. De Busk, a very intelligent witness—you probably recollect him; he was a bright-looking, tall, well-made man, with bushy, sandy hair, and was remarkably correct and fluent in his language, and I asked him how it came; he told me he was a preacher—a very intelligent witness, wrote to the department that in March, 1878, a post-office had been established at Raton, and asked to have it supplied from Pulaski, a railway station twelve miles distant, twice a week (page 1027). There was a railway coming around up north of Raton, and it was twelve miles distant.

Mr. WILSON. I think you state that inaccurately.

Mr. MERRICK. Look at page 1027. It was embraced on the route from Trinidad to Madison, and by an order dated June 6, 1878, and November 13, 1878, twenty-three miles were added to the distance, and $175 per annum to the pay. Now, you will understand that it was desired that Raton should be put on the upper route, where there was a railroad, but this route from Trinidad to Madison was wrenched out of its way to embrace Raton, contrary to the wishes of the people.

The service once a week was bid off by John R. Miner, originally, at $338 a year. But in the distribution it fell to S. W. Dorsey. When the twenty-three miles were added for Raton the schedule was elongated from thirteen to nineteen and three-fourths hours. The affair now was fixed and ready for manipulation. We have arrived at the interesting point: From May 1, 1879, Brady added two trips, $1,021.50. From May 19, 1879, he reduced the running time from nineteen and three-fourths to twelve hours, allowing annually $2,758.05. The pay for three trips was $1,532.25; for expedition, $2,758.05; total, $4,290.30. The time between Trinidad and Madison was thirteen hours in the advertisement, and twelve hours under the expedition. The embracing of Raton lengthened the schedule to nineteen and three-fourths hours. If Raton had been supplied from the nearer office, at Pulaski on the railroad, as the postmaster asked, there would have been no excuse for expedition or for taking this $2,758 from the Treasury. What was Raton, this little side post-office, made to cost? We have another simple sum in proportion. As sixty-eight miles is to twenty-three miles, so is $4,290.30 to $1,451. De Busk testifies that the salary of the office was about $12 per annum. Thus Raton was put on that route contrary to the express wish of the postmaster, and was made to serve as a pretext for expedition at a cost of $2,758, which otherwise would not have had the flimsiest pretext to defend it.

Mr. WILSON. May I interrupt you to correct you?

Mr. MERRICK. If I am wrong in what I have said.

Mr. WILSON. You have said now two or three times that the postmaster requested that Raton should be supplied with mail from Pulaski. I beg to call your attention to it and to say that I think you are in error. I know you will correct it as soon as you find you are wrong.

Mr. MERRICK. I was referring to the letter of September 18, 1878.

Mr. WILSON. You mean the letter of De Busk?

Mr. MERRICK. De Busk, the postmaster—

Mr. WILSON. [Interposing.] Please give me the page.

Mr. MERRICK. 1027; in which he says:

The newly finished branch of the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railroad passes within ten miles of Raton post-office. Pulaski post-office is twelve miles distant from Raton, and directly on this line of the railroad.

Mr. WILSON. The last paragraph in the letter is the one.

Mr. MERRICK. [Reading:]

The object of this communication is to petition for mail service twice a week, if not from any central point to Raton, at least from Pulaski post-office.

Am I not right?

Mr. WILSON. No.

Mr. MERRICK. "At least from Pulaski;" he tells you how near it is; he tells you that it is on the railroad; points it out, and gives reasons to show why that is the proper place. And yet you give him communication with a star-route on a slow schedule over a longer line from Raton to the route than from Raton to Pulaski, and you tell me he does not there say by implication or expressly that that is where he wanted the route.

Mr. WILSON. No, pardon me, Mr. Merrick; his request was "if not from any central point to Raton, at least from Pulaski."

Mr. MERRICK. "If not from any central point"—I have read it. If not from any central point, at least from this point, and this is the place, as I have shown you in the preceding paragraph, by telling you that it is on the railroad, and it is only so many miles distant. If my Brother Wilson had been Second Assistant Postmaster-General would he have done it? No, sir; not unless his conscience has undergone a metamorphosis by reason of the air of the contractors that he has been obliged to breathe. I have made no mistake there.

But the end is not yet. De Busk testifies that no mail was supplied to Raton by the contractor on this route until January, 1879, and that from January, 1879, until the following May it was supplied but once a week. Up to April 30, 1879, Harvey M. Vaile, assignee—of whom I shall have some pleasant things to say—drew full pay, with no deduction for the non-supply of Raton. And from April 1 until the supply became tri-weekly, in May, S. W. Dorsey drew the increased pay for two trips a week which were never performed. Correct me there, too, if you can. Vaile with his hand in, Dorsey with his hand in——

Mr. WILSON. [Interposing.] If you want me to correct you I will do so.

Mr. MERRICK. If I am wrong I want to be corrected.

Mr. WILSON. If you have any case where service was paid for that was not performed, I would be exceedingly obliged to you if you would present it.

Mr. MERRICK. The record shows that the service was paid for.

Mr. WILSON. Show me any case where the service was not performed and paid for.

Mr. MERRICK. Very well, I will do it.

Mr. WILSON. It will be greatly gratifying to me.

Mr. MERRICK. I will do it; it is in the record.

Mr. WILSON. All right.

Mr. MERRICK. The service was not performed and was paid for.

Mr. WILSON. Show it.

Mr. MERRICK. And I will bring in the record, although in an argument like this I cannot always be ready to put my finger on the page.

Mr. WILSON. If you find any case where anything of that kind was done and where the pay was not afterwards deducted from the contractor, I would be very happy to have you show it.

Mr. MERRICK. I will show the jury my whole case.

Mr. WILSON. All right.

Mr. MERRICK. I do not think your apprehension is——

Mr. WILSON. [Interposing.] Oh, not the slightest apprehension.

Mr. MERRICK. You seem to be disturbed. The pay was given, and it was recouped after this investigation began, sir, and not while your man Brady remained in office. Here is the record in the hands of my associate, Mr. Bliss; you can take it, with him, and look it over.

Mr. WILSON. I think I understand the circumstances.

Mr. MERRICK. I do not think you do.

The COURT. Mr. Merrick, this conversation between you and Judge Wilson is out of place.

Mr. MERRICK. Entirely out of place, but a proper respect requires that I should reply to him.

Mr. WILSON. If your honor please, I was only calling his attention to what I think is a mistake.

The COURT. Of course you have a right to call his attention to a matter of that kind.

Mr. BLISS. Mr. Merrick asks me to read the table of payments on the Trinidad and Madison route, on page 729.

November 12, 1878, for the third quarter of 1878, $84.50 was paid to H. M. Vaile, assignee.

Mr. WILSON. How many trips?

Mr. BLISS. I am reading the record.

For the fourth quarter of 1878, $170.88 was paid January 25, 1879, to H. M. Vaile, assignee.

For the first quarter of 1879, $127.69 was paid to H. M. Vaile, assignee, May 10, 1879.

For the second quarter of 1879, $624.68 was paid to S. W. Dorsey, July 25, 1879.

Mr. WILSON. How many trips?

Mr. BLISS. The order will show the trips.

Mr. WILSON. Certainly.

Mr. BLISS. That was the total pay as fixed by the schedule; the trips on which Mr. De Busk testifies were not made.

Mr. MERRICK. Now, gentlemen, I will call your attention to another route, showing when these affidavits were filled up and that they were blank when sworn to—Toquerville to Adairville. I have already had that route under consideration in reference to one or two matters connected with the case. Length of route, one hundred and thirty-two miles; one trip, sixty hours; original pay, $1,168. (It is refreshing to see how these routes grow in value to contractors and cost to the Government.) October 10, 1878, increase of two trips, $2,336. July 8, 1879, increase, four trips, $4,672. Total pay for trips, $8,176. The same date, July 8, expedited to thirty-three hours, $12,718.22. Total pay for trips and expedition, $20,894, on a route which twelve months before had paid $1,168. We have discussed that before. Oath by John M. Peck, contractor, sworn to January 22, 1879, filed June 25, 1879. On that oath an order for expedition was made July 8, 1879.

And now let me call your attention to one circumstance applicable not only to this oath, but to a great many others, particularly to some of Dorsey's, but to all of Peck's, every one of them. I do not know whether your attention has been attracted to it heretofore or not. I refer to the long period of time elapsing between the date at which the oath was taken and the date at which it was filed. That applies to all of Peck's oaths without exception.

This was sworn to January 22, 1879, but was not filed until June 25, 1879. You will see, gentlemen, as I go along, that this oath was one of that batch of blank affidavits distributed at the time of the division of the routes on the 1st of April, 1879, as a burglar's tool previously provided for the use of the conspiracy, and then given to the man who had charge of the safe that the burglar's tool was fashioned to break open. As Rerdell swears, at this distribution these affidavits were divided up and S. W. Dorsey took a lot of the blank affidavits. Here was one of Peck's sworn to January 22, 1879, and never filed until June 25, 1879. Boone swears (page 2688) that the body was written by Miner, and the number of the route and the figures relating to the men and animals by Rerdell; and Miner admits, in his examination, that he wrote it, which is probably a circumstance that might lead some of you to doubt whether he did or not. Rerdell corroborates Boone, and swears further that he did fill in the oath about June 25, 1879, the date upon which it was filed; that the signature of Peck is a genuine signature, and that the oath is one of the blanks turned over at the time of the alleged division of the routes, and that when a petition for increase arrived S. W. Dorsey instructed him to fill up one of Peck's affidavits for daily service and to preserve the proportion of 150 to 250 per cent. increase. Now, before I comment upon that, or say another word, let me state what S. W. Dorsey says about that increase.

On July 8, he remembers that there was an increase of pay from $1,168 to $17,390; he remembers that there was an increase, but not as to the time (page 3940). Referring to the affidavit of Peck (6 D, page 951), he does not think he directed Rerdell to fill up a blank affidavit and preserve the proportion of 150 to 250 per cent., but says it is possible that he may have done so; cannot say that he did not do that act, which, had you done, sir, you would have remembered to your dying day. Cannot say that he remembered of ever telling a man to fill up an affidavit sworn to by Peck, and to be regardless of what he put in it so that he preserved the proportions and got money enough! Cannot remember that! Would you ever forget it, Mr. Crane? Could time and incident and circumstance and all the infinite variety of the transactions of human life blot that memory from your mind if you had done so? No, sir; you never would forget it. And yet they want you to believe that S. W. Dorsey had forgotten it. He throws something out for his protection against an indictment for perjury when he says, "I might have done it." When a man says he might have done so infamous and villainous a thing as that, I say, gentlemen, that it is nine-tenths proved; for the barrier against crime, which was his sense of moral obligation to duty, he admits is broken down, and that he was capable of the act, whether he did it or not.

Mr. INGERSOLL. What page did you cite, Mr. Merrick, as to him saying possibly he did it?

Mr. MERRICK. 3773 and 3945.

The COURT. Mr. Merrick, perhaps the jury would like to have you explain what was meant by Dorsey's instruction to Rerdell as to preserving the proportion of 150 to 250 per cent.

Mr. MERRICK. To preserve those proportions in the sum which I told you of this morning between the number employed on the present schedule and the number to be employed on the prospective schedule, so as to get an increase to that amount on the original compensation.

The COURT. That is from 150 to 250 on the original contract.

Mr. MERRICK. On the original contract; yes, sir.

The COURT. That proportion was very much exceeded sometimes.

Mr. MERRICK. That proportion was sometimes quadruply exceeded.

The COURT. That rule has a curious operation. You deduct 40 per cent. from the first quantity, the number now engaged, and it would give you a profit of 200 per cent.

Mr. MERRICK. Yes, sir.

Mr. INGERSOLL. It gives more than that; it gives over 250 per cent.

The COURT. Very well. Suppose the present schedule to call for ten men and horses actually and necessarily employed now, and it be proposed that the expedition shall be increased so as to require thirty.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That would be 300 per cent.

The COURT. Three hundred per cent. Now, see how this rule works. If the affidavit man is prepared to go his length of swearing that the present service requires not ten men but only six, and he leaves the proposed number thirty—

Mr. INGERSOLL. [Interposing.] That is 500 per cent.

The COURT. That gives him 500 per cent. Reducing from ten to six is a reduction of 40 per cent. So that by swearing to a reduction of 40 per cent. as to the present service, it makes an increase of 500 per cent.

Mr. MERRICK. That is what I was trying to explain this morning when I started out.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is all very clear.

The COURT. Now, in regard to this instruction as to preserving the proportion for the increase of 150 to 250 per cent., I did not know whether it was entirely understood by the jury or not.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The first increase was from 150 to 200 per cent., and the second to 250 per cent.

Mr. MERRICK. That was a correction of a blunder.

Mr. INGERSOLL. You can call it a correction; it was made, though, from Friday till Monday.

Mr. MERRICK. I suppose you have found the reference?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes.

Mr. MERRICK. And have no correction to make?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Not unless you read the whole testimony.

Mr. MERRICK. I am going to read everything.

The indorsement that it was filed in the department June 25, 1879, is probably correct. Rerdell was here at that time (page 3946); is quite sure he did not tell Rerdell to take one of the blank affidavits and fill it up, for the reason that Rerdell had entire charge and attended to that business; is quite sure he did not. Why is he quite sure? Because Rerdell had charge of and attended to that business, and he is quite sure he did not give him any specific instructions as to this route for the reason that he had invested him with general power and gave him general instructions.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Did you ask him there if he ordered this filled up after it had been sworn to?

Mr. MERRICK. I don't remember.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is the question—after it was sworn to.

Mr. MERRICK. Rerdell says that he did.

The COURT. It was sworn to in January.

Mr. BLISS. This is the testimony:

Q. Can you tell when that affidavit was filled up?—A. I cannot.

Q. Have you no recollection upon that subject?—A. None whatever.

Mr. MERRICK. "I cannot tell when it was filled up. I have no recollection." Why should he not remember? Ought he not to have remembered such a circumstance as that? Again, take in connection with that his other remark, "But it is possible I might have done so."

Mr. BLISS. That is page 3945.

Mr. MERRICK. He says it is possible he may have directed Rerdell to fill it up.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do not want any mistake about it. The point is this——

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] If your honor please, if Mr. Ingersoll will allow me, I scarcely think this is the time in the course of the argument to make points. I have a long road ahead of me, which I shall abridge as much as possible.

The COURT. Counsel can only correct misstatements.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I know Mr. Merrick's position——

Mr. MERRICK. [Interposing.] That has nothing to do with it. The question is as to the fact.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes; as to the testimony. Mr. Merrick says that Mr. Dorsey does not know whether he ordered this man to fill up these blanks after the affidavits was sworn to. I deny that there is any testimony tending in that direction.

Mr. MERRICK. I will ask Colonel Bliss to read it. It will relieve me.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I have no objection in the world to his reading it.

Mr. BLISS. I read from page 3945:

Q. Did you give Rerdell directions as to filling up one of these blank affidavits?—

A. Well, the only recollection I have about that is that he telegraphed me, or wrote me, when I was West, in 1879, that the department required a shorter schedule on two routes, I think, but what reply I made to him I don't remember.

Q. Did you not direct him to fill up a blank affidavit and preserve the proportion of 150 to 200 per cent.?—A. Oh, I don't think I did.

Q. What is your recollection about giving him directions as to filling up the affidavit?—A. My recollection is that I did not, but I don't know; it is possible that I might have done it.

Mr. MERRICK. Is it not just what I said? Is not the statement "Possibly I may have done it?" Does not that refer to a blank affidavit, and do not also the two questions before that to which this is in reply? Is not a blank affidavit the subject being talked of?

Q. Did you give Mr. Rerdell directions as to filling up one of these blank affidavits?—

A. Well, the only recollection I have about that is that he telegraphed me, or wrote me, when I was West in 1879, that the department required a shorter schedule on two routes, I think, but what reply I made to him I don't remember.

Q. What is your recollection about giving him directions as to filling up the affidavit?

It all refers to a blank affidavit.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The point is still not understood.

The COURT. That is a point of argument.

Mr. INGERSOLL. It is not argument. It is——

The COURT. [Interposing.] He has not misread the evidence?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Oh, no.

The COURT. Then you cannot correct him.

Mr. MERRICK. I have not misstated.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The point is as to the difference between an affidavit in blank and a blank affidavit!

Mr. MERRICK. The difference between an affidavit in blank and a blank affidavit!

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is just it exactly. There is a great deal of difference.

Mr. MERRICK. The difference between tweedle-de-dum and tweedle-de-de. What does he mean by saying the proportion must be preserved? Lying? "Yes; lie as much as you please; put into the affiant's mouth all the falsehoods you will. If one hundred horses are used upon the present schedule, make it one horse; and if five hundred horses are required upon the proposed schedule, make it a thousand. It makes no odds. Preserve the proportion. Money is the thing. Brady is the giver. Prepare the instrument and have it ready. Put it in his office, so that it will be a seeming protection for his violation of law and dereliction of official duty. As to its truth, I scatter truth to the winds. Bring me the money. Preserve the proportion. That is the amount of money I want." Rerdell had entire charge. That was Dorsey's reason for thinking he did not give him specific instructions. It was because Rerdell had entire charge. In other words, why should he give him specific instructions? He had given him a plenitude of power, and with that gift of plenary power he had given him such general instructions that he need not longer trouble himself about specific instructions as to specific cases, to fill up an affidavit in blank, or to fill up a blank affidavit. Do you see the difference, gentlemen? I do not. I do not see the difference between filling up an affidavit in blank and filling up a blank affidavit. The affidavit was sworn to when? On the 22d day of January. That was the day it was sworn to. Counsel says there is a difference between an affidavit in blank and a blank affidavit. It was sworn to on the 22d day of January, 1879. When did Dorsey give instructions to fill it up? Before it was sworn to? That is a damaging admission by counsel. What was Dorsey doing with that affidavit on the 22d of January, 1879, when he was in the United States Senate? Can counsel tell me that if that affidavit was filled up before it was sworn to, it was not filled up before the 22d of January, 1879? And if it was filled up by Rerdell at Dorsey's direction, Dorsey gave those directions while he was in the Senate of the United States. What had he to do with that affidavit when he was a Senator of the United States? Counsel's explanation puts his client in a worse position than my argument. On the 22d of January, 1879, by the proof, Rerdell was not in Washington City. He was then serving Vaile and Miner away from here. Now, gentlemen, in order for you to conclude that that affidavit was filled up by Rerdell, under the direction of Dorsey, prior to the time it was sworn to, you have got to find that Dorsey had the paper in his possession; that he was dealing with it and manipulating it whilst he was in the Senate of the United States.

The COURT. You do not mean prior to the time it was sworn to.

Mr. MERRICK. At the time it was sworn to. It was sworn to in New Mexico. Rerdell was not here in Washington. S. W. Dorsey was here.

Mr. INGERSOLL. In whose handwriting is it?

Mr. MERRICK. Miner wrote the paper.

Mr. BLISS. He says the filling in is Rerdell's.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Do you say Rerdell was then working for Vaile and Miner?

Mr. MERRICK. My impression is that he was working for them.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Then, why would Dorsey advise him about this affidavit while he was working for Vaile and Miner?

Mr. MERRICK. Why did Dorsey do a great many things at that time? Dorsey had come out of the Senate on the 4th of March. Dorsey had taken this route on the 4th of March. Dorsey threw off the sheep's clothing that concealed his villainy on the 4th of March, and assumed his real character on that day as interested in these routes.

Mr. INGERSOLL. His letter shows what he did.

Mr. MERRICK. His letter shows what he did on that day, and I will show you what he did long before; I will show you the record evidence, and not depend upon word of mouth; I will prove out of the mouths of Vaile and Miner that they threatened Dorsey, and threatened him by letter long before, that they would disclose his relations to these transactions back in January, 1879, when he was in the Senate; I will show you how he guided this conspiracy from the room in which he had conceived it, with Boone by his side to do this work, and how he gathered these tools around him; I will follow it on down and show him as the master spirit of thought and Brady as the master spirit of action to the very time of the commencement of this investigation. I will take care of Dorsey. Do not fear.

Again, gentlemen, do you suppose it is at all likely that on the 22d day of January, 1879, Peck or anybody else that may have filled up the affidavit knew what was to be the precise time subsequently to be designated on that route? Did Peck know when he swore to that affidavit in January that some time in the spring or summer it was to be expedited to thirty-three hours? Did anybody know it? If they did, how did they find it out? The time of the expedition, the time of carrying the mail, is to be determined according to the existing state and the condition of things. Could Peck have anticipated that the Second Assistant Postmaster-General was going to expedite the time to thirty-three hours? No, gentlemen. It does not stand to reason that Peck in January, 1879, should make an affidavit setting forth the number of men and horses required on a schedule of thirty-three hours, which affidavit should sleep until the following spring or summer and then come out in strange and prophetic realization of what the Second Assistant Postmaster-General actually wanted. That affidavit was in blank, and filled up when it was ascertained what time the conspirators had determined upon. You cannot doubt it. If Peck knew about the thirty-three hours, he was wise beyond his day and generation. There is not a man that lived along that route who knew that it was to be expedited, or dreamed in January that in the July following it would be expedited to thirty-three hours, nor in February did they think so, nor in March, nor in April, nor until the order was passed, for the petitions that came in asked for forty-eight hours.

The COURT. The order was made in June, was it not?

Mr. MERRICK. The affidavit was filed June 25, and the order for expedition was made July 8. The petitions asked for forty-eight hours. Am I not right?

Mr. BLISS. Yes.

Mr. MERRICK. Every one of them. Not another paper on the files designated the time of expedition. Not a paper on the files, except the affidavit, spoke of thirty-three hours. The petitions all asked for forty-eight hours. And yet counsel would have you believe that back in January Peck knew it was to be thirty-three hours. No, no. Your common sense rebels against a conclusion so perfectly preposterous and inconsistent with the facts. No one knew except Brady and Dorsey and Rerdell, and one or two of the other of these conspirators, that that order was to be for thirty-three hours until a short time before it was passed. These men dealt not generally with a view to the far future, except in a comprehensive way as to what they would do. They dealt with each specific case as it arose, and dealt with it according to the terms and needs of their combination. Brady was to give them all he could without exposing himself, and they were to build paper walls of petitions and affidavits to protect Brady's record from a too manifest disclosure of his official rascality. When they reached the time for expedition, as Rerdell says, then came up the question, "How much shall we expedite? How much money can we take without putting our feet certainly across the threshold of the penitentiary?" Rerdell says that when the petitions came he was directed to fill up the affidavits and preserve the proportion.

Now, gentlemen, I again ask, is not here a corroboration of Rerdell? Do not all the circumstances surrounding this transaction corroborate Rerdell? The main fact that Rerdell swears to is that these affidavits were in blank and were distributed. You cannot doubt the fact that this affidavit was in blank and was filled up by Rerdell. The surrounding circumstances; the date of the affidavit; the long period through which that affidavit slept without being filed in the department; the fact that the affidavit designated the time as thirty-three hours and that the petitions called for forty-eight hours (and the affidavit was the only paper on file mentioning thirty-three hours) the fact that S. W. Dorsey cannot recollect, don't remember whether he told Rerdell to fill up one of Peck's blank affidavits or not; the fact that S. W. Dorsey, guarding himself against the greater danger of another indictment, and at the same time as far as possible protecting himself against this indictment, says, "Possibly I may have done so,"—all these things rise up and tend to corroborate Rerdell upon the main facts in this case. As I said to you before, gentlemen, I shall ask credit to be given him where he is corroborated, and I will go on in the progress of this case and corroborate him in reference to every material fact that I think it is important that you should believe, and as I corroborate him I shall show you clearly that he and S. W. Dorsey walk and stand here in court on the same level, master and man, to receive whatever justice may mete out to the one who conceived and the other who helped to execute the mischief which is complained of.

Mr. BLISS. Before the adjournment I desire to say one word in order to make a correction in something I said, as to which my attention has been called. In a discussion, in the course of Judge Wilson's remark as to Mr. Turner and an attempt to bring Mr. Turner into the case, just at the close of it I referred to Mr. Turner as having indorsed the jacket upon the Bismarck and Fort Keogh route. This was one of those oversights that occurred, because I had talked with Mr. Brewer about it shortly before. I desire now simply to place upon the record the fact that the indorsement on the Bismarck and Fort Keogh route was the indorsement of Mr. Brewer, and was not that of Mr. Turner, and that I was in error in regard to it.

Mr. MERRICK. I am about to enter upon another route, and it is nearly 1 o'clock.

The COURT. We will take our recess now.

At this point (1 o'clock p. m.) the court took its usual recess.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. MERRICK. [Resuming.] With submission to the court and gentlemen of the jury. The next route to which I propose to call your attention in further illustration by the transactions which occurred in relation to it of the proposition that I am discussing, that these affidavits were in blank, and in aid of the inquiry as to who filled them up, is the route from Garland to Parrott City, commonly known as the Ojo Caliente route. John W. Dorsey was the contractor upon this route. There were two oaths filed upon this route, but the oaths contemplated different schedules of time, and I shall not pause in the course of my remarks or digress to trouble you with any particular comparison at present of those two oaths. The first oath was for a schedule of eighty hours, and is marked in the case as Exhibit 20 F. It was sworn to March 11, 1879, in Vermont. It was filed April 16, 1879. Boone swears, on page 2693, that it was all written by Rerdell except the signature of J. W. Dorsey, which is genuine, and the words "State of Vermont, Addison County," the "11," and the signature of the county clerk. Rerdell testified to the same effect, and in addition that the oath was filled up by direction of S. W. Dorsey after it was sworn to. The oath itself has the appearance of having been filled up by different handwritings, and there is a space left where the words were filled in. John W. Dorsey swears, on page 4141, that Vaile and Miner had charge of this route in March, and that Rerdell had nothing to do with it, and that it looks as if the affidavit was in two different kinds of ink. Now, you must recollect, in order to appreciate what I have to say as I go along, that this oath was sworn to on March 11, that it was not filed until April 6, and that John W. Dorsey says that Vaile and Miner had charge of the route in March, and Rerdell had nothing to do with it. You will recollect that between the time that the affidavit was made, namely, the 11th of March, and April 16, the day when it was filed, occurred the alleged division of routes, and that in that division on April 1, 1879, this route was taken by S. W. Dorsey. You will bear in mind in that connection that after that time S. W. Dorsey, as I read to you this morning, testified that Rerdell took charge of all these matters of his, so that whilst Rerdell had nothing to do with this route on the 11th of March, when the affidavit was made, he did have something to do with it on the 16th of April, when the affidavit was filed. The letter of John W. Dorsey transmitting the oath, 21 F, dated April 14, 1879, was written by Rerdell. So says Boone and so says Rerdell. Now, if Vaile and Miner had charge of this route in March, 1879, and Rerdell had nothing to do with it, as testified by John W. Dorsey, how did it come to be in his handwriting? That is a very simple inquiry. How did it come to be filled up in his handwriting as he had nothing to do with it prior to or at the time of the making of the affidavit on the 11th of March? It is, of course, not reasonable to suppose that he filled up the affidavit either prior to or at the time it was made. But after the 11th of March, a new condition of things arose, as stated by the defendants, in which Rerdell directly after the 1st of April did take charge of this route, and it is therefore the inevitable conclusion that he did not fill it up until he took charge of the route, which was after the 1st of April. If he did not fill it up until after the 1st of April, and it was sworn to on the 11th of March, it was a blank affidavit or an affidavit in blank, whichever you please. This conclusively establishes that the oath was sworn to in blank and turned over to S. W. Dorsey at the time of the alleged division and was filled up at the time it was filed, namely, April 16, 1879. Now, I may ask as I pass along, does not this corroborate Rerdell as to his statement in reference to that oath? Does it not, in corroborating Rerdell in reference to his statement as to that oath, corroborate him also upon that other material point that when the division took place on the 1st of April, 1879, these oaths sworn to in blank were divided between the parties according to the routes they took to be filled up and used as the occasion and the emergency might require? This is another corroboration of Rerdell on that material point, not by the testimony of another witness, but by better testimony, the conditions and circumstances.

The second oath was for a schedule of fifty hours, and is 22 F. This was the oath which was sworn to by John W. Dorsey, before Kellogg, on April 26, 1879, and filed April 26, 1879—the same day. The first oath was for eighty hours and the second oath was for fifty hours and was sworn to before Kellogg, here in Washington, on the 26th and filed on the same day. That oath was made and filed at a time when Rerdell was not here. Bear that in mind.

Mr. WILSON. Will you allow me to call your attention to the fact that this first affidavit is in the handwriting of Mr. Rerdell?

Mr. BLISS. He stated that at the outset.

Mr. WILSON. I misunderstood him, then.

Mr. MERRICK. Boone swears that the body was written by Kellogg. I am speaking of the fifty-hour affidavit.

The COURT. Was any order made under the first of those affidavits?

Mr. MERRICK. No, sir.

The COURT. That affidavit was filed the 16th of April?

Mr. BLISS. Yes, sir.

The COURT. Before anything was done under that affidavit the second affidavit was filed on the 26th of the same month.

Mr. BLISS. Yes, sir.

The COURT. For fifty hours?

Mr. MERRICK. For fifty hours instead of eighty. Boone swears that the body of the affidavit of the 26th of April, was written by Kellogg except the number 38145 and the words "three," "five," "fifteen," "fifty," "three," "twelve," and "forty-two," which are in a handwriting similar to that of S. W. Dorsey. He does not think J. W. Dorsey wrote the signature. Rerdell testifies to the same effect, except that the signature of J. W. Dorsey is genuine. Now here are some singular figures. I do not know how to account for them. The letter of J. W. Dorsey, 19 F, inclosing the second oath, dated April 23, 1879, was filed April 24, 1879, two days before the oath was sworn to. Boone testifies that the signature and all is in a disguised hand which resembles that of S. W. Dorsey. There is the oath that was acted on [exhibiting it] made at a time when Rerdell was not here, and the body of it written by Kellogg. Boone says that the number 38145 and the words "three," "five," "fifteen," "fifty," "three," "twelve," and "forty-two" are in a handwriting similar to that of S. W. Dorsey. He does not think that J. W. Dorsey wrote the signature. Rerdell testifies that those same words which Boone testifies to as being in the handwriting of S. W. Dorsey are in S. W. Dorsey's handwriting, and he says further that he thinks the signature of John W. Dorsey is a genuine signature. He and Boone do not agree entirely about the signature. The letter of Dorsey inclosing the second oath, dated April 23, and filed April 24, two days before the oath was sworn to, Boone testified is, signature and all, in a disguised hand which resembles that of S. W. Dorsey. Rerdell testified that the signature and all in that letter were written by S. W. Dorsey. Now, if Rerdell had wanted to tell a story here was his chance. If he had been regardless of the truth, here was his opportunity to tell a story that according to the theory of Mr. Ingersoll, would have been something of a luxury to him. He might have sworn that S. W. Dorsey wrote the name of John W. Dorsey to the affidavit, but on the contrary, instead of saying that S. W. Dorsey wrote the name of John W. Dorsey to the affidavit, as Boone had sworn, Rerdell says that is John W. Dorsey's signature, but S. W. Dorsey did write the letter inclosing the affidavit, and did write John W. Dorsey's signature to the letter. That is not half as bad as if S. W. Dorsey had written John W. Dorsey's name to the affidavit. This little circumstance shows that Rerdell was not so very much disposed to tell an untruth as the uncharitable remarks of the other side are calculated to lead you to believe. You will see that Boone and Rerdell are evidently right in saying that S. W. Dorsey filled up that affidavit and wrote that letter. You have already had occasion to examine some of the writing that was conceded to be his, and if you retain a recollection of its appearance in your mind, I am sure you can compare that with the image fixed upon your mind, and you will recognize the family resemblance of the words in the different papers, all the time recollecting that Rerdell was not here at that time. I said just now, by the way, that there was something peculiar about this matter that I did not understand. The oath was filed on the 26th and sworn to on the 26th. The letter inclosing it was dated the 23d, before the oath was made, and was filed the 24th. That letter inclosing that oath somehow or other got into the department before the oath was made.

The COURT. Does that letter identify this particular affidavit?

Mr. MERRICK. I will read the letter:

I have the honor to transmit herewith a statement of the number of men and animals it will require to run the route from Parrott City to Ojo Caliente, on a schedule of fifty hours and three trips a week. Considering the character of the country, the mountains to be crossed, and the streams to be forded, the time proposed of (50) fifty hours is equal to seven miles an hour on an ordinary route. It is an extraordinary undertaking to make this time, but believing that the interests of the public service, as well as that of the people of this section, demand it, I will undertake it.

Respectfully,

J. W. DORSEY.

If your honor will look at that signature you will see at once that John W. Dorsey never wrote it in the world. The affidavit is for fifty hours three times a week. How that happened I do not know, and I have been unable to find any satisfactory standpoint from which I can reason to such a conclusion as would be to me a satisfactory solution of the remarkable occurrence.

The COURT. This was after the alleged petition was made.

Mr. MERRICK. Oh, yes, sir.

The COURT. John W. Dorsey had sold out then.

Mr. MERRICK. Yes; he had not anything to do with it except that he was the nominal contractor. How an oath which was made on the 26th day of April could be inclosed in a letter which was dated two days before, and how that letter inclosing the oath could be filed two days before, I do not know. The date of the letter and the date of the filing served to corroborate each other as the correct dates, and show there was not a mistake. I had supposed there must have been a mistake, but the date of the filing and the date of the letter each corroborates the other as being correct. A letter written on the 23d here in Washington would get to the department naturally on the 24th, and it seems this was filed on the 24th, and it contained an oath which was not made until two days after the letter was filed.

The COURT. Will you let me see that oath? [Oath handed to court.]

Mr. MERRICK. Gentlemen, you will have to find out the answer to this the best way you can.

The COURT. The indorsement on this oath does not show the day it was filed.

Mr. MERRICK. Yes; I think it does.

Mr. BLISS. At the top, I think.

The COURT. The date, April 26, 1879, refers to the date of the affidavit.

Mr. BLISS. No, sir; the dates on the back are always the dates of filing.

Mr. MERRICK. The date is never put on the back until it reaches the office.

The COURT. There is nothing on this indorsement to show whether that was intended as the date of filing or the date of the oath.

Mr. MERRICK. Only the general evidence in the case of the office marks.

Mr. BLISS. At any rate, it is two days after the date of the letter.

The COURT. It seems to me that the word "April" is filled in after the certificate was written out, and it may have been that the word "twenty-six" was written in at the same time. I do not know. I should think they were.

Mr. MERRICK. The only point I am making upon it is the filling in of the number of the animals and men. Gentlemen, bear in mind that this second oath was made while Rerdell was not here. S. W. Dorsey testifies that he thinks that if J. W. Dorsey had any interest in the route and made an affidavit for expedition on April 26, 1879, it was because the department required the contractor to make the affidavit. (Page 3937.) Yet S. W. Dorsey knew perfectly well at that time that affidavits were received at that department when made by others than the contractor or the subcontractor. He has no recollection of having filled in the affidavits. (Pages 3771, 3772, and 3927.) He has no recollection of that important event. The order came pretty soon afterwards. It came on April 29, 1879, allowing $8,457.84 on that affidavit, and Dorsey says the testimony of Boone does not refresh his recollection. The order does not refresh his recollection, and the testimony of Boone does not refresh his recollection.

Whilst I go on I must gather from either side of my path what I think may be useful in showing when and by whom these blank affidavits were filled up, and that they were blank. I want to call your attention to the character of the testimony of S. W. Dorsey.

The FOREMAN. Some of the jurors have asked me if Boone testified that those affidavits were sworn to in blank.

Mr. MERRICK. I do not think Boone testified to anything of that kind, because he could not. He had never seen those affidavits. He was testifying to the handwriting. He could not tell whether they were in blank or not. Now I read from page 3938 of the examination of S. W. Dorsey:

Q. On that affidavit—

That is, the affidavit I have just read to you—

there was an increase of $11,774 on that route made under an order passed April 29, which went into effect May 12.

The WITNESS. What route is that?

Mr. MERRICK. That is Garland to Parrott City. Does that refresh your recollection at all?

A. No, sir; it does not, except that I think the increase ought to have been much greater.

Q. I have no doubt you do, Mr. Dorsey. You got all you could, did you not?—A. Yes; that is what I had the contracts for, to get all I could.

Q. You got all it was safe for the Second Assistant Postmaster-General to allow you, did you not?—A. I never thought he was in much danger.

Mr. WILSON. Is that a proper question?

Then the affidavit was read to him, and he was asked:

Q. Does that refresh your memory about having written those words?—A. I don't remember it; there is another party who can write a hand similar to mine.

Another party can write a hand similar to mine! He did not dare to deny that he wrote them. That he did write them is proved by Boone and is manifest by a comparison of the handwriting. He is not able to say whether he wrote them or not from his recollection, and yet he shows the virus of his spirit by indicating in his remarks that there is another man who writes a hand like his, his pupil Rerdell. And yet Rerdell was not here to write it. The oath was sworn to April 26, 1879, when it is admitted Rerdell was away. It was filed April 26, 1879, when it is admitted Rerdell was away. The order on the oath granting an increase of $8,457.84 was made I think I said April 29, 1879, when Rerdell was away! From the birth of the oath down to the day it bore its forbidden fruit Rerdell was thousands of miles away, in the western country, and yet this great man Dorsey, so described by his counsel, comes upon the stand, and whilst unable to say whether he wrote a paper or not, although the proof is that he did write it, attempts to cast a slur on his pupil, Rerdell, by saying that some one else can write a hand very much like his.

The testimony from the circumstances as to whether the second oath for fifty hours was in blank or not is meager. The testimony from the circumstances that the first oath filed April 16, 1879 was in blank is full and complete. S. W. Dorsey is further examined upon the subject:

Q. Are you willing to say that you did not write those words in that affidavit?—

A. I am willing to say that I do not believe I did.

Q. Are you willing to say you did not?—A. I will not say that I did not, but I don't believe I did. That is as far as I want to go.

Q. That is as far as you can go?—A. Yes.

Now for John W. Dorsey, although I deem it unnecessary to contradict him any more or treat him as a living factor in this case. When you have once proved that a party in a case availing himself of the privilege to become a witness takes the stand and commits perjury so manifestly as John W. Dorsey did in regard to the two affidavits on the Pueblo and Rosita route he cannot be regarded as of any practical utility in the case. His testimony is soiled and stained. He is not like an ordinary witness, for an ordinary witness may pervert the truth or falsify and still be entitled to credit. But when a party takes the stand and the jury is convinced that in one material particular he has deliberately and purposely committed perjury the only conclusion from is, that, conscious of guilt, he prefers to stain his soul and desecrate the court with the crime of perjury in order to escape the peril of a just conviction. It is an admission of guilt, as I have said before, and repeat, and will continue to repeat. But let us see what he says. I read from page 4125:

Q. Were you in the habit of swearing to affidavits in blank and allowing people to fill up whatever they wanted?—A. I do not think I was.

Q. Did you ever swear to any blank affidavit?—A. Not that I can recollect of.

Q. Was not this affidavit blank when you swore to it?—A. I could not say.

Q. Look at it and tell the court and jury whether that was not a blank affidavit when you swore to it?—A. All I know about it is that I was here at that time, at that date.

By the COURT:

Q. On the 26th?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. But look at the filling up, and see whether it was blank at that date or not?

This was by the court. The court says, "Just take it and look at it," and he answered:

I could not tell whether it was or not.

The man who swore to it, after having his memory refreshed and being called upon by counsel and by the court to look at it, examine it, and think about it, the man who swore he did not believe he had ever sworn to a blank affidavit, when handed a particular paper and asked by the court—for a question from the court comes with greater dignity than it does from counsel—"Look at the filling up, Mr. Dorsey, and see whether it was blank at that date or not," replied "Oh, I could not tell whether it was or not."

Now, gentlemen of the jury, I desire to approach these affidavits from another point. I told you I regarded these affidavits as all-important. As the roots of this tree we are seeking for the sake of the nation and of the integrity of the people to cut down with the axe of justice. Mr. Foreman, I do not intend to leave these affidavits until you and I and all the rest of us understand them just alike. I now propose to show you, according to the evidence in the case, taking a few samples, for I cannot take them all, without wearying you too much, that they are dyed in perjury, and steeped in perjury. I will show you this by the evidence in the case, that is, supposing that the men whose names are signed to them swore to them after they were filled up, and not in blank. I have got through with the blank affidavits. I think I have shown that they were in blank. But suppose they were not in blank. What then? The first one I will take up is that on the Vermillion and Sioux Falls route. John W. Dorsey was the contractor. The length of the route was seventy-three miles. It was advertised at fifty miles, one trip, and fourteen hours. There was a mistake in the advertisement. The original pay was $398. On December 23, 1878, it was increased to two trips. On July 10, 1879, it was increased to six trips, at a cost of $1,635.60. On the same day it was expedited ten hours, and $3,600 was allowed. The total pay was $6,133.50. The oath of H. M. Vaile, of whom some pleasant things may be said, was for a fourteen-hour schedule, three trips, three men, and three animals—six. On the proposed schedule of ten hours, five men and ten animals—fifteen. The difference in men and carriers on the original and proposed schedules, according to the affidavit, was 150 per cent. What was the number necessary according to the testimony in the case? On a fourteen-hour schedule, three trips, according to the testimony it would require one man and eight animals, and on a ten-hour schedule, one man and ten animals. (See testimony of Leach, subcontractor, page 1910.) Difference in stock and carriers on present and proposed schedule, according to the facts and evidence, 22 per cent. Difference in stock and carriers, according to the affidavit, 150 per cent. That left 128 per cent. of perjury in that affidavit for the Western shepherd from Independence, Missouri. The allowance for expedition, according to the oath, was $3,680.10. The allowance, according to the testimony, should have been $545.19. The fraudulent allowance on Vaile's affidavit was, therefore, $3,134.91, and that is on the testimony of the subcontractor, who knew what was the present need according to the present schedule, and what would be needed according to the proposed schedule. 128 per cent. of perjury is a very small affair when you come to compare it to some of these other affidavits. The oath is false in both branches. It understated the number of men and animals required on the slow schedule, and overstated the number necessary on the expedited schedule. Now let me call your attention to another fact. The expedited schedule missed the connection. This is for the benefit of Mr. Brady. The mail arrived at Sioux Falls at 5 p. m., and left Sioux Falls for the east at 1 p. m., and for the west at 7 a. m. The mail arrived at Vermillion at 5 p. m., and left for the west at 4 p. m., and for the east at 9.30 p. m. There were no connections at all after expedition. At Sioux Falls, going east, the mail laid over twenty hours, and going west it laid over fourteen hours. At Vermillion, going east, it laid over seventeen and one-half hours, and going west it laid over twenty-three hours. And the mail, for carrying which this fraudulent allowance was made of 128 per cent. of perjury, consisted sometimes of a postal-card, and sometimes three or four letters and papers. (Page 1918.) The distance was seventy-three miles, but it was advertised at fifty, which made a schedule of about seven miles an hour. Brady disregarded the petitions of the postmasters for an extension of the schedule to sixteen hours, as I have already explained to you, although recommended by Judge Bennett, the Delegate in Congress. When Brady's attention was called to the indorsement of Judge Bennett asking that the time should be extended with a view, though not expressed, that connections might be made, and indicating that the people were satisfied without this large payment from the Treasury upon the 128 per cent. of perjury, he said:

Write Judge B. it cannot be done.

I say that on that testimony, gentlemen of the jury, Mr. Vaile is guilty of perjury—perjury whose practical fruit was to rob the Government, according to the calculation I have read you, of $3,134.91 a year. Had he made a truthful statement in reference to the quantities which make up the sum of the proportion from which the Second Assistant Postmaster-General is obliged to determine the amount due for expedition, those truthful quantities would have paid him for the expedition only $545, or 22 per cent. of the original cost, whereas he got 150 per cent. of the original cost. And, as he says himself, he swore to that affidavit, although he had never been on the route, and knew nothing about it. If he had never been there and knew nothing about it, it was perfectly manifest that he was swearing only with a view to the fruit, and not with a view to the facts.

Another route to which I will call your attention, to illustrate the perjury of which these affiants were guilty, is 38135, Saint Charles to Greenhorn. Length of route, thirty-five miles; two trips, twelve hours; original pay, $548; August 30, 1878, include Pueblo, $328.30; June 26, 1879, increase one trip, $438.80; making a total pay for three trips, $1,315.20. Same date an order was made for expedition from sixteen to seven hours, at a cost of $2,630.40. The total pay for three trips and expedition was $3,945.60. The oath of Mr. John R. Miner, contractor, made April 17, 1879 (5 B), says that on the present schedule (sixteen hours, three trips), "one men and one animals" are necessary. [5 B handed to the jury.] Look at it and see if the "s" is struck off of the word animals; is it?

Mr. RENSHAW (a juror). No, sir.

Mr. MERRICK. Then it is "one men and one animals." I think, perhaps, they did not do very much toward murdering the King's English, for they were too busy robbing the people's treasury. The affidavit then says that on the seven-hour schedule, three trips, two men and four animals would be necessary—making six—an increase of stock and carriers, according to the oath, of 200 per cent. What was the number actually used and required to do the work upon those two schedules? Upon a sixteen-hour schedule, two trips, one man and two animals—three. Miner swears that on the original schedule two were required; the truth is that on the original schedule three were required. The more you reduce the number needed on the original schedule below that which was actually required the more you cheat the Government, for the further apart you keep the number of men and animals needed on the present schedule and the number of men and animals needed on the new schedule the greater will be your pay.

Mr. CRANE (foreman of the jury). To get expedition.

Mr. MERRICK. Yes, that is it, Mr. Crane. They put down the number needed on the present schedule at two. The truth is that the number needed on the present schedule was three. They put down the number needed on the proposed schedule of seven hours as six; the proof is that the number needed on the schedule of seven hours was three; that there was no more needed and required on the reduced time than there was upon the original schedule. Who are the witnesses? Call them up. Mr. John R. Miner, you are arraigned for perjury upon an affidavit, in which the falsehood is your statement that there were two men and animals needed on the present schedule, whereas there were three needed; and you made the further statement that six men and animals would be needed on the schedule if reduced to seven hours, whereas in fact there would be needed only three on that reduced schedule. Call in the witnesses.

Mr. RENSCHAW (a juror). How long was that route?

Mr. MERRICK. Thirty-two miles. Only three times a week—plenty of time to do it in.

Call in the witnesses. George Sears (page 827); I do not care to read it; Farish, subcontractor, who did the work (page 835), swears to what I have said; Higgason (page 839), McDaniel (page 837), Withers (page 825)—all swore that the diminution of time made necessary no additional stock and carriers, and that to carry the mail on the original schedule of sixteen hours it needed three men and animals.

The COURT. One man and two animals.

Mr. MERRICK. One man and two animals, making three. How shall Mr. Miner answer this charge of perjury? This is not a speculative opinion of Sears and of Farish, the subcontractor, and these other men; this is what they actually did before expedition and after expedition, and there were no fines for a failure to meet the exigencies of the service or to come up to the time.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire to correct Mr. Merrick in that particular, if your honor please. The witnesses that he has spoken of did not carry it on the long schedule.

Mr. MERRICK. That will not do.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to correct him on another matter. He stated that on the Vermillion and Sioux Falls route there were only two or three letters a day carried.

Mr. MERRICK. I am done with that route.

Mr. WILSON. I do not care if you are; pardon me.

Mr. MERRICK. Go ahead, if you do not.

Mr. WILSON. There is a statement in the record of the revenues of the offices along the route, and at one of those offices alone, as shown by their own testimony, there was $241.35 a year.

Mr. MERRICK. What do you refer to?

Mr. WILSON. I am talking about Maple Grove, and I call attention to the record at page 2736.

Mr. BLISS. That is where another route crosses that route.

The COURT. There are ten or eleven post-offices on that route.

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir. They put in this record showing the stamps sold at those various offices. Now, that record is absolutely contradictory of what Mr. Merrick says.

Mr. MERRICK. It is no such thing.

Mr. BLISS. With reference to this Vermillion and Sioux Falls route, if your honor please, there is one mail bill in, showing, I think, three letters; and the witness Millie swore positively, if I mistake not, that sometimes there were none, and sometimes there were two or three letters and two or three papers, or about that.. Mr. Merrick stated that.

Mr. WILSON. I agree that one of the witnesses did make that kind of a statement that Mr. Merrick made.

Mr. MERRICK. Did he not make that exact statement?

Mr. WILSON. Substantially that.

Mr. MERRICK. Why do you say "That kind of a statement?"

Mr. WILSON. I say it was substantially the same. Now, they themselves have introduced in evidence the record of the department, showing simply the stamps sold, which does not represent any of the letters that are in there, as the court knows, and I think it is but just and fair that this evidence should be given as it is. I do not deny that he has stated what the witnesses said, but he does not say what the record shows.

Mr. BLISS. At page 3170 there is a mail bill put in by them as follows:

Route No. 35015, from Vermillion to Sioux Falls. Post-office at Sioux Falls, D. T. Date, Nov. 28, 1879. Mail, consisting of ten letters and three packs papers, was dispatched this day at 6.35 o'clock a. m.

That is, starting from Sioux Falls.

Mr. MERRICK. The office to which Mr. Wilson has referred was a point where one or two or more routes crossed the route from Vermillion to Sioux Falls; is not that so, sir?

Mr. CHANDLER. Where is the evidence of it?

Mr. MERRICK. Is it not so?

Mr. CHANDLER. Where is the evidence?

Mr. MERRICK. Is it not so? I am talking to Mr. Wilson.

Mr. CHANDLER. There is no such evidence in the record.

Mr. MERRICK. Is it not so?

Mr. WILSON. You have the evidence there.

Mr. MERRICK. Is it not so?

The COURT. If you have the evidence you can refer to it.

Mr. MERRICK. That was a point where other routes crossed this route.

Mr. CHANDLER. When Mr. Ingersoll was making his speech and made any statement that was contradicted, he was required to cite the page of the record upon which was the testimony to which he was referring.

Mr. BLISS. Allow me to refer Mr. Merrick to page 1925:

Q. Was there a mail route that crossed yours at Glenwood?—A. There was.

Q. Where did that route run from?—A. I think it went from Yankton to Eden.

Q. Where was Eden?—A. On the Sioux River.

Q. On a railroad; was there a railroad at Eden in 1879?—A. I am not prepared to say.

Q. There is now?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Eden was to the east of Glenwood, then?—A. It was.

Q. Do you know how far?—A. I do not.

Mr. WILSON. That does not touch this point at all.

Mr. MERRICK. It does not?

Mr. WILSON. No, sir.

Mr. MERRICK. Now, gentlemen of the jury, you see the candor of the gentleman, when I ask him whether or not there was not another route crossing this route at Glenwood——

Mr. WILSON. [Interposing.] You misapprehend me; I am not talking about Glenwood; I am talking about Maple Grove.

Mr. MERRICK. I thought you referred to Glenwood.

Mr. WILSON. Oh, no.

Mr. MERRICK. How far is Maple Grove from Glenwood?

Mr. BLISS. They are the same thing.

Mr. MERRICK. They are the same thing, and when I asked him whether or not there was not another route crossing this route at this point, and asked him several times, he was dumb as a tomb; he would not even answer. Now, the revenues at a post-office, when returned, are made up of the revenues from all the routes that come into that post-office. If you reconcile the testimony with the record, as you must do, the routes that crossed the Vermillion and Sioux Falls route furnished those revenues, for the proof from the men that knew what went over the Sioux Falls route is that they carried scarcely any mail at all.

Mr. WILSON. Allow me to call your attention to another post-office (Worthing) where the receipts were $101.50 for stamps sold.

Mr. MERRICK. I had got through, gentlemen. Let him have the benefit of it. I have but little to say to men who deal in that way, with that want of frankness.

I was reading to you, I believe, this oath, when I was interrupted.

Mr. BLISS. With reference to Worthing, I desire to call your honor's attention to the fact that Worthing is the point to which, long after this expedition, the route was curtailed, so that it did not go up to Sioux Falls; was made the terminal point, and that the revenues that appear at Worthing do not appear at Worthing until 1880, long after this time when it became the terminal point of the route.

Mr. WILSON. That is no answer to it at all.

Mr. MERRICK. Nothing can answer you.
